In the election in the city of Stockton on May the 18th there were three tickets—Republican, Democratic and Good Government League. On December 10, 1907, the citizens had taken a straw vote on the question of closing the 102 saloons of the city on Sunday. The Council having officially pledged itself to enact the necessary ordinance majority of the people voted in favor of Sunday closing. A majority of sixty-six people did so vote and after a delay of several weeks the council finally passed the ordinance. The saloons were greatly put out and about three months after the closing law went into effect endeavored to secure another referendum election and all but succeeded. It was admitted by everyone that in the city election Sunday closing would be the issue.

The Sunday closing campaign had been managed successfully by an organization of citizens known as the Committee of Fifty. After its work was ended this committee went into a state of suspended animation, but was resurrected on the approach of the city election, and from it a larger organization was formed known as the Good Government League. This body announced as its sole endeavor in the pending city campaign the upholding and continuance of the Sunday closing law. For many months it was a matter of general knowledge that the Royal Arch had been carefully and systematically preparing for the election, and was finding out the sentiment of voters and was urging all its members and those in touch with them to register every one friendly to the saloon cause.

About a month in advance of the time for holding party conventions the Good Government League decided that its plan of action would be to get to both of the old parties to endorse Sunday closing in their platforms, and, if not both parties, then at least one, and the Good Government people would give their support to the candidates of that party. Good citizens, irrespective of party affiliations in the past, came out openly and declared their readiness to vote with that party which stood fairly and clearly for Sunday closing. In order that there might be no reasonable excuse for misunderstanding their position the Good Government forces went on record in formal resolutions declaring that their sole interest and purpose in the present campaign was to secure the continuance of Sunday closing for the ensuing two years.

At the request of the Republican leaders representatives of the Good Government League met them in conference. Two conferences were held and a third arranged for, but not a sufficient number were in attendance. Nothing came of the conferences and the Republicans were inclined to question whether the Good Government League representatives really represented anything, in other words, whether they had back of them a sufficiently strong public sentiment to entitle them to be considered as a political force. The Good Government League thereupon commenced to hold meetings, to organize and to try out the sentiment of its members. These meetings were public, reporters were present at all sessions and each individual who desired was free to express his ideas. One evening the sentiment crystallized into the adoption of the following, written off-hand by one of the members of the League:

"Declaration of Principles.

"First—The continuance and upholding of the present Sunday closing law.

"Second—The reorganization of the police department to the end that the Sunday closing law and all other laws of the city be honestly and efficiently enforced.

"Third—The same value for public expenditure that we demand in private business.

"We hereby subscribe to the foregoing, and mutually pledge ourselves to vote for no man for mayor or councilman in the coming city election in Stockton who will not publicly and openly subscribe to these principles."

The following day these pledges were circulated for signatures and by the following night over 500 voters had signed. The work of securing signatures was continued until over 1,000 men had over their signatures pledged themselves to vote for no man for mayor or councilman who would not publicly and openly declare himself in favor of Sunday closing or who would not subscribe to the principles. Now, for the first time, the running of a ticket was spoken of, provided it should become necessary by the refusal of the parties to endorse Sunday closing. But however, it was expected and hoped by the Good Government League that, with the showing of strength demonstrated by the pledges, at least one, if not both, of the old parties would declare in favor of Sunday closing. This hope was not to bear fruit. No political platform in the city of Stockton or the county of San Joaquin had ever specifically mentioned such things as the liquor question or race track gambling. This time the platforms, as subsequent events proved, were to mention Sunday closing, but not in the manner that the Good Government people desired.

All devices of duplicity and pleading were adopted by the Good Government people to get the political bosses to agree to allow an endorsement of Sunday closing to go into the platforms. Negotiations were carried on principally with the Republicans, inasmuch as that party were a handful of men who were absolutely controlled, whereas in the Democratic party it was not easy to find the center of authority.

Two weeks in advance of the Republican convention the self-constituted leaders of the party requested a further conference with the representatives of the Good Government League. At this conference was submitted a tentative plank favoring Sunday closing, "subject only to the right of a majority to decide otherwise," and the Republican organization leaders asked the Good Government people if such a plank would be satisfactory. The answer was a decided negative; it reopened the entire question; meant another straw vote; the disturbance of business conditions and the arraying again of the community into two hostile camps. The Good Government forces maintained that there should be no compromise of the question for two years, that being the length of the city administration. The Republican leaders denied that the plank meant another election. The Good Government people replied that they construed it as a tacit promise to the sponsors of another straw vote. The conference finally ended by the Good Government representatives stating that they would go back to their general body and report the plank for discussion and action. This brought matters to a head and the organization men coolly replied that it was unnecessary to refer the matter to the League, that it was going into the Republican platform, anyway. This seemed to settle it and the Good Government forces recognized that the only chance to battle for their principles at the polls lay in running a separate ticket, as there was no encouragement whatever from Democratic sources.

The Good Government League was the first to nominate, for it had to get its ticket on the ballot by petition. The old party conventions this year were set considerably later than usual—so late that there would not be sufficient time for an independent movement to wait until after the party conventions and then get its nominations filed within the prescribed thirty days of the election. The League nominated a full ticket, using as a platform its declaration of principles. Then came the Republican convention and adopted the plank drawn up two weeks prior by the organization as follows:

"We believe in the time-honored American principle that the majority shall rule. The people of Stockton having by precedent adopted the referendum to deal with the Sunday closing question and a majority of the voters having decided in favor of a Sunday closing ordinance, we promise the strict enforcement of that ordinance and its maintenance, subject only to the right of a majority of the voters to decide otherwise."

The night following the Democrats met in convention and they adopted as their platform:

"The present law closing the saloons of this city on Sunday has been in effect for more than one year. Its effects have been thoroughly tried and the community has now a full knowledge of and a practical experience with its operations. We believe that the question of its continuance should be settled by its resubmission to a test of public sentiment, and we therefore pledge our candidates for mayor and councilmen, if they are elected, to advocate

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

He Didn't Have Time.

He yearned to do good while he journeyed below,
But he didn't have time;
He had high aspirations to lessen life's woe,
But he didn't have time;
He meant to bring gladness to hearts in dismay,
But, alas and alas! the deuce was to pay,
He'd but twenty-four hours in the course of the day,
So he didn't have time

He knew that the halting had need of his might,
But he didn't have time;
And greatly he yearned to be lead to the right,
But he didn't have time;
He knew that life's blossoms in fellowship grew,
That actions of kindness are fragrance they strew,
But, with twenty-four hours, what's a mortal to do?
So he didn't have time.

The markets, the office, the club and the play—
Oh, he didn't have time—
Encooched on the nighttime and fracture the day,
So he didn't have time,
He longed to be warring 'gainst ill and abuse,
To join the battalions that throttle the deuce,
But, with twenty-four hours in the day, what's the use?
So he didn't have time.

There came a white angel and beckoned him out,
Though he pleaded for time,
Past misdeeds that are woven of error and doubt,
Where, perhaps, the time
To sigh for the deeds that were dreamed but undone,
The blessings ungiven, the races unrun,
For I've heard when the Land of Regret has been won
There is no clock of time.

A Bulldog, and the Rest of Us.

Last week the champion English bulldog was sold to a resident of Long Island for $5,250. What about it? Nothing. That sum, according to census reports, is more than ten times as much as the average American laborer is paid for a year of hard work; but nothing about it. It is more than a shop girl at a salary of $6 a week earns in sixteen years and nine months, if she does not starve to death in the meantime; but nothing about it. It would, at a wholesale rate of twenty cents, give meals to 26,250 hungry people, and I presume it is safe to say that there are more than that number of hungry people in this land of the free right now; but nothing about it. No, nothing about it, for, as you have logically remarked, my philosophic friend, a man has a right to do as he pleases with his own money. Moreover, the strain of English bulldogs should be maintained at its highest mark, and if in the meanwhile certain unfortunates starve, as they have a bad habit of doing, well, it is regrettable, of course, but, not the less, let us unite in crying, Long life to the bulldog! The necessities of life men must get along without if they must, but the frills we must have if we are to be able to guarantee the pedigree of our pups.

Gentle Woman and Her Skirt.

"There are ill-informed men," said the Thoughtful Observer, "who contend that women are man's intellectual inferior. They are off their whirl, to use the language of the lower classes and university students. As a matter of fact, woman daily performs mental feats which would leave man dazed and groping.

In saying this, the Thoughtful Observer continued, "I do not refer to her capacity for telling where and how a man has spent his evening when she knows nothing about it, although this well might give us pause. Nor have I in mind the mental process which impels her to travel twenty miles and pay forty cents carfare in order to secure the reduction on four yards of cloth cut from one dollar to ninety-eight cents. These things are significant, but it is to her management of her skirts that I bow in awe-struck reverence.

"You are walking with one of the charming creatures, and she is looking into your eyes with that absorbed interest with which lovely woman views man if he is not married. It is this soulful interest which impels you to glitter in drooling platitudes and inane commonplaces, as is your wont, and, oh, how rapt, entranced and absorbed in your manly exposure of your mental vacuity she is! Right attentively she listens, and you are made glad and proud to realize that here, at last, is one who appreciates your full worth.

"Now you come to a crossing that has been recently sprinkled, but you are so absorbed in your own verbal drive and her admiration of it that you do not notice the fact. Neither does she; anyone must know that, for not once does she remove her absorbed gaze from your face. No, she doesn't notice the mud; but a person who is behind will observe that, without the lowering of a glance or the flutter of an eyelash, the hand on the side away from you steals around and gathers up the skirts. And all of the time you would be willing to take your oath that her mind and soul were in rapt communion with your own.

"Would a man be able to perform this double mental gymnastic feat? Not on your life! He would be compelled to stop the procession when the mud was reached and devote not less than five minutes to tucking up his skirts, if he wore them, and after that it would be a shame to walk before him, and as for looking south, nothing could look less so.

"You may claim that this does not prove woman's mental superiority, inasmuch as it is merely a matter of training, but I insist that it is nothing of the kind. You might keep a man in skirts through all of his life, and at the end of it he still would adjust them as if he were a lobster trying to denude himself of his shell. No, it is a phase of mental development which man never may hope to attain, a tribute to woman's acrobatic mental superiority; another phase of that intellectual force which enables woman to do without a pocket, when man would pine and dwindle away with less than thirteen. Come down to the corner, and we will think about it."

I said I was too busy.

The Press to Young Baron Rothschild.

"I do not speak to the press,"—Young Baron Rothschild to a reporter.

Then, sans your leave, the Press will speak to you.

Will I strive to pierce your coat of tawdry gilt.

Expose your rank pretence to public view,
And leave your self-conceit to fade and wilt.
You speak not to the press, poor, shallow snob!

True, ciphers all alone speak not, my lad,
And your one claim to count, which none would rob,

Is that, by chance, a shrewd grandsire you had.

A shrewd grandsire, which nothing proves at all.

Since fools have come of somewhat able stock.

And lines of lineage, both great and small,
A simpering simoleon may somewhere block.

And yet you speak not to the press, you say.

The reason's clear—or so it seems to me—
You fear we may know you by your brae.

We need it not while we your ears can see.

When You Praise a Good Fellow.

When you know a good fellow who goes to the front

In almost miraculous way,
Some chap with a style that is pleasant though blunt

Who wins in the heat of the fray;
When you hear the great crowd,

And its voices are blent
In a roar that is loud

And a cheer that is meant,
Then you join—do you not?—in the mighty applause,

And thus admiration express,
But, say, do you ne'er to yourself add the clause,

"He isn't so many, I guess?"

Oh, your hat, it is high in the air, with the rest,

And singing his praise is no task,
But you add—do you not?—"If that is his best,

A show is just all that I ask."

You are largely in view
While swelling his praise,

But Self adds, "You, too,
Are entitled to bays."

As credit he merits, you give it, but, oh,
Self whispers, addenda away.

Now, kindly don't ask me how 'tis that I know.

I know, but I'd sooner not say.

Not Ben King's Poem.

The usually well informed Santa Cruz News makes a curious mistake in attributing to Ben King the authorship of the beautiful poem "If I Should Die To-night," which it publishes in full, at the same time relating that he recited it at a banquet the night before his death. This sounds pretty in the telling, but what Ben King wrote was a parody on the poem—which, by the way, was published in The California Weekly last week—and, absurdly funny as that parody is, it would not add much to the grace of any deceased. The original poem is very sweet, and, if King were alive, none would be quicker than he to disclaim its authorship.

A Timely Epitaph.

(Since the recent nominee of the Independence League for the presidency has announced the demise of that alleged political party I have been waiting for someone to write its epitaph. As no one has done so, the following tear-stained effusion is respectfully submitted.)

Here lies—but 'e'en in life it did the same—
The wierd What-Is-It of the party fray,
The candle lighted at our Willie's flame—

He blew too hard, and so it passed away.

Pause, stranger, pause, and drop a scalding tear;

Pause and reflect, the while you moan and sob.

It might have lived all laws of sense to queer,
But have nursed Willie overbid his job.

Weep, stranger, weep! The one who lieth here

Lived two bright years devoid of care and doubt;

In any sense his Willie found him dear.

Now, low he lies—alas! the pae gave out.

Just Think of It!

Our Teddy's "bwanno tumbo,"

The Africans said, and laughed,

They meant he's "portly master,"

But think of the disaster,

The wreck of verbal plaster,

If they should mention Taft.

Undoubtedly Guilty.

"He was arrested for stealing."

"Suppose he is guilty?"

"No, a doubt of it. He practically admitted it to me."

"What did he say?"

"Said he didn't have a cent to pay a lawyer."

MEN WHO DO THINGS

ISIDOR JACOBS.

One of the most active men in forwarding the cause of good government and clean business is Isidor Jacobs, of San Francisco. He is a man who has had time both to make money and to engage aggressively in a score of good movements for public improvement.

Mr. Jacobs is a native of San Francisco, born August 4, 1860. In business he is the president of the California Canneries Company, of San Francisco, and of the Napa Canning Company, of Napa.

In 1894 Mr. Jacobs organized the Traffic Association of California, which resulted in breaking up the Transcontinental Association and afforded a chance to relieve San Francisco, and the state at large, from the burdensome monopoly of the Southern Pacific by giving the Santa Fe an entrance into the San Joaquin valley and into San Francisco.

In 1895 he organized the California Canned Goods Association, which sought to make a uniform standard for California canned fruits.

After the disaster of 1906, Mr. Jacobs organized the Potrero Commercial and Manufacturers' Association, which resulted in bringing about interchange switching by the railroads throughout California, saving to shippers millions of dollars a year. He was also among the first to begin the work for large bond issues for the permanent development of harbor improvements.

In 1907, recognizing the chaotic condition of affairs in San Francisco, and the necessity for uniting the decent citizens to elect good public officials, he organized the Good Government League, which succeeded that fall in electing thirty-one out of thirty-two city officials, thus advertising to the world that San Francisco proposed to vindicate her civic reputation.

In May, 1907, Mr. Jacobs organized the Civic League to bring about industrial peace in San Francisco and the state. The city was then torn by industrial strife, and nearly 50,000 men were on strike or about to go on strike. The League brought about a combination with the best of the labor leaders, headed by Walter MacArthur, John W. Sweeney, Will J. French, Andrew Furuseth, and others, and in six weeks the joint committee succeeded in settling the strike of the Metal Trades workers, putting about 20,000 men back to work and securing for them an industrial agreement under which they are now working satisfactorily and which has secured for them a shorter day.

The joint committee also brought about a settlement of the Laundry Workers' strike on terms mutually satisfactory, thus putting several thousand operatives back to work. During all the activities of the committee Mr. Jacobs worked night and day as its secretary, in the interests of industrial peace.

The committee also attempted to settle the street-car strike, and succeeded to the extent of harmonizing all the labor leaders save one, P. H. McCarthy, whose active interference led to the disruption of the peace movement. The strike continued and the laborers lost.

Mr. Jacobs then organized the first industrial peace conference ever held on the Pacific Coast. It was largely attended, and during the four days of its session, three members of President Roosevelt's cabinet addressed it.

He was also one of the organizers of the People's Legislative Bureau, and of the People's Lobby, two organizations to whose vigilance at the last session of the legislature the people of California owe much for legislation they killed and for good measures they backed. The People's Lobby is now actively organizing all over the state, and promises to be a potent factor for good at the next session of the legislature.

In 1908, recognizing the evil results of freight rebating and the injury being done to various industries in the state by the practice, Mr. Jacobs organized the California Traffic Association, which began before the State Board of Railroad Commissioners an investigation that proved that the railroads had a general system of rebates and had no stable freight rates. This investigation did much to remedy a vicious practice of years.

In an allied movement, he has endeavored to get the United States government to establish a steamship line to Panama along the Pacific Coast, similar to that maintained by the government on the Atlantic, for the purpose of affording competition to the railroads on transcontinental freights. As a result of his efforts the Merchants Exchange has been drawn into the fight, and a bill has been prepared for introduction at the next session of Congress to bring about this legislation.

Mr. Jacobs is vice-president of the Cannery's League of California, chairman of the People's Legislative Bureau of California, a member of the board of directors of the People's Lobby, a member of the executive committee of the Good Government League of San Francisco, and chairman of that league's campaign committee for the coming campaign. He is a member of the board of councillors of the American Institute of Civics, a member of the Chamber of Commerce and of the Merchants' Association of San Francisco, and of the California Promotion Committee.

He has done good work. By his aggressiveness he has "stirred up" more issues for the public welfare than almost any other man in San Francisco. By his sagacity he has done invaluable service in directing reform movements into effective channels. The enthusiasm of his interest in public affairs, as well as his fearlessness in jeopardizing his business for the sake of standing right as he sees it, are models of good citizenship.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Berkeley For a time it seemed that the forces of good government in Berkeley had exhausted themselves in their fight for mayor, happily settled at the preliminary election, and that the election of Saturday last might be lost through inertia or that dreaded apathy which paralyzes so many good efforts looking to civic righteousness. It wasn't so. The citizens of Berkeley stood steadfast and rolled up good majorities for the good government candidates. Berkeley has an opportunity to furnish an object lesson to all the other cities of the state and it will not be safe for any officeholder to allow his traces to slacken in the belief that the public will not notice it. Everybody will be looking.

Medical Inspection It is to be hoped that Of School Children Oakland will find ways and means for securing the services of an expert medical examiner for school children, with a few visiting nurses thrown in. In this beneficent service Greater New York has set an example for the nation and Los Angeles for the state. For, let it not be overlooked, efficiency is as important in public school work, if money is not to be wasted, as in any other department of public business, and there cannot be such efficiency with as many as 25 per cent. of the pupils unfitted, through adolescent growths, bad teeth, bad eyes and lack of nutrition to do good work. If every school child could be inspected, and the inspection could be made scientific and not political, no greater boon could befall the coming generation. Wherever such a service has been attempted, and has failed of making good, it has been because politics entered in to corrupt it and reduced to a farce what, otherwise, would have proven of highest value.

Would It Not Suppose that the failure of Jar Them Some? the graft prosecution to imprison, predicted by many whose wish for failure is doubtless father to the thought, were to so arouse the indignation of the Men of California as to cause them to insist upon making Francis J. Heney governor of California, as the Men of Missouri did make Joseph W. Folk governor of their state; and suppose that this same indignation were to prompt the sending up to Sacramento of a free and intelligent legislature, truly representative of an aroused California manhood, would not the double-headed event jar some of the "powers that be"? What splendid results might not follow such a revolution! How readily the criminal procedures might be remodeled! With what certainty might we not look forward to the selection and election, in future, of judges of liberal minds and unquestioned independence of corporate domination! Would that not be a shake-up worth experiencing?

A Good Thing Spain is about the last country Out of Spain to which anyone would think of looking for a long stride toward political reform, yet Spain is the one country, so far as it concerns the Watchman, who has made voting compulsory. Judges, notaries, priests, and men over seventy years old, are excused. All others qualified to vote must vote or be substantially punished, either by increasing taxes 2 per cent., decreasing an official salary 1 per cent., or, if one persists in refusal to vote at elections, he is denied the right to hold any official position of honor or emolument. Compulsory voting is as certain to come as neglect of civic duties is to continue a source of civic harm. Hurrah for Spain!

Stockton's Election The recent city election in Stockton fully explained elsewhere in this paper, is of more importance to the general public than might appear to the casual observer. It proved first that the "organization" politician is at heart a moral and political coward and can always be defeated if forced into the open. It shows also that, despite the assurances of the Model License League advocates, the breweries and wholesale liquor interests can be counted on to fight any liquor restrictive measure wherever there is a good likelihood of defeating such a measure. Finally, it shows that party politics in municipal affairs is "how not to do it." Party responsibility in such cases spells moral irresponsibility. The victory of the Democratic organization in Stockton was well deserved. It made common cause with the Devil and all his angels for the sake of office and a wide-open Sunday, and did it openly and above board. This was in splendid contrast with the Republican organization which toyed with both devils and angels but, as it neither fished nor cut bait, was properly left sticking in the mud. However, Stockton has more than a dozen hundred of freemen ready and willing to stand up and fight and these men will yet make Stockton a free city. The issue was of much less importance than the way it was met.

Those Bad The protectionist apologists for Retailers high prices, including our own Senator Flint, have had the sagacity to charge extortion upon the retailers. There is some color for the charge. Betwixt the manufacturer and the consumer there is a thick streak of fat, but it is not all of the retailer's larding. In innumerable instances the retailer's profit is fixed for him by the manufacturer, who has not only effected a combination efficient to sustain an extortionate wholesale price, but he has carried the force of that combination to the logical conclusion and fixed also the price at which all retailers must sell or cease to handle the goods. While the consumer is treated without mercy it is mainly the combination over-lord who holds the whip with which he reaches the consumer over the shoulders of the man behind the counter.

What Did the When Emperor Aldrich de- Platform Say? clared that the Republican Party had made no promise to revise the tariff downward he was strictly within the truth. On the other hand the text of the platform distinctly connotes a tendency to revise upward for, for the first time in its history, the party of protection declared for a reasonable profit for manufacturers in addition to a compensation for differences in wages at home and abroad. It was a bad platform and by common consent was kicked out of sight as soon as possible. No candidate made a campaign for office on it. Mr. Taft did not. The people expected a revision downward, and a revision downward they will sometime have, but it was not so nominated in that bond. The most useful function of that platform was to save Emperor Aldrich's face.

George Newhall A new Republican candidate Possible Mayor for mayor is being discussed in San Francisco. This is George Newhall, the vice-president of the Chamber of Commerce. Mr. Newhall made an excellent record as police commissioner, and he is expected to be able to make a strong run if nominated. If he does run, his sponsor will be the Municipal League of Independent Republican Clubs. As this is written, considerable doubt is being expressed as to the likelihood of James Rolph, Jr., being willing to try for the position.

Good Government One of the strongest League Big Factor factors in the campaign is likely to be the Good Government League, which has 16,000 names on its rolls, and is growing daily in influence. The League is playing a waiting game, and will take no hand in the campaign until after the primaries. It will then canvass the men whom the parties have nominated and will endorse those it believes in, and, where none that are satisfactory have been nominated, will nominate, itself, by petition. It thus promises to hold the balance of power, and is likely to be the deciding influence in the election next fall.

Heney Not a It is pretty well known that Candidate Francis J. Heney will not accept any nomination for office in San Francisco. The problem thus arises of choosing a man who will continue the graft prosecutions as they have been handled heretofore. William J. Hanley's name is still used in this connection, and has much support. A new figure in the possibilities is that of J. J. Dwyer, whom many believe to have the knowledge and the courage for the place.

League Looking And speaking of graft For Grafters prosecutions and the Good Government League it is interesting to know that the League believes grafting is being done somewhere in the municipal work, and its investigation of the Board of Works is only part of a comprehensive effort to locate it. The importance of nipping it now lies in the fact that proposed bond issues will place vast sums of money in the way of the grafters, whoever they are, and the lesson is needed now to weed them out.

McCarthy's In Labor politics the McCarthy Fiasco fiasco with the Call libel suit has stirred up confusion. McCarthy's prestige has been deeply impaired, and Sullivan is looming larger upon the horizon as a possible Labor nominee. Mulerey has become active again in his mayoralty hopes. Tom Finn, the versatile saloonman, is looking again toward the Republican ranks, but is a little discouraged by Herri's departure for Europe. Cleveland Dam has lost caste to a large degree with McCarthy, and Harry Flannery is jocosely believed to be training for legal adviser to succeed Cleveland Dam. And the members of the Building Trades Council are worried mainly to know who will have to foot the bills for McCarthy's libel suit.

Gen. "Jim" There is some talk of the Democrats running General "Jim" Smith, who is returning from the Philippines after five years' absence. There is general approval of his name on the question of character, but considerable doubt of availability of a man who has been so long out of touch with local affairs. His age is also counted against him. Most people believe that the necessity of the occasion demands a young man of aggressive qualities for the place. McNab, by the way, is clinging to Leland, in the hope that the other parties will make enough mistakes of judgment and choice to give his candidate a chance.

cate and vote for another special election for that purpose and to carry out the wishes of the people whichever way expressed.

So the campaign was on and it hinged entirely on resubmission. The Democrats were for resubmission, the Good Government League against and the Republicans neither for nor against—or both. An attempt had been made to reach an agreement whereby the same men should be nominated for school trustees on the three tickets, but it came to naught, as the Democratic and Republican managers were willing to agree as between themselves on nominees for the school board, but denied the right of the Good Government League to be considered.

It became obvious early in the campaign that the Republican and Democratic bosses were in harmony with each other and also the saloons in at least one particular, and that was deep hatred for and resentment toward the Good Government League. Unavoidably another issue crept into the campaign, namely, non-partisanship in city affairs and the dyed-in-the-wool party men bitterly denounced the third ticket. It was urged by the Republicans that it was an attempt to split the Republican party. The Good Government ticket was strictly non-partisan, three of the four nominees for councilmen being Democrats.

The Good Government League made an active, open fight, holding three mass meetings at Masonic hall, the largest hall in the city, packing it on each occasion. The old parties held no meetings but worked quietly. Little was heard on the streets concerning the terms Republican or Democrat. A man was either for or against the Good Government ticket.

The first discouraging factor encountered by the Good Government League was an official opinion of the district attorney and city attorney, concurred in, it was understood, by two superior judges, that a man could register at any time and on presentation of a certificate from the county clerk, was entitled to vote. Heretofore the great register had closed several days in advance of the election, pursuant to the state law. The district attorney and the city officials held that the charter governed in city elections and was supreme over the state law. Section 9 of the charter provides: "Only such persons residing in the city whose names appear upon the great register of San Joaquin county at the time of any municipal election, shall be entitled to vote at such election." This section the officials construed to mean: "Any qualified elector who has registered with the county clerk of San Joaquin county at any time previous to the time that he offers to vote may vote at said election. The registration for the municipal election does not close before election day, as provided for in state and county elections."

With the bars thus let down six hundred men were registered between the 23d of April, the date of the closing of the printed register by the county clerk, and May 18th, the day of the election, many voting before the ink was dry on their certificates.

Four nights in advance of the election the Royal Arch held what it openly advertised as an "independent meeting." After the lodge session proper of the Royal Arch closed, it was decided by the saloon men to endorse the full Democratic ticket and a committee was appointed to pass the word "down the line" and collect a fund for election day. The Republican managers were dismayed at this action and endeavored to have it changed, but were unsuccessful. The Royal Arch had obviously accepted the Democratic bid as going the Republicans one better. The Republicans had apparently banked on getting at least a share of saloon support, and when they saw that they were not to get this, and becoming frightened at the public showing of strength which the League was making, and desiring first and foremost to make certain the defeat of the League, there was a scramble on the part of many of the camp followers of the Republican party towards the Democratic bandwagon.

The saloon politicians were adroit campaigners. They had spread several false whispers and were in a good position to do this quietly and effectively through their 101 dispensaries. To the Catholic, they said it was an A. P. A. movement. To the men owing money, they said it meant prohibition. To the man of liberal ideas, they said it meant closing the town tight, even stopping Sunday baseball. To the non-church goer, they said it was just a lot of preachers.

Well, the day of election came and the Good Government League went to the hat against: The machines of the two old parties. Democratic and Republican fusion.

One hundred and one saloons. The tenderloin and the gamblers.

The big local brewery which employs a large force of men.

All of the restaurants (the sale of liquor on Sundays being prohibited in restaurants as well as in saloons).

The federal, state and county official brigades.

Six hundred floaters, registered by the saloons and their followers.

The public service corporations.

The control of the police and fire departments.

The big street contractors.

The grape growers.

And the Good Government League was gloriously beaten, the Democrats making a clean sweep. The average Democratic vote was 2,349; Good Government, 1,255; Republican, 959. The election does not decide the question of Sunday opening or closing. That requires another election. It simply means that the saloons be given another chance at a straw vote. What the outcome of another election on Sunday closing will be remains to be seen. The vote this time is no reliable index of what it would be on the straight issue of closing or opening, divorced from politics and the personalities of candidates.

But the election served to demonstrate some things. It shows that there are 1,255 voters in the community who are brave enough to stand out in the open, to place principle above party, to resist all pressure and influence and who stand as solid phalanx for decency and non-partisanship in municipal affairs. THE EUCALYPTS IN CALIFORNIA

III. PRODUCING AND PLANTING TREES

Written for The California Weekly by GEORGE W. PEAVY, United States Forest Service

When once the prospective eucalyptus planter has definitely selected upon a location, having determined that the temperature, moisture, and soil elements are correct for the species which he wishes to plant, the next step is to procure suitable seedling stock for planting. Considerable mystery has, for various reasons, shrouded the growing of eucalyptus plants, but it is safe to say that any person with sufficient resourcefulness to grow the ordinary tomato and cabbage plants in the garden can produce eucalyptus plants in sufficient numbers for small plantations. This does not mean, of course, that the skill of the nurseryman is to be discarded or that it may not often be expedient to go to the expert when an extra large amount of nursery stock is required for putting out large plantations.

Naturally, the little eucalypt grows under the shade of the parent tree and, as a result of forest conditions, endures considerable shade. From this fact the conclusion has been drawn that shading in some form is necessary for the eucalyptus nursery, and seedlings have usually been propagated under lath houses or shade screens of some kind. At the present time, however, some of the most progressive nurserymen in the state have abandoned the shade idea and are growing the seedlings in open beds.

The Seed.

Usually the best method of obtaining eucalyptus seed is to purchase it from some reliable dealer, for the reason that seeds of different species is very similar in appearance, and it is very important to obtain it true to name. Otherwise, after several years, the planter may find himself with an undesirable or valueless species planted out, with the consequent loss of time, money, and the use of the land covered by the plantation. Where well-known species exist, seed can be collected by cutting the seed cases from the low hanging branches of open grown trees or from young seed bearing trees. The seed cases should be placed upon canvas and exposed to the heat of the sun until they begin to discharge the seed. Then they can be placed in tight sacks and vigorously shaken. By this method a large amount of seed can be quickly and cheaply gathered.

The usual price of the common species at the dealers ranges from $4 to $8 per pound. One pound of fairly fertile seed should, with proper handling, produce 10,000 seedlings ready for planting in the field. Under favorable conditions, an inexperienced person can gather a pound of seed in two or three days.

The Nursery.

The eucalyptus nursery should be situated in some place where there is a good circulation of air and a good surface and subsoil drainage. The soil for the nursery beds should be composed of sand or sandy loam. A good mixture for nursery purposes is made up of three parts of brook sand and one part of rich loam. Some nurserymen still sow the seed in shallow boxes or flats, as they are called, for the purpose of checking the development of the tap root, but since the seedlings should be transplanted before they have made any considerable root development, this expedient is not necessary unless, as is sometimes done, it is proposed to weed out the surplus seedlings and leave the desired number in the flat until field planting time.

If the area which can be devoted to seed beds is comparatively great, as is usually the case when a moderate number of seedlings are to be produced, the seed should be sown thin enough to produce about 100 seedlings to the square foot, but if extensive operations are proposed and intensive nursery practice is desired, the seed may be sown thickly enough to produce from 400 to 500 seedlings per square foot. The seed should be covered with sand to a depth of one-fourth inch.

The Season for Sowing.

The common blue gum, E. globulus, makes a much more rapid growth from the seed than other species, consequently, the seed should be sown later than the slower growing species, taking it for granted that all species are to be planted in the field at the same time. As a general rule, in those situations which are not liable to severe frosts, planting should be done as early as possible in the fall after the first soaking rains. If it is planned then to plant early in January, the blue gum seedlings will usually make sufficient growth so they are planted early in July. Other species should be sown a month or six weeks earlier in order to insure satisfactory plant stock.

There is no advantage in attempting to plant large stock. In fact, within certain limits, a large tree is much less liable to grow than a very small one, since the larger one has a comparatively well developed root system which suffers to a greater degree in transplanting than the smaller one. The best results have been obtained from planting seedlings from five to eight inches in height.

The seeds will germinate in from four to ten days, according to temperature. During the period of germination, great care should be taken to keep the seedbed surface moist but water in excessive amounts should not be applied. A piece of loosely woven burlap laid over the surface of the seedbeds will be found to be of great assistance in maintaining proper moisture conditions during this period. It should be removed as soon as the little plants begin to break the soil surface.

Care of the Seedlings.

During the early stages of the seedling growth, the plants should be watered very carefully for the reason that they are subject to a disease called "damping off." This disease attacks the plants at the surface of the soil and the first intimation that it is present appears in the wilting and falling over of numbers of the seedlings. As soon as this condition is observed, all watering should be stopped and the surface of the seedbeds should be sprinkled with dry sand. Occasionally, during the hot dry winds, the surface soil is dried and the little plants begin to dry from drought, a condition which must not be confused with damping off.

For the purpose of checking the development of the root system and of getting the plants in suitable shape for putting out in the field, the seedlings should be transplanted to the flats when they are from one to two inches high. A convenient size for a flat is eighteen by twenty-four inches and four inches deep. Good loam soil should be used. About 150 seedlings can be transplanted to a flat of this size. Practically the same care should be taken of the seedlings while they are in the flats as was given them while they were in the seedbeds.

Field Planting. Spacing.

If the prospective eucalyptus plantation is to be placed upon tillable land, the soil should be prepared for planting with much the same care that is given to getting soil ready for any agricultural crop. Heavy adobe soils should be averted from, and a deep, loose soil is best. In nearly all cases it will be found advisable to plow the land in the spring and leave it fallow until the next planting season.

There is considerable diversity of opinion concerning the proper distance at which to place the trees in the plantation. Some insist on close spacing while others believe that the best results are obtained by planting as wide as twelve by twelve feet or even more. The width of spacing, however, is a matter which depends upon the quality of the soil, the degree of moisture, and the nature of the material which it is desired to produce. In poor soil or in dry situations, the spacing should be comparatively close in order to secure as soon as possible shade enough to protect the soil, and thus prevent rapid evaporation of the soil moisture. Where moisture can be applied by irrigation or where cultivation is possible or desirable, a wider spacing may be employed. With most of the rapid growing species, under favorable conditions, cultivation will not be possible much after the third season unless the trees have been planted more than ten or twelve feet apart.

Those trees which tend to develop a crooked trunk should be planted close so that there will be no room for the development of lateral branches and the main stem will be forced to grow upright. This method of treatment should be employed wherever the common red gum is planted, since this tree has a very bad habit of developing a crooked or forked stem. The general tendency of the blue gum under anything like favorable conditions is to develop a straight trunk so that very close planting for the purpose of securing a straight pole is not necessary for this species.

It is commonly supposed that height growth can be stimulated by very close spacing. This idea doubtless arose from the fact that trees in close plantations have very straight trunks, are clear of lateral branches, and in appearance seem to have grown much more rapidly in height than they would have done had they been planted in the open. It will be found, however, that such eucalypts as the blue gum and the sugar gum will make practically the same height growth whether planted in windbreak form or quite alone as they will if placed in forest form. It is very certain that too close spacing will have the effect of injuring rather than stimulating height growth. In actual practice, the forester often plants trees closely for the purpose of producing a windbreak, and then stimulates diameter growth by thinning out a large part of the plantation, thus giving the individual trees more light and a greater measure of the available soil and moisture.

Owing to the very rapid growth of the trees and the production of lateral branches, it is seldom advisable to attempt to fill in fall places on a plantation for the reason that the older trees are very apt to suppress the smaller ones by shading.

Care of the Plantation. Fire.

During the first two or three years of the life of a commercial plantation, it will be found as much a matter of financial consideration to give the trees good care as it is to bestow attention upon a walnut or citrus orchard, and exactly the same reasons exist for cultivating the one as the other. Of course, if irrigation is possible to supplement cultivation for the purpose of producing proper moisture conditions, much better results can be produced.

The greatest enemy of the artificial as well as the natural forest in California is fire. Plantations of eucalypts are especially liable to the ravages of fire for the reason that the leaves and twigs are exceptionally inflammable. Since the bark of even mature trees is comparatively thin, a very moderate fire may kill them. As soon as the branches of the young trees close in, thus rendering further cultivation impossible, the plantation should be protected by an outside fire lane twenty to thirty feet wide. This lane should be cultivated frequently enough during the dry season to keep it clear of any form of inflammable material. If the plantation is a large one, it should be divided into blocks of forty acres, each separated by fire lanes at least twenty feet in width. These lanes will serve, in the later history of the plantation, as roads on which to haul the product to the mill or market. The fire devoted to the fire lanes is not a total loss, for the reason that the trees bordering it will develop a much larger diameter than those in the interior of the plantation.

The litter coming from the twigs and leaves of the trees should never be voluntarily removed by fire or otherwise. It forms a

"GOOD NIGHT."

EIGHT o'clock, and the younger children were all in bed. Only Jamie, the second born, nine years old, was allowed to stay up a bit longer. The mother came in from the kitchen and trimmed the wick of the coal-oil lamp, which flickered and smoked and threw weird shadows across the rag-carpeted floor and up the sombre walls. The father came in from the woodshed with a basket of chips.

"Gettin' chill, mother. We'll have a bit o' fire. Jamie, run get a piece of paper for kindlin'." Not that, I'm savin' that. That's better. So!"

And the flame roared as the chimney caught the draught and sucked upward. The mother drew a chair to the table by the lamp and took up her knitting. The chair was straight and she sat very erect in it, not touching the draught tightly back. Her gray eyes looked steadily through the steel-rimmed spectacles; and the quiet mouth was set firmly. Her hands moved deftly at the needles.

The father was a huge man, ten years older, with grizzled hair and beard and black eyes that burned deep in their sockets. He pulled his heavy boots off with a jack and set them behind the stove, thrusting his feet into carpet slippers. Jamie's knees clasped the stove, around which he peered with wild eyes.

"Paw, Abner Burn's Jersey's got a calf."
"So? Bull or heifer?"
"Bull. Maw, can I go t' the Methodist picnic next Saturday? Bud Hess's maw said he could go. They're goin' to Big Lick. C'n I go?"

"Ask your father, sonny."

"I c'n go, can't I, paw?"
"I don't mind if your mother don't."

"I don't mind."

"All right, then. You may go."

"I c'n I wear my other suit, maw?"

"You'll get all soiled and it won't be fit to wear to Sunday school."

"I'll be careful. Sure I will. All the fellows 're goin' to wear their other clothes. Please!"

"All right, son."

"Please, maw."

"I'll see."

"Time you're in bed, Jimmie," put in the father. "Run now."

"Lemme get warm first, paw."

"You're warm enough. Soot!"

Jamie went over to his mother. She dropped her hands in her lap and kissed him good-night.

"G'd night, maw."

"Good night, sonny. Sleep tight."

"G'd night, paw."

"Night, son."

Jamie lingered at the door. His father looked up, the mother glanced at him with gentle reproof in her eyes.

"Good night!"

The father poured the last of the chips in the stove, opened the draught wide, and settled back in his chair. The needles clicked swiftly.

"Have you heard from the boy yet, mother?"

The needles flew swifter, but her lip quivered a moment before she replied.

"Not yet, John."

They sat so in silence for a half hour. The father rose and wound the hall clock and shot the bolt in the front door. Coming back in the room, he took from the table the family book. The mother laid her knitting and spectacles away and dropped her hands in her lap. The father opened the book, and drawing nearer the light, read a chapter from the New Testament and one of the Book of Psalms. Together they kneeled, the mother's lips moving silently while the man's strong voice was lifted up in simple eloquence of prayer to God, of thanksgiving for his mercies, of supplication for forgiveness, and of appeal that his loving kindness should follow one lost sheep they loved and bring him back to them safe and repentant. Silently they rose, the father taking the lamp in his hand and leading the way to the stairs. A familiar step creaked as each passed over it. The wooden shutters rattled as the father drew them close, and bars of light sifted through the darkness without. The light winked out and the bed groaned as the man's weight stretched upon it. The town was asleep. Silence rose like a mist and enveloped the house. In the hall the clock ticked.

THE LITTLE FUNERAL.

THE Stranger in Town was disconsolate. It would be well after dark before the overland would pick him up from this, to his eyes, desolate prairie village, and speed him on to the throbbing world of cities and lights and men. And it was only one o'clock. He had eaten his dinner at the unspeakable hotel, brushing persistent flies from his food, stilling his nostrils as best he could against the more persistent odors of the kitchen, perfunctorily answering the amiable inanities of the country waitress, and fleeing at last the garbology of the ancient landlord.

As he gazed up and down the street outside, the perspective of either end was lost in the uninspired flat prairie, where, mile after mile, the Indian corn nodded fatuously in the Indian summer calm. A woman in a calico dress and blue sunbonnet crossed from the store opposite, entered her yard, and disappeared. No one else was in sight. One lazy dog drowsed at the foot of a poplar tree, stretched, yawned, snapped at a fallen leaf, and drowsed again. The Stranger in Town sighed hopelessly.

He strolled down the uncurbed street. Everything appeared deserted. Only a cobbler's shop, with door opened to the street, seemed occupied. He crossed; and accosted the cobbler, bending over a last.

"Good day," he began.

"Howdy," he replied, his mouth full of tacks.

"How's business?" inquired the Stranger in Town.

"Such as you see," without looking up.

The Stranger in Town counted five shoes half-soled, ten more to be mended.

"You seem to be busy enough." He looked outside, and added, "And the only person in town who has to work."

"Early and late. Early and late," the cobbler replied in a sing-song monotone. The Stranger in Town eyed the cobbler curiously. He noted the massive, stooped shoulders, strong arms and hands and shrivelled legs, the gray hair and the near-sighted eyes of the typical mender of shoes.

"You've a good deal of work for such a small town. There can't be five hundred people all told here, can there?"

"Don't know," said the cobbler as he drew a deft line round the shoe with his knife and cut out a new sole.

"Oh, I see, you haven't been here long."

"Fifty-one years."

"Why, you aren't much older than that."

"Born here, and I pierced the holes for the thread."

"Well, this place is about the same size as Chicago. How many has it?"

"Never there, couldn't say."

"Never there! Three miles away, and never there?"

"Said it. Said it, I said."

"May I ask whereabouts in the town you were born?"

"Next room."

"Lived in this house all your life?"

"This room."

"Cobbler, always?"

"Always," and the thread knitted swiftly from hole to hole.

The Stranger in Town sighed again. He strolled outside and looked up and down the empty street. From his new point of vantage he saw at the farther end on the right a frame church, with a square cupola surmounting it. An old man appeared round the corner, opened the church door and went in. The bell began to toll. A man in clerical black left the house next door, a black book in his hand, and entered the church. A white hearse, with white plumes, drawn by white horses, drove slowly up the street. The two men on the seat carried its burden indoors. Plow horses drew buggies to the door, stopped, and heavy, slow women in black dismounted and climbed the church steps. A puff of wind lifted the dust kicked up by the horses, swirled it across the street, and died down.

The Stranger in Town leaned his back to the cobbler's door and watched. In a half hour the doors opened. The bell began again to toll. The men in black bore their burden outside, the minister following, the women following him. The white horses moved down the street, and the buggies fell in sedately behind. At the end of the street the procession turned, leaving the prairie horizon unbroken. The bell ceased tolling, the dust settled, and the dog, who had howled all the while the bell tolled, turned idly again to sleep.

The Stranger in Town turned again to the cobbler, who had begun on another shoe. The thread flew faster than before, as the cobbler bent closer to his last.

"Such a little funeral," said the Stranger in Town.

The cobbler nodded and reached for his wax.

"A child, I judge from the white. Do you know whose it was?"

The cobbler nodded again, and cut the last stitch.

"Whose?" inquired the Stranger in Town.

The cobbler's hands rested flat on his knees as he started at the question. Naturally the head reached for another shoe and bent his head again to his last.

"Mine."

THE DETEKTIVE.

THE chase had led past the big cottonwood, over the fence, around the west pasture, and back through the home orchard to the barn. Forty acres and four boys. The game was "the Younger Brothers." Two of the boys played the desperadoes and two were the sheriff's posse. There had been a free fight earlier in the afternoon, because all of them wanted to be the desperadoes and none the sheriff. Naturally the two smallest boys were the posse, as a result, and of course the pursuit was fruitless.

They all settled, panting, behind the barn. The postmortem was held, and everybody explained his mistakes and pointed out his own winning. The diversion lagged. They had made the cats swim in the pond, had ridden the calf in the barnyard, had eaten all the green apples they could hold. What next?

"Git out Nick Carter."

Done.

The oldest boy read.

"The detective did not wait to hear any more. He thought he saw in her expression a determination to kill Jimmy anyway; he thought she was only playing with him, and he began cautiously to steal toward."

The soft velvet rug on the floor gave back no sound. There was not, is not, a creaky board in Nick Carter's house. There is not a hinge that gives forth a sound or a creak.

"He pushed open the door just enough to permit him to enter; then he—"

Swish! Ouch!

The "detective" had come. Johnny's father, with a hickory switch, stood alone by the barn, and a rapidly receding wave in the orchard grass of the east yard showed the direction of flight of the Younger brothers and the sheriff's posse.

FIRST MORTGAGES

On desirable, improved, inside business and residence property in Oakland pay

6 to 8 Per Cent Net

according to amount; small loans of $500 to $1,000 bearing the highest rates, and those of, say, $15,000 and upwards, bearing the lowest of six per cent.

I have some mortgages on hand now for sale on that basis, besides several applications for new loans on the same terms.

Did you ever stop to consider the advantages offered by a loan like this where you are sole master of the situation so far as this one investment is concerned, and for a lot of other reasons I can name? This is the strict class of investment known today.

The security is almost invariably double the amount of the loan and sometimes a good deal more. Mortgage, note, fire insurance policy and certificate of title go with each loan.

To complete a loan you can either come to my office and fill out the application or you can send the money to me, as you choose.

I personally inspect the security for every loan, examine all the papers in the transaction, select reliable fire insurance and title companies and collect and remit the interest to you every month or every quarter, as you like, without charge to you.

The borrower pays all expenses.

I have placed millions of dollars on these loans without a single loss or foreclosure.

I turn down lists of applications for loans because I am not personally satisfied with every detail. Those that I select, my clients I guarantee are all right in every way.

I invite closest investigation of my loans, my methods and myself.

The population of Oakland is 240,000 and growing fast; there is much of activity in building and other lines of development here, plenty of opening for capital, and, consequently, unlimited opportunity for the use of money.

Send for list of loans now on hand, and to facilitate matters please state in what amounts you want them. I'd like to write to you.

men cannot be tricked by the bosses, nor fooled by whispers and insinuations. They cannot be traded or fussed. They will not vote the Republican ticket at the primaries and ward meetings and the Democratic ticket on election day. A conclusive showing was also made of a fact which heretofore has only been alleged or suspected, namely, that a lot of men are masquerading as Republicans who help the Republican organization to control ward meetings and primaries, who go as delegates to Republican conventions and dictate its nominations and platforms and then on election day vote for only such portion of the Republican ticket as will best serve their ends. This has been done in Stockton for several years past but the proof was not clearly forthcoming until this time. Clearly and unmistakably has been revealed the subserviency of both old party machines to the liquor interests. All these facts are now of record, and it is such a record as will plague the saloon and the politicians and will render impotent in the future the old party call and the stereotyped appeal to party loyalty.

951-3 MONAGNOCK BUILDING

SOME CALIFORNIA PAINTINGS.

The last exhibition to be given in the Studio Building on Presidio avenue will close Sunday night, so that those who admire the fine work that local artists can do would do well to take advantage of the invitation to a free view of the paintings by Bruce Porter, Julie H. Heyneman, Clara Atwood, Emily Travis, Will Sparks, G. E. Piazzoni, and Xavier Martinez, and the portrait busts by Ralph Stockpole before the building is permanently closed.

Bruce Porter is represented by his mural painting to be placed in the First Unitarian church, at Franklin and Geary streets, as a memorial to the Rev. Horatio Stebbins, for many years minister to the church. The theme of the painting is a text beloved by Doctor Stebbins, "Lo, at length the true light." High on a peak ascending above other peaks, near to the clouds, three figures, heroic in size, represent the progressive perception of the truth, throughout the ages of the church—Moses, David, John the Evangelist. The two first are seated, the figure of Moses in the darkest tones, with face half averted, the figure of David in higher relief, full face, while the Evangelist stands, with uplifted face, as if advancing, in high relief in the foreground. The symbolism is admirably worked out to show the relative advance of the three toward the light. The drawing is firm and reliant. Of the color it is too soon to speak, as the finishing touches await the putting in place in the church where the lights may be judged.

Miss Heyneman has five portrait studies, a landscape, and a genre painting on exhibition. The portraits, especially the unnamed "Portrait of a Lady," "The Sailor" and "Carmen," are in bold vertical strokes reminiscent of Sargent's manner, impressionistic but full of life and character. The study of "An Old Peasant—Holland," and the portrait of "Mother and Child" are more subdued in manner and tone, as becomes their more appealing human quality. "The Dancing Class" we like less. But the landscape of "Early Evening in the Presidio" is full of the strength of repose, a real harmony of intelligent composition and poetic imagination that makes it cling in the memory.

Miss Travis's canvases are in a lighter mood and in gayer colors. "The Green Cloister" is a charming essay in bold splashes of yellow and green, full of sunlight. "The Misty Morning" and "Spring Landscape" catch the lavender tints of the haze that give the subjects their beauty. "At Vancouver" and "Winter Morning in the Northwest" are in the same mood. The surprise is enhanced, then, at noting the "Sketch at Bruges," a sombre little study in twilight tones in a very different key.

One of the very best things in the exhibition is Will Sparks' "Late Afternoon, Sonoma County," in which he has captured the difficult opaline tints of the sunset sky, and massed the dark tones of the landscape without losing the essential details. It is very quiet, very poetic, withal very sound workmanship. An appealing little canvas one would like to own. In very different mood is the painting beside it, the work of Miss Atwood, an English woman—"Billingsgate Fish Market, London," in boldly contrasted colors and intricate composition, impressionistic in the main but oddly literal at times, as in the carefully spelled-out sign in the foreground. But the life and the bustle are there, and the touch of modernity in the steel frame of the building.

The studio building is to be remodeled for some other use, and Miss Heyneman's lease will soon end. It is a pity, for some fifteen artists have found studios here in the last two years, and here have been held some of the most successful exhibitions in San Francisco, both artistically and financially successful. Miss Heyneman has let the studio to the artists who needed them most, instead of those who offered the most, and she has been justified and made happy by the financial success of her method. Her classes will be discontinued at some other address, when the building is closed, until her departure to Europe next fall. Her success should encourage someone to erect a new building where reasonable rents will permit our fine artists to continue their work under favorable conditions.

The Eleventh Amendment.

The federal power of the United States shall not be extended to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another state, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign state. Eleventh amendment to the constitution.

While this amendment was proposed as early as 1794 it was not adopted and made a part of the constitution until 1798, by which time the doctrine of state sovereignty had found many champions. It should be noted, too, that the adoption of this amendment signifies the first real change in the constitution. The ten amendments heretofore examined were additions to, not changes in, the constitution as adopted. This one marked a change of policy, at least from the wording of the constitution as it was.

If the reader will refer back to Section 2 of Article III he will find that, among the subjects which were to come within the jurisdiction of United States courts, suits "between a state and citizens of another state," are enumerated. During the campaign for adoption of the constitution Alexander Hamilton maintained that this provision carried with it the implication that the state itself must first signify its willingness to be made a party to the suit, but in 1798 the supreme court, in the case of Chisholm vs. Georgia, assumed jurisdiction without that state having given its consent and allowed the plaintiff to take default against the state. This aroused all the states to the truth that their dignity was in jeopardy and the result was the adoption of this amendment which deprives United States courts of jurisdiction in such cases. And yet the Supreme Court of the United States has held that where a state was a stockholder in a corporation it could be sued with the rest of the stockholders, but this was a five-to-four decision of the members of that court and not greatly relied on.

Sometimes states, by act of the legislature, permit suits to be brought for the adjustment of claims against such state. The constitution of California expressly authorizes the enactment of laws prescribing how such suits may be brought. However, the common practice in this state is to bring the claims to the legislature and that body approves and pays, or rejects and refuses to pay, such claims without the formality of a legal proceeding and very frequently with small regard to whether the claim be valid in law or equity or not. In fact our state supreme court has, in the profundity of its wisdom, decreed that a legislature may appropriate public money for the payment of a perfectly invalid, and even unconstitutional, claim against the state if, in so doing, it prudently refrains from telling upon what ground and for what reason the claim was ordered paid. In other words, any reason at all might prove a bad reason, while no reason at all would be held perfectly good, a shining example of the law being the perfection of human reason!

This eleventh amendment, while it has preserved the dignity of many states many times, and has prevented no end of clashing between state and nation, has had at least some melancholy and humiliating results. It has enabled a number of states to issue bonds, sell them and then refuse absolutely to redeem them. If the writer rightly recollects these were all southern states and the repudiated debts were contracted under carpetbag rule following the Civil War.

Those old enough to remember will not have forgotten that, after the close of the Civil War, many adventurous spirits from the North went South and, backed by the enfranchisement of the negroes in 1868, while many of the southern whites still lived under a deprivation of the franchise, by virtue of the fourteenth amendment, which we shall soon discuss, took practical control of the affairs of the states lately in rebellion. They began the work of rehabilitating those states, and, to that end, voted large bonded and other debts for the construction of roads, bridges, school houses and whatever else in the way of internal improvements they could think of. The purposes were usually praiseworthy, but there was graft in every contract and a steal in every expenditure. Good things were done but at a cost that would have brought the southern states to the verge of bankruptcy if they had sought to redeem such obligations.

Unfortunately, too, for the good name of the states of our union, these repudiated bonds were soon in the hands of perfectly innocent holders for value, very many of them living in Europe. These obligations should have been paid, if not in full because of inability, then on a basis of fair compromise, and they doubtless would have been but for the adoption, nearly three score-and-ten years before, of the eleventh amendment to the constitution.

JUST SUPPOSING.

(Editorial from the Fresno Republican.)

"Just suppose—

"That California elected Heney governor, as Missouri elected Folk;

"That Mr. Herrin's handy men, or anybody's handy men, wanted a job for some one; or that there was a vacancy on the supreme bench, and that some eminently 'safe' man was recommended by highly respectable 'interests'; or that the race-track gamblers refused to obey the law, as they did in Missouri; or that a legislature was muddled whether to pass a straight primary law or a warped one, or that a prison board, or a normal school board was doing politics, or that George Hutton wanted a pardon for some scawlaw who had properly favored him; or that there was a big labor crisis on, with its attendant obligation on the governor to enforce order without interfering in the class interest of either party; or that the attorney general had a chance to intervene or stay out of a graft case; or that the tax laws, or the criminal laws needed reforming; or that the power of corrupt political bosses needed breaking and the power of the people needed restoring—

"Just suppose these things.

"Does anybody need to wonder or doubt what would happen?

"And wouldn't it be a pretty good sort of a governor to have, and a pretty good sort of a state to live in?"

Hiehorn's Story of the Legislature.

Franklin Hiehorn's Story of the Legislative Session of 1909 will be published about the first of July, and its appearance is awaited with much interest by both those who know something of what the legislature did and those who know what Mr. Hiehorn can do. Perhaps there is no other man in the state so well adapted to make a complete revelation of legislative action and the causes leading to it as he. He was in the Capital City as a correspondent of the Sacramento Bee throughout the session, knows whereof he writes, and will lay bare the records of senators and assemblymen for public approval or disapproval, with neither fear nor favor.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds.

It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

Afraid in the Dark.

If it be true that the mill workers at McCloud have undertaken to take affairs into their own hands with force and arms Governor Gillett did right in ordering the National Guard into service. In common with the predatory millionaire the mob has heretofore felt itself above and beyond the law. It, as well as the predatory millionaire, needs to be summarily dealt with. But the public lacks information on this particular issue. The reports already published savor of panic. They sound as though the people of McCloud might be unduly afraid of the dark. A strike is war, but as there is no form of warfare that does not have its rules so must there be rules governing strikes, rules that the executive arm of government must enforce. These rules must require the preservation of order and the right of others to take the place of the strikers if disposed to do so. Such rules may work against the success of a strike. That cannot be helped. The want of such rules and their enforcement will certainly work against the common welfare, and the common welfare is paramount. The supreme need of California, in all such crises, is for a non-partisan commission to proceed at once to the place of disturbance, learn the issues in controversy and present them frankly to the public that public opinion may judge impartially between the contending factions. If we had had constructive state-manship instead of politics—for corporations only—in California such a commission would have long since been provided.

Go to the Bottom of It.

There is, as yet, no certain justification for believing that San Francisco's reconstructed public buildings have been shabbily put up, but enough has developed to warrant the fullest and freest investigation with publicity given to all the facts. The fool has said in his heart: "There will be no more earthquakes in or near San Francisco." Whoever says so is a liar as well as a fool. Earthquakes may not come again while we of this generation remain to witness their havoc, but come they will. We have this on the testimony of the rocks, and the rocks do not lie. He who does not take this likelihood into account with every building planned, every contract let, every brick laid and every blow struck is not wise. He tempts fate, is culpably careless and is aiming a blow at the San Francisco of the future. Not until the Day of Judgment exposes the naked souls of men to the withering gaze of Majesty will the baseness, the treachery, the shams of human delinquency be again laid open to the scorn of right minds as they were by the great conflagration of three years ago. That should have sufficed to put a stop to jerrybuilding in this city. If it did not the manhood of the city must put a stop to it or the direst imaginable consequences may ensue. The occasion is not one for creminations, but for investigations, careful, searching, expert. The Good Government League has put its hand to the plow. Let it not look back until the end of the furrow is reached and that which should be known is made known. Mean-

Preparation for the Primary.

The greatest danger threatening our new direct primary law is that the general public may suffer it to execute itself. It is not an automatic mechanism. It has to be operated. A good deal of pre-primary work must be done in order that eligible candidates may be put up to be voted for. Any citizen is at liberty to take the initiative. Bad citizens will certainly do so. Good citizens should take a hand and do it in good season. When the array of candidates is presented to the voters they will make a more or less intelligent choice. Chances have to be taken on that, but unless good men put up good candidates the voters will have little choice and not all defects in the final ticket can be remedied at the November election. The politicians have seen to that by prohibiting one who has failed of being chosen at a primary being voted for at the general election. The Berkeley plan of making the primary election conclusive as to any candidate who receives a majority of all votes cast is better and is likely to become generally adopted. Meantime if somebody puts up a ticket you do not like don't kick. Get busy and put up a ticket that you do like. Perhaps others will like it, too.

It Wears a Business-like Look.

Judge Lacombe, of the United States Circuit Court in New York, seems inclined to have the books, in which were kept the records of the F. Augustus Heinze corporation, produced if, in order to get them, he has to send the whole Heinze crowd to prison to remain until the books are produced. Every court of record should possess, and exercise, a similar power or, in default of the production of the books by the party interested in preventing their production, the jury should be instructed to assume as true what the other side in the case hopes to show by the books to be true. For instance, in the case of the missing books of the United Railroads, taken to New York in order to have them beyond the jurisdiction of the courts of San Francisco, Judge Lawlor should have the power to offer Mr. Calhoun his choice of either presenting the books in evidence or having the jury instructed to accept it as proven that the books, if presented, would show that the $200,000 bribe money was paid as alleged. That would put an end to the custom of either burning the best evidence as to the fact or carrying it beyond the jurisdiction of the court and then turning about with thumb to nose, twirling the fingers in the face of justice.

Department of Psychology.

It is good news that a department of psychology is to be established at the State University, and especially good news, if true, that Prof. George M. Stratton is to head it. The proper study of mankind is the mind of man. It is marvelous in our eyes. It is as whimsical as woman, as vagrant as love, and yet there are things which psychologists know about the mind that the rest of us do not know and that would help us if we did. Not only should such a department be established in every university but all students of law, especially, should be required to take the course. Of logic we have had enough to lead humanity to the jumping off place, and, with philosophy, we have been able to scatter the eternal verities to the four winds of heaven. In psychology must we place some degree of trust. If it will not accomplish for us all that Hugo Muensterberg claims for it at least it may be relied on to accomplish for us all that will be claimed for it by Prof. George M. Stratton.

Trust the Man on the Ground.

A principal reason why trial courts should be rehabilitated, and appellate courts restrained, is that it is generally safer to trust the man on the ground to deal with the problems he confronts than the man who is ballooning among clouds of whereases and logical subtleties far away from the blunt facts which the trial judge is forced to confront, face to face, eye to eye. Where choice must be made it will be found the safer to trust the man on the ground, and the trial judge is the man on the ground.

Take a Hand.

Republicans of San Francisco who wish good government should bear in mind that nothing worth doing will do itself; that the forces of evil can be counted on to organize without urging, being propelled thereto by the cohesive power of anticipated spoils; that if the Municipal League of Republican Clubs is to put up a winning campaign honest Republican voters in San Francisco must do their civic duty and do it without waiting to be whipped into line. The other fellows are as busy as possible.

There is a hysterical desire in England to know what attitude the United States would take if a war were to break out between Great Britain and Germany. In that unhappy event the United States would not take any attitude it would preserve the one it has got.

THE TRACTION PROBLEM IN SAN FRANCISCO.

This paper believes in private enterprise as furnishing the safest, the surest and the most abundant source of industrial, commercial and financial activity. It believes that the function of government ought not to be burdened with the task of making a living for the collective whole, of opening ways and supplying means whereby those who must work may work and a wage fund be provided for compensating them for their labor. It believes in the policy of delegating to private corporations the performance of certain functions indispensable to the common welfare in order that government may be relieved of them, and that capital may be disposed to enter such service, it believes in treating it liberally both in interest allowed and security afforded.

But it does not believe in allowing any municipality to be exploited in the interests of organized rapacity, as it does not believe in allowing any municipality to be made the occasion for so exploiting the investing public.

There is a type of promoter akin to brigandage, and there is a type of promoter who is a robber. If the arts of the promoter require bribery, trickery, the making of false representations, rather than the employment of the sword and the firebrand, it is merely because he lives in an age of the world when the clumsy weapons of force have largely given place to the more subtle weapons of a trained cunning. The moral status has not been materially changed. The predatory promoter is still a freebooter.

Next to the procuring of an abundant supply of pure water San Francisco needs, and must have, abundant facilities for transporting its increasing population to and from their homes, wherever those homes may be, and the well-being of San Francisco requires that, so far as there may be room for them, those homes should be in the city and county of San Francisco. So long as persons doing business in San Francisco can reach their homes more easily and comfortably on the sunny slopes of Marin than in the Richmond District of San Francisco, on the hills of Berkeley and Piedmont than upon the slightly slopes beyond the Potrero, the suburbs of San Francisco will be developed at the expense of the mother city. There is no gainsaying this. The past has proven it. The present confirms it.

Transportation in San Francisco has not been conducted in the interests of San Francisco. What should have been the servant of the city has sought to be its master, its despoiler and its manipulator in the interests of fleecing confiding investors. Furnishing an adequate, cheap, safe and reliable transportation of passengers to and fro has been a mere incident to the larger purpose to exploit and pass on to other fields of predatory activity.

The situation is intolerable. The animosities, scandals, tragedies that have grown out of it have disgraced San Francisco in the eyes of the world and, what is more damning still, have corrupted the consciences of the people of San Francisco to such a degree that tens of thousands of them no longer know right from wrong, patriotism from scoundrelism, legitimate financing from financial confidence operations. San Francisco owes nothing to the existing transportation aggregation. It owes everything to its own people. Something must be done to better transportation conditions.

That the people of San Francisco may approach the issue of the rehabilitation of its transportation system with intelligent foreknowledge, Mr. William Kent, than whom there is no one better qualified to speak, has kindly consented to prepare some articles for The California Weekly. Following these the subject will be open for further discussion by those whose knowledge of the subject gives

THE REAL OBSTACLE.

The construction of a great dam at the mouth of Hetch-Hetchy, a dam transforming a natural swamp into an artificial lake, a dam that will stand as long as the encompassing mountains themselves, will be relatively easy to do. The building of 200 miles of aqueduct, up hill and down dale, and the pumping of the flood over the top of a high range of hills, will be a matter of small difficulty compared with the real obstacle in the way. The overcoming of the opposition of the nature lovers and the convincing of the American people of the justice and necessity of San Francisco's claim may not prove insurmountable. The bringing of a majority of the voting population of all the bay cities to one way of thinking, and their being joined in a co-operative effort for the common purpose of bringing a supply of snow water from the Sierra watersheds, are to be regarded as entirely feasible. The bonding of the associated cities in a sufficient sum for doing all the work of construction, and the selling of the bonds, need not occasion solicitude for the success of the stupendous enterprise. The aeration of the water and its filtration and distribution to the homes of the people, if this latter function may not properly be delegated to public service corporations, can be accomplished without question. One obstacle and one alone looms large upon the horizon and that obstacle is the law and the use which designing men may make of it to thwart, hinder and harass. The issue invites legal bushwhacking and, by taking to the brush, a few persons may thwart, hinder and harass an army. The carrying forward of such an enterprise in the face of a determined and selfish opposition, with means to hire legal mercenaries by the score, can make progress like that of an armored train seeking to penetrate an enemy's country and ditched at every turn. It will be a case of "Off again, on again, gone again, Finnegan," from the present hearing before Judge Sewell until the opposition has either been bought off or whipped out of its boots and the Sierra water is on tap at every faucet in the bay district. And yet the consummation will be worth the price. The more the law is used to thwart the popular will the more inevitably will public opinion set about so reconstructing the law, and the methods of its administration, as to make both instruments of establishing justice and not injustice, means of making the will of the people, and not the behest of predatory wealth, the law of the land. Lay on, Macduff!

WHERE THE WAYS PART.

Let us be just to Mr. Herrin's political bureau. There are forms of criminality to which the big boss and his agents are as certainly opposed as are the most exemplary sticklers for the enforcement of law and the preservation of order. Among these may be mentioned the breaking open and looting of freight cars, the holding-up of saloons, gas pipe thuggery, porch climbing, wife killing, in short, the crimes that bestiality commits indiscriminately against whoever may chance along. In the darkness of the night, it is not inconceivable that Mr. Jere Burke, Mr. John C. Lynch or even Mr. Herrin himself might be held-up, sand-bagged or have their pockets picked. Therefore these gentlemen and their associates frown upon the kind of crime that mainly fills our jails and our prisons. The judges whom they select to administer our laws will give persons convicted of crimes of this kind short shift and long terms of imprisonment. If, perchance, one of these should have money with which to prolong the contest for liberty the contest will be prolonged from court to court, from trial to retrial, until the money is exhausted, but the guilty person will reach the prison door just the same. Even jurors selected from lists furnished judges by agents of the political bureau will bring in convictions in such cases with much certainty.

But concerning crimes committed by cunning instead of brutality, crimes against the people as a whole rather than against some single individual—there it is that the ways part. We are no longer dealing with beetle-browed thugs, the dregs of hell. On the contrary society now has to deal with representatives from the executive department of Hades, well groomed, well dressed, well bred. Here there is an affinity and a fellowship that makes the whole political bureau kin. We emerge from the realm of summary proceedings to that of "due process of law." We advance from the simple to the complex, from a rude and summary justice to an intricate and elaborated injustice. Every case at bar becomes a mosaic with piece fitted to piece, and fragment to fragment, until the completed whole has the lights and shadows, the perspective and vanishing point, of a work of art. And if the issue of guilt or innocence be lost somewhere in the maze of detail the public is left to comfort itself with the reflection that at any rate it has the law left without a stitch having been dropped or a strand snapped. The public prosecutor is left in a position not unlike that of the disconsolate accoucher who, though he had lost mother and child, entertained some hopes of being able to pull the old man through.

In the coming political campaign in San Francisco the fundamental issue is as to whether or not the enforcement of retributive justice in the class of cases first above outlined is going to content the people, or if they propose to reach higher up and punish crimes of cunning as well as crimes of brutality, crimes against the whole people as well as crimes against the individual. Here is where choice must be made. If the people are to rest content with the punishment of brutality of crimes against persons and public service corporations, a government manned by Mr. Herrin's handy men will suffice almost as well as any. If the purpose is that crimes of cunning, crimes committed by well-bred and well-attired villainy, are to be punished as certainly, as speedily and as relentlessly as the other, then a municipal government manned by Mr. Herrin's handy men will be considerably less effective than no government at all, for no government that would make up itself into a government that would make up in efficiency what it lacked in power of discrimination.

Deep down at the very heart of things the issue to be fought out in the coming campaign in San Francisco is the issue above outlined. If righteousness win it here, righteousness will take the issue to the state next year and win it there. If the associated villainies win it here those villainies will be in better position to win in the state next year. The battle in San Francisco will be preliminary to the greater battle that will rage from San Francisco to the uttermost boundaries of the Commonwealth of California. It is time for good citizenship to be putting on its war paint. The other fellows always have theirs on.

The Tricolor.

International acts of appreciation and kindly courtesy count for much in promoting the fraternity of the world. It was as graceful in France to remember San Francisco in the day of its rehabilitation as it was gracious to remember it in the hour of its affliction, and all America will share with us the acknowledgment due the great European Republic in striking a gold medal in honor of the reconstruction of the city. Strong bonds of sympathy tie America to France and France to America. While we got our institutions mainly from mother England we drew our inspiration largely from French publicists and we drew also a very substantial help in an hour of grievous need. Honor to Ambassador Jusserand and honor to the great nation he represents!

A State-Wide Man Wanted.

It may be well to remind the gentlemen who are getting ready to build up booms for candidates for governor that it is important to have candidates regarding whom both ends of the state entertain the same opinion; a man who is popular in, say, the north and unpopular in the south is badly handicapped. But almost the first essential in governorship boom-making is to have a candidate whom his home people respect. It would seem that not all of the aspirants whose names have been mentioned most frequently fulfill these requirements; some are known or are favorably regarded only in one section, and some, alas and alack! are least esteemed nearest to their own homes. Under the direct primary law it will be a great waste of effort to try to build a boom around a candidate of the latter class because henceforth there is going to be a deal more of advance discussion than there was in the old days. Under the convention system a candidate for governor was first nominated and afterward discussed; now he will be discussed and then nominated, the nomination contest being the real campaign.

Wine in Europe.

The California Weekly is opposed to the American saloon. It does not believe that any good thing can come out of it for the reason that no good thing ever yet went into it to stay good. It is not unlike the hole in the ground in which the rattlesnake, the prairie dog and the owl abide. They do tolerate each other somehow but the society is not good and it is not a real good place for either the prairie dog or the owl. By allying itself with every unwholesome interest, by making itself the lurking place of every influence that makes against social order, the American saloon has forfeited its right to exist. It must give place to something better. What shall that something be? Now the issue is up and it will stay up until something better does take the place of the saloon as we know it. At this stage of the contest the need is for light rather than heat. The public mind is not yet persuaded as to what may best be done. Until it is there is small need for laying down, irrevocably, any line of battle. The prohibi-tionist knows what he wants but his main strength comes from a forced choice between the saloon as we have it and prohibition which, at best, is only the next thing to the saloon with plenty of debatable ground as to which is the better or the worse. Professor Bioletti's letter, in another column, throws light upon an important phase of the subject. Therefore it finds a hearty welcome in these columns. Anyone else having a special knowledge of the subject giving him leave to speak, will find his contributions to any phase of the subject as welcome as possible up to the limit of available space. Keep the ball rolling.

May Success Attend It.

It has been said that expositions were on the wane, that the world had become surfeited with them and that the present century would be well on toward the first quarter before another great one would be held. However that prophecy may turn out the exposition just opened at Seattle is certain to prove worth while. It will stimulate travel within our own country and whatever stimulates travel within our country helps to bring the parts of our country closer together and to make us one people with a common understanding of common needs. Viewing an exposition is a leg-wearying task. There are many who will thank their stars that they do not have to undergo that ordeal, but all who can go to Seattle should go, if for no other reason than to promote acquaintance of one part of the nation with another. Alaska will yet loom large in the affairs of our country. We cannot know it too well or keep too closely in touch with it and, next to seeing Alaska, will be seeing this exposition. May success attend it.

Was It Legitimate?

Among the items of expense of Attorney Hartridge of the Thaw estate is one of $40,000, distributed among some 200 persons living in the New York tenderloin, to prevent their offering testimony going to show the unfitness of Thaw to live outside an insane asylum. Thaw's mother objected to paying the bill unless itemized and Hartridge feels hurt at Mamma Thaw and the court for requiring an itemization of the petty account. But was it real legitimate to expend that money for that purpose? And will the court admit its propriety when the bill is properly itemized? There are few needs more pressing than that of making clear what a scoundrel may or may not do in defeating justice without getting disbarred for it.

The Postal Savings Banks Idea.

There are many difficulties in the way of realizing the postal savings bank idea, the chief of them being to know what the government should do with the money, but Mr. Lovell White is hardly warranted in affirming, as he is reported to have done at the Bankers' Association meeting at Del Monte, that the proponents of that measure are chiefly socialists and anarchists. Gentlemen whose lives are spent in association with dollars are likely to feel that whoever would change the established order of things must be either a socialist or an anarchist. The postal savings bank idea is good up to the point where the disposition of the deposits enters in. As yet no satisfactory solution of that problem has been brought forward. If socialist or anarchist will crack that nut they will confer a favor upon many calm and entirely rational and conservative statesmen.

While the late Henry H. Rogers left nothing of his colossal fortune to charity there is this to be said in extenuation: He took as little with him as he left to charity.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

The lay of the land determines the character of a river. It cannot will what it shall be, it will be what it must. The American river tumbles from a table up on the skirts down to the level of the bay within a few hours. The Sacramento takes longer, comes slower and takes a more circuitous course, while the San Joaquin system creeps from the Tehachapi mountain to the bay, the better part of it failing to arrive at all. The first rushes like a tornado, the second winds like a serpent, the third crawls. All of them take the direction of least resistance and are creatures of circumstance.

But a voice has gone up from the American people demanding that these, and many other American rivers, be given a purpose and be forced to stick to it. It is proposed that their courses be straightened, their shallows deepened, their snags removed, their floods stored until needed, their head waters forested and grassed that the rain run-off may be held back until needed for irrigation, navigation or the prevention of disastrous floods. It will take hundreds of millions of dollars to accomplish this end, but when accomplished these same rivers will be little better than sewers, may be made to furnish electric power for heating, lighting, and energizing a continent. On their bosoms argosies may float and their surplus waters may, as results of irrigation, cause innumerable Gardens of Eden to spring up along their banks.

The difference between the rivers of now and the rivers of then will be the difference between heedlessly following the line of least resistance and a career of well-ordered design. For, although poets have sung delightfully of the spirit of the rivers, they were indebted to fantasy, not the rivers, for their concept. An unrectified river is the personification of waywardness and purposeless wandering. It may serve as a horrible example, but never as a model to follow. Its one attraction is its beauty, its one hope is going on for ever. The soul of man yearns for the river's claim upon immortality.

Certain scientists have sought to bridge the chasm betwixt death and life, betwixt inert matter and active, betwixt inorganic and organic. They have not succeeded. But what there are not continuations from one to the other there are many resemblances, analogies, correspondences, which suggest poetical or philosophical parallels. It is so with the river and the life of a human being.

We know when river and life have their birth, but their prenatal origins are lost in mystery. We cannot trace out all their sources or tell how their substance was cunningly fashioned in the depths of the earth. We can trace the death of the one in its commingling with the ocean and the other in its commingling with the dust, but with both it is as with the candle that has gone out.

We know that the controlled river is the useful, the uncontrolled the harmful, and it is just so with the life of a man or a woman. The unrectified life is a wandering, capricious thing, fuller of harm than of good, of bane than of blessing, whereas the life that is planned, ordered, controlled, straightened, has its sources reservoir and conserved, is a source of surpassing power and service to men.

This is not saying that the main current of life, like the general trend of the river, is not determined by circumstances beyond our control. As the characteristics of a river can only be modified, not revolutionized, so the main current of being were shaped by a power not of ourselves. We can modify them, direct them, make them consciously purposeful and productive. The river can't. Of itself it can do nothing but go on following the lay of the land to the end. This difference proclaims the smallest man greater than the greatest river.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Immigration Barometer of the Times.

Joseph Murray, acting commissioner of immigration at Ellis island, New York, contends that "immigration furnishes the one not entirely barometer of the times." The statistics he supplies in proof of his claim show with much conclusiveness that there is a fixed relation between immigration and the condition of the times, but as a barometer the amount of immigration is subject to the objection that it acts after the storm instead of before it. For example, in October, 1906, when times were easy, but 88,000 immigrants landed at Ellis island, but in October, 1907, when the financial panic was at its worst, 100,000 landed, and this number was equalled in November. The barometer was not yet working. In January, 1908, men being out of work, the barometer had noticed something, and but 19,000 came; 31,000 in March, 39,000 in April, 35,000 in May, and 27,000 in June. The worst of the panic was over, but emigrants were going faster than immigrants. In brief, the character of the times may safely be taken as an indication of what immigration will be, but immigration is merely an indication of what times have been, and, as we know that already, it is a failure as a barometer.

What Ails the Gulf Stream?

That old and supposedly reliable friend of humanity, the Gulf Stream, recently has been guilty of many vagaries, and its conduct is unaccountable if not reprehensible. Canains of vessels which follow some part of its course agree in reporting that they never have known it to act as it has during the past winter. Heretofore they have felt that, whatever else might vary, they could rely upon the Gulf Stream, but now it is faith in it that is being rudely shaken. Not only has it sometimes departed widely from its regular course, but for weeks at a time they have been unable to find it at all. Steam vessels recently arrived from Europe report encountering cold weather all along its course, and the captain of the Brazilian steamship Goetz actually found ice water in the stream just off the coast of Virginia. These are the facts as testified to by mariners, but it is difficult to account for them. This warm current has been so absolutely reliable heretofore that such a departure from its long-time habits is pretty nearly inexplicable. It has been suggested that perhaps the Gulf Stream has been wandering in the Arctic regions, but this does not explain why it should have done so, if it has.

"Mother's Day" Celebrated in England.

It was but the other day that "Mother's Day" first was celebrated in California and other states of the Union, and we said to one another that the idea was pretty and that it was strange that nobody had thought of it before. As a matter of fact, somebody had thought of it before and the thought had crystallized into action. The people of Cornwall, Devonshire and Lancashire, in England, have celebrated annually a mother's day for generations, mid-Lent Sunday being the day thus recognized. Their method of celebration differs from that recently adopted here, necessitating more preparation than is involved in wearing a white carnation or rose in the button-hole. On mid-Lent Saturday women bake large cakes, and on the same day men and children gather flowers and decorate carts with them. Being thus prepared, the entire family, with the decorated cart and the cake, goes to visit the mother or mother-in-law, as the case may be, and the cake is presented to her. Residents of London in numbers, each carrying a cake, visit the old woman's home on this day and it is joyously celebrated. So, after all, it appears that we were rather belated in thinking of Mother's Day.

General Castro Again Is Heard.

General Castro, the modern "man without a country," now is in Spain, as is generally known. It is not so well known, however, that his mind is serene in the consciousness that he is all right, but there seems to be no question about it, judging by the following remarkable language given out by him in the form of an interview:

My smiling countenance, my noble aspect, my absolute tranquility, demonstrate that my conscience is clear and that it does not accuse me of having done harm to anybody. When the Versailles was nearing the French coast a severe gale sprang up, and many of us on board feared disaster. But I said to them: "Be not afraid; I, Cipriano de Castro, am with you. God cannot and does not permit Cipriano de Castro to perish, for he has appointed him to be the Light of Liberty; the light which shall blaze forth on the day when justice shall rule the world."

It is a pleasant thought that, however the fortunes of Castro may have been wrecked, his self-concept has not as yet received a noticeable scratch.

Fortification of the Panama Canal.

During their recent visit to Panama Secretary of War Dickinson and Major General J. Franklin Bell investigated the situation thoroughly with a view to forming a tentative estimate in relation to fortifications that will be needed to protect the canal against attack. According to this tentative estimate the most powerful and costly batteries will be placed on the Pacific end of the canal, one each on the islands of Flamenco, Culebra and Naos, which lie ten or fifteen miles off the shore. These three batteries, without equipment, it is estimated will cost $3,500,000. Six miles up the canal from the Pacific coast a secondary battery, it is estimated, will cost $500,000, and a military post about half-way up will cost about $250,000. At El Boco point, on the Atlantic side, batteries will be placed at a cost of about $2,500,000. According to the estimate, it will be noted, the entire cost of the fortifications will be inside of $7,000,000. The railroad will be practically abandoned when the canal is completed.

England's Roast Beef and Our Meat Trust.

The British government having awakened to a realization that "the roast beef of old England" is not what it once was proudly proclaimed and sung to be, has been investigating the cause of its deterioration, and, acting under its instructions, the British embassy at Washington has been doing the same thing. The embassy recently made its report, and it is not of a nature to fill the soul of a patriotic American citizen with pride, for, according to this report, the poor quality of the beef on that side of the water at present is due to the fact that it is American beef furnished by the American beef trust. The report does not suggest that we do not have good beef on this side of the Atlantic, but what it does suggest is that our beef trust cannot be relied on to supply it to its customers, a conclusion from which many Americans will not be inclined to differ. The British government now has the report, which was prepared by George Young, second secretary of the embassy; what it will do with it remains to be seen.

The Forerunners of Columbus.

It is not news that the Norsemen discovered America long before Christopher Columbus took his celebrated journey to the westward, but if a stone recently discovered in Douglas county, Minn., is not a hoax, evidence exists that they not only antedated the discovery by Columbus longer than it has been supposed, but traveled much farther to the interior than heretofore had been realized. The inscription on the stone, which now is in possession of

H. J. Almar Rued Holland, of Ephraim, Wis., curator of the Sons of Norway historical archives, is in the Runic character, which is known to have been used by the early Norsemen. Translated, it reads:

Eight Goths and 22 Norwegians upon a voyage of discovery from Vinland westward. We had a camp by two skerries, one day's journey north from this stone. We were out fishing one day. When we

WORTH KNOWING.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Perry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

DOCTOR RAINSFORD'S RETURN.

One of the most interesting writers in our contemporaneous magazines is Dr. W. S. Rainsford, whose articles describing his hunting experiences in Africa are now appearing in the Outlook and the World's Work. An Irishman, born in Dublin, educated at Cambridge, in England, he became an Episcopal missionary, traveling through the United States and Canada. For seven years he was assistant rector of St. James' Cathedral, New York, but he sprang first into national prominence in 1883, when the vestry of St. George's church offered him the rectorate. He accepted on three conditions: a free hand in the management, a small salary, and $10,000 a year as a lighting fund for which he would make no accounting.

He quickly inaugurated the weak parish on Shyversant square, for the doctor is a fighter above all else. He conceived his church to have a mission to attract everybody to hear the gospel, and he made the attractions very large and the gospel very brief and straightforward. He made a gymnasium and a billiard parlor annexes of his church; he organized dancing parties for poor boys and girls of the East Side, where they could enjoy themselves under proper conditions instead of holding their courtships on street corners and in the parks. He organized athletic sports, and, being a fine athlete, led the work himself. He founded scout missions, and ran them himself. At a Sunday school held in a room behind a tough saloon, he was interrupted by a drunken rough who intruded. Doctor Rainsford tried twice to quiet him, and then knocked him senseless. The rough thereafter became a self-appointed private policeman to keep other roughs from bothering the children.

And, all the while, in his big church, where Pierpont Morgan passes the collection box, Doctor Rainsford was preaching a hit-from-the-shoulder religion, denouncing the corruption of riches and sounding the call to young men to take up the work of helping humanity. An amazing influence went out from his personality and teaching. The director of the great Carnegie Technical Schools at Pittsburgh is a disciple; dozens of settlement workers in New York got their inspiration to devote their lives to humanity from him. Few men have more largely impressed a great city than Doctor Rainsford did New York. He is a man's man, and young men and old were his followers.

An attack of disease that endangered his brain forced a vacation of several years, and he went to Africa to recuperate. His appearance as author is enriching current literature, but it is hopeful of a greater result—his return to activity where he has been one of the most original and forceful leaders of modern tendencies in human uplift, tendencies that have reacted as powerfully upon literature as they have upon life.

THE ORIGIN OF THE "LAMBS."

Augustus Thomas describes the origin of the famous actors' club, as follows, in the Record-Herald of Chicago:

During the years between 1820 and 1834 there lived in quaint chambers on Inner Temple Lane, London, Charles Lamb and his talented sister Mary. Both of these writers are best known today by their "Tales from Shakespeare," of which the tragic ones were written by Charles and the comic ones by Mary Lamb, but in the years mentioned these two were reputed for their hospitality and for the notable character of the social gatherings which occurred in their chambers. Some enthusiastic biographers have compared these historic meetings with the celebrated evenings of the Holland House for brilliancy and profundity. Among the friends who made the supper parties with Charles and Mary Lamb memorable were Coleridge, Lloyd, Southey, Wordsworth, Hazlett, Leigh Hunt, Talfourd, George Dyer and Tom Hood, and with these when the coffee houses closed it was a favorite exclamation, "Let's go around to the Lambs."

Years after when most of these notable personages had joined the majority parties at the Lambs' were discussed in genial reminiscence in the clubs and coffee houses of London. It was the tenderness in which these recollections were held that caused a number of young actors and writers, forming a club in London, to call themselves The Lambs. Members of this London organization, migrating to America and lonesome for the atmosphere of the London club, organized a similar organization in New York, which subsequently became the successor and the heir of the London club. The earlier shepherds of the New York Lambs were English actors—Montague, Wallace and Beckett. Following these were Billy Florence and the line of American players and writers that have since that time presided over the well-known organization.

It is therefore seen that The Lambs have a lineal and logical title not only to their name, but to the spirit that controls them. If there exists anywhere in America any suggestion of the fraternal and convivial atmosphere of the London club, it is to be found in The Lambs.

A TURKISH JOAN OF ARC.

Refika Hanoum, the first woman to join the Young Turk party in its fight for government reform, is the daughter of Kiamil Pasha of Constantinople. When she was eighteen she announced to her father that she did not wish to get married, as she intended to devote her life to uplifting the women of her race. Her father allowed her to follow her bent and she became a teacher in the girls' school in Istanbul.

When she joined the Young Turks it was with the understanding that she would prepare the women of the harems to help in the cause, and they when the cause was won were to help her ameliorate the lot of the women. The method pursued was to instruct women, who when they were properly educated were sold into the harem of the man they were trying to reach. When they succeeded in their mission they were bought back by the Young Turks, acting through Refeka Hanoum.

On one occasion they wished to reach a man who was one of the heads of the army. Refeka Hanoum selected one of her cleverest harem assistants and sold her as a slave into the harem of the army man with instructions to learn the best way to reach him. In a short while this woman reported that the man worshipped his youngest daughter. It required a year's work to win over the girl and five more years for the girl to win her father to the cause.

A sister of the old Sultan was one of the first women won over by Refeka Hanoum. She joined the Young Turks because she hated her brother, whom she always called the usurper. After studying the movement she did much toward winning over women in the Sultan's harem. Through these women the Young Turks were enabled to learn all the Sultan's plans and outwit him.

"LES MISERABLES."

The Westminster Gazette recently told some interesting particulars about the composition of "Les Misérables." Between conception and completion no less than thirty-two years elapsed. The idea of the romance occurred to the author in 1830. He signed an agreement about it in 1832; he began to write in 1845, set it aside in 1848, returned to it in 1850, finished it in 1851, and published it in 1862. His readers will be interested to learn that Jean Valjean was, in the first manuscripts, called Jean Trejean, and that his story was based on the true story of a certain Pierre Maurin who, in 1801, was sentenced to five years' penal servitude for stealing a loaf of bread from a baker's shop. The original of the bishop was Mounseigneur Miollis of Digne.

"THE NEXT THAT DIES."

By Bartholomew Dowling.

The following poem was written by an Irish officer in the English service while on duty at Delhi, India, when a plague of cholera was at its height. The maharajahs, particularly the regent, were doing every day to his lords, when twenty officers of the English army, without hope of seeing the country or friends again, formed a club and sought to drown their sorrows in the wine cup, and, by jest and song, divert their thoughts from the terrible and inexorable fate which awaited them. The author of the poem died almost before the cholera of Hurrah for the Next That Dies! had ceased to proliferate, and it lies that a week every member of the club had crossed to the "sable shore."

We meet 'neath the sounding rafters,

And the walls around are bare;

As they echo peals of laughter,

It seems that the dead are there.

But stand to your glasses steady,

We drink to our comrade's eyes;

Quaff a cup to the dead already—

Hurrah for the next that dies!

Not here in the goblet's glowing;

Not here in the vintage sweet;

'Tis cold our hearts are growing,

And dark is the doom we meet.

But stand to your glasses steady,

And soon shall our pulses rise;

A cup for the dead already—

Hurrah for the next that dies!

Not a sigh for the lot that darkles;

Not a tear for the friends that sink;

We'll fall 'mid the wine cup's sparkle,

As mute as the wine we drink.

So stand to your glasses steady,

'Tis this that the respite buys;

A cup for the dead already—

Hurrah for the next that dies!

Time was when we frowned on others—

We thought we were wiser then;

But let us let them think of their mothers,

Who expect to see them again.

Not stand to your glasses steady,

The thoughtless are here the wise;

A cup to the dead already—

Hurrah for the next that dies!

There's many a hand that's shaking,

There's many a head that's sunk;

But soon, though our hearts are breaking,

They'll burn with the wine we've drunk.

So stand to your glasses steady,

'Tis here the revival lies;

A cup to the dead already—

Hurrah for the next that dies!

There's a mist on the glass congealing—

'Tis the hurricane's fiery breath;

And thus doth the warmth of feeling

Turn to ice in the grasp of Death.

So stand to your glasses steady,

For a moment the vapor flies;

A cup to the dead already—

Hurrah for the next that dies!

Who dreads to the dust returning?

Who shrinks from the sable shore?

Where the high and the haughty yearning

Of the soul shall sting no more?

Not stand to your glasses steady,

The world is a world of lies;

A cup to the dead already—

Hurrah for the next that dies!

Cut off from the land that loves us,

Betrayed by the land we find;

Where the brightest have gone before us,

And the dullest are left behind.

So stand to your glasses steady,

'Tis all we have left to prize;

A cup to the dead already—

Hurrah for the next that dies!

HAVE WE BUILT DEATH-TRAPS?

GRAVE CHARGES INVESTIGATED BY MAYOR TAYLOR.

Does the splendid achievement of San Francisco in rebuilding its vast area of ruined buildings in three short years conceal a daily menace to thousands of hundreds of citizens, of school children, and of patients in hospitals? Grave charges that incompetent inspection has permitted death-trap construction have been made by men high in the engineering world. Beneath a prosaic examination into the conduct of the board of public works there lurks the possibility that there may be exposed another series of scandalous acts of incompetence, and criminal evasions of law, if not of graft.

When the investigation of the board of public works thrust its gaunt head into the news columns of the daily papers, hardly anybody knew what it was all about, and few know yet. What follows will give an idea of what started the probe originally.

On December 24, 1907, Hugh M. Burke, then secretary of the Good Government League, wrote to John B. Leonard, a distinguished civil engineer in San Francisco, the following letter:

"Can you inform the Good Government League if the buildings now under way in San Francisco would be more creditable and enduring if the board of public works should revise and enforce its regulations relating to construction, inspection, and material?"

On December 30th, Mr. Leonard replied in a letter signed jointly with him by Henry A. Schulze, a noted architect, and Wm. Ham. Hall, the famous engineer, as follows:

"We, the undersigned, constituted a committee appointed by the Structural Engineers' Association, in June, 1906, to appear before the Honorable Board of Supervisors relative to some important parts of the new Building Ordinance then under consideration, and we did so to appear."

The letter then narrates that the committee, as individuals and not as representatives of the Structural Engineers' Association, called on the chairman of the board of public works and pointed out to him that the failure of building construction then being done in San Francisco would be a reflection upon the architects' and engineers' professions, and that, for that reason, as well as for the good of the city, they would call his attention to these facts: that the amount of building being done was unprecedented in the history of the world; that plans and specifications were being drawn and the buildings erected under rush conditions; that the force employed by the board of works to pass upon plans and specifications, and the force employed to inspect buildings in process of erection, were both utterly inadequate to do justice to either; that it was common knowledge in the building trades that many buildings in course of construction were badly designed and were being erected in a manner certain to be dangerous to life and property in the event of either severe earthquake. The committee urged the chairman of the board of works to use his good offices to rectify these errors before they became great enough to cause a public scandal and before they caused loss of life and property. Later the committee wrote these statements and recommendations out and sent them to the board of works, in December, 1906.

Continuing the reply of the committee to the secretary of the Good Government League, the committee enclosed a copy of this written statement, and said in conclusion:

"Having again talked the matter over, we regret to tell you that we see no reason at this time for changing our views of last December, 1906."

In other words, these gentlemen asserted, as of knowledge, that building construction has gone up in San Francisco, under the inadequate supervision of the board of public works (which is charged by law with the duty of such supervision), that is a menace to life. The Good Government League last winter called these statements to the attention of Mayor Taylor, and he referred them to—the board of works! That board shelved them. Now the Good Government League has forced an investigation of the board of works before the Mayor, which puts it squarely up to his honor to satisfy himself whether or not the charges are true, and, if true, whether or not he shall exercise his prerogative of disciplining whomever he finds to be culpable.

The reason that concrete structures are chiefly among those being investigated appears from the following excerpt from the original statements of the committee of engineers, that was forwarded to the board of works in December, 1906.

"In urging before the honorable board of supervisors, some months ago, the admission of reinforced concrete as a type of construction under the building ordinance, while we strongly endorse such construction, we at the same time expressly pointed out that, more than all others, it depended on skilled design and supervision for its special value, and we stated that either ignorance or bad faith in its handling would make it dangerous."

"We now say to you that it is common talk among engineers, architects, builders and others who should know, that structures of reinforced concrete are in course of building in San Francisco which are dangerous, and personally we know such statements to be well grounded."

"We furthermore say to you, emphatically, that if failure comes to such reinforced concrete structures, it will not be due to faults inherent in the type of building but to faults in the design and execution of the particular structures."

"Finally in this connection, we must not be understood as implying that the radically safe construction of which we have in general spoken is confined alone to reinforced concrete buildings. We have referred particularly to that class because we feel the responsibility of having as a committee represented the merits of the type of construction before the honorable board of supervisors, as above adverted to, and because we believe to be the city's best interest not to have failure in what should be a reliable standard type of building construction."

These are grave charges, and the public should patiently follow the investigation now under way, for it involves the responsibility for a menace fraught with disaster if those charges be proven. No citizen of San Francisco can afford to be passive in interest toward such a situation.

THE TRUTH ABOUT WINE IN EUROPE.

Editor The California Weekly.

Gentlemen—As you say in your letter, there is a great deal of misunderstanding and unnecessary heat in the discussion of the temperance question. The facts with regard to the effect of wine drinking on temperance are fairly clear, but the over-statement of both the advocates and opponents of wine drinking tend to confuse the issue. It is not true that in Germany men rarely ever get drunk nor is this true of France, as a whole. It is true, however, that in the wine drinking districts of both Germany and France drunkenness is exceedingly rare, especially in comparison with the prevalence of drunkenness in the parts of Germany and France where other alcoholic beverages take the place of wine. Drunkenness is also very rare in Spain and Italy, where wine is the prevailing drink over the whole country. In all these countries drunkenness is far more common in the large cities than in the country. It is in the cities where the most distilled liquors are consumed. The fight against alcoholism in France is directed against absinthe, brandy and all other injurious drinks which contain distilled alcohol. Wine is recognized by everyone as being totally outside of the question, and is served just as freely in the temperance, or as they are called, anti-alcoholism restaurants as any other.

You say in your letter that the war against the saloon will be waged to the death of that institution, and undoubtedly all people who desire improvements in our morals and politics hope that your prophecy is true, and none more so than the wine makers. The saloon, however, in the bad sense has nothing to do, that I can see, with the drinking of moderate quantities of light wines in families, restaurants and hotels. Light wines are practically never sold in saloons and the regular wine drinkers are not patrons of the saloon. If, therefore, we can abolish the saloon and all its evils, every friend of the wine makers and wine dealers will be pleased. But to accomplish that, it is not only not necessary to trammel in any way the production and con-

A Talk With Alcibiades.

You now, my Alcibiades, have attained the age when you know the most. Your acme of knowledge has been reached; you are standing on the summit of wisdom, and, of course, as you are standing on it, it follows that even wisdom is beneath you. This is a splendid height to have been attained so young, but it takes a boy of about your age to attain it.

From this time on you will be both surprised and grieved to note how rapidly you know less. Why, in a few years from now you will not be able to teach your father almost anything, as you now are. At present you realize that the "old man" conducts a fairly successful business, but, oh, how you do yearn to give him pointers about it at times, especially when he shows an almost painful slowness in drawing checks—in your favor. In ten years from now you will not feel so competent in the pointer line, and in twenty years it is not at all impossible that you will be wondering why all the business sense of the family was cut off just one generation back of you. This will be tough, Alcibiades, but you will not be the first man whose youthful knowledge has tapered off into something not noticeable by the naked eye.

I beg of you, my Alcibiades, not to believe that I am belittling your youthful wisdom. On the contrary, although it sometimes is right amusing, I hold it an excellent thing for its foundation is that faith in self without which no man ever made much of a success of life. So hold it while you may, and never mind our laughter. It is needed while it lasts, and when it is not needed the unfeeling world right soon will point it out of you.

The Legislator and the Law.

A certain legislator helped to enact a law and after it was enacted he said: "Behold, I helped to make it, and consequently know what it means, and it is great!"

Then a Court took a whack at that law, and after it was done with it the legislator said: "Well, I helped to make that law, and I know it meant something, and it is some great."

Then a Higher Court took another whack at that law, and it finally had adjourned the legislator said: "I faintly recall that I helped to make that law, or something that read the same way, but there were others who were more responsible than I, and I should sooner have nothing said about it."

Then a Still Higher Court took a shot at that law, and after it had put its judicial gun away the legislator said: "I admit nothing. You will have to prove it against me, and I have several friends who will swear to alibi showing that I never wanted anything of the kind."

Moral—It is a wise legislator who knows his own law after the courts are done with it.

Moral 2—Ignorance of the law excuses no man, unless he is a lawyer.

Thoughtful Man Discusses Calhoun.

"I regret," said the Thoughtful Man, as we rode side by side on the street-car—"I regret the disposition of the mob to belittle my friend, Mr. Patrick Calhoun, because he will not go on the witness stand and explain about the $200,000 that bought the former supervisors, thus doing injustice to a noble man and patriotic citizen—Will you kindly let me hang to that strap with you? Four men and a woman already are hanging to the strap on the other side of me. Thanks."

"Why should we take it for granted that he could inform us about that $200,000? You or I might be able, for we rarely spend that sum without noticing it, but it is different with this great man and public benefactor—ouch! Out stepping on my toes!—In the multitude of his financial dealings he does not notice pin money. Is $200,000 spent? It is a bagatelle. Probably he is not even aware of it. Why should we take it for granted that this man of lamblike innocence, this helpful citizen—

All right, madam, I do not mind your walking on me. I also am walking on the man on the other side of me—this helpful citizen knows all about the trifling odds and ends of his business? It is preposterous.

"As for the disappearance of the books containing these minor accounts, the treasurer was needed in New York, and he felt it obligatory on him to take them with him. Mr. Calhoun himself has told me, with tears in his fawn-like eyes, how deeply he regrets this fact, and, as he remarked, what can he do? The treasurer is a very obstinate man, and he refuses to return, although Mr. Calhoun, upon bended knees, has begged him to do so. It is a pity. Just because of the obduracy of a malignant treasurer the reputation of this free-handed philanthropist is ask some of the newspapers and periodicals if you don't believe me! Is—What! What's that the conductor said? This car goes no farther! Oh, da—"

I lost the Thoughtful Citizen in the surging and cloudburst crowd that oozed from the car, and consequently am unable to do his further justice to a noble man and public benefactor. Can you find an unoccupied strap to which to hang?

Whistlin' Jim.

Feller I knew called Whistlin' Jim
Never a picture was built like him
Cavernous mouth and ears so big
They seemed to have sort of flyin' rig:
Sort of a squint or a cross in his eyes—
Never be picked for a beauty prize.

But the way he could whistle! Well, say, it seemed Like something I'd hoped, or had loved, or dreamed.

And the songs of the thrush, the lark and the linnet
Were all mixed up in a medley in it;

The whisper of winds, and the murmur of brooks
In a lullaby sung to the sun-flecked nooks;

A prayer that was whispered for me one day,
The voice of a faith that has passed away—

Why, I heard them all, like the soul's own hymn,
In the liquid trills of this Whistlin' Jim.

Feller I knew called Whistlin' Jim
Went with an angel that called for him.
Reckon the angel his whistlin' heard.

Made a suggestion and Jim concurred—
Savin', "I wish you would come up higher;
We're needin' your notes in the heavenly choir."

And now in the city of peace and of cheer
I reckon the angels must listen to hear
Sweet notes in the melody line,
The song of the birds and the shimmer and shine

Of days that themselves are a song from their God,
The anthem, unheard, of the blossoms that nod.

All hopes and all visions, all lore of the wise
Who whisper the Silence and know it replies;

And, list'nin', the angels—at least, it's my whim Remark, "What the chorus has needed was Jim."

A DISTINGUISHED PORTRAIT PAINTER

By ARTHUR INKERSLEY.

For more than two years past there has been living at Coronado Beach in this state one of the most distinguished portrait painters of the present day—H. J. Thaddeus, a member of the Royal Hibernian Academy. Before coming to California, Mr. Thaddeus had a studio in New York, where he painted portraits of Mrs. Philip Lydig, Mrs. Lorillard Ronalds and other women well-known in American society. But the climate of New York proved too severe for his constitution, compelling him to give up his studio there and come to Southern California, the mild and genial air of which completely restored his health.

Mr. Thaddeus' reputation as an artist was established by his portrait of the late Pope, Leo the Thirteenth. After this splendid work had been exhibited, commissions poured in upon him. He painted in rapid succession portraits of the Princess of Wales; the Grand Duke Michael of Russia; the Abbe Litz; the Grand Duchess Elene of Russia; the King of Wurtemberg; the great naturalist Sir Richard Owen; the successor of Leo XIII in the pontifical chair, Pope Pius X; and many other celebrities. His portrait of the late Mr. William Ewart Gladstone now hangs in the Reform Club in London and is considered one of the finest ever painted of the famous Prime Minister. Engravings of it signed by Mr. Gladstone sell for $500. The late Queen Victoria was so highly pleased with the portrait of Sir Richard Owen that in 1893 she commissioned Mr. Thaddeus to go to Egypt, to paint the portrait of the young Khedive, who received the artist with distinguished honors and appointed him Painter-in-Ordinary to the Khedival Court; subsequently sending him as an envoy extraordinary on a mission to Windsor Castle, where Mr. Thaddeus showed himself to be possessed of high talent as a diplomat.

In 1899 Mr. Thaddeus was again in Rome, having received a commission to paint a portrait of the beautiful Duchess de Mondragon. On this visit he was struck by the pictorial possibilities of the great Catholic ceremony called the "Obediencia," or homage of the Cardinals to His Holiness the Pope. Some months later he produced a painting which has been termed one of the greatest religious pictures of modern days. It was bought by the Catholics of New South Wales, Australia, and now hangs in the Roman Catholic Cathedral at Sydney. It has been engraved by one of the most noted engravers of Germany. During this second sojourn in the Eternal City Mr. Thaddeus had the privilege of painting another portrait of Pope Leo XIII. When Pius X became Pontiff of the Western Catholic Church, he wished that the painter who had depicted his predecessor in St. Peter's chair twice should portray him also. Though he had just assumed his high office and was almost overwhelmed by its manifold demands upon his strength, His Holiness found time to give the necessary sittings to Mr. Thaddeus, who produced a portrait on which The Tablet—the most important Catholic periodical of London—commented as follows: "Cardinal Moran pronounces Mr. Thaddeus' portrait of Pius X to be a splendid and speaking likeness, which promises to bring the artist even greater fame than he won by his well-known portrait of Leo XIII." The New York World reproduced the portrait as a supplement on Easter Sunday, 1904, being permitted (through the good offices of Mr. Thaddeus) to issue with it an Easter greeting—the Pope's first message to the American people.

During a recent stay at Coronado, I paid several visits to Mr. Thaddeus' studio, where hangs one of the portraits of Leo XIII, which has been retained by the painter for purposes of exhibition and reproduction. Other pictures of great interest to be seen there are portraits of Mr. Philip Lydig and Mrs. Lorillard Ronalds; a study of Sir Mortimer Durand, formerly British Ambassador to the United States; an autographed engraving of the portrait of Mr. W. E. Gladstone; engravings of the Khedive's portrait, now hanging in Windsor Castle; of "The Irish Harp," owned by the Princess of Wales; of the Marchioness of Zetland's portrait; a three-quarter length portrait of Mrs. Thaddeus, the artist's wife, who, with their two sons, makes her home at Coronado Beach; a study of the head of Miss Southerland, a daughter of Captain W. H. H. Southerland of the battleship New Jersey; as well as attractive sea and land scenes showing the versatility of the painter. It is possible that the portrait of Pope Leo XIII may become a permanent possession of this state, some negotiations looking to its purchase having been made.

They were a long way from home, these Norsemen—if they were there at all—and they were 130 years in advance of Columbus, more largely advertised excursion. It follows that much interest pertains to the stone, if genuine, but, at the same time, it will not be forgotten that, regardless of who came first, or when he came, it was the voyage of Columbus that really counted in the long run.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

A Big Incubus For Sale Cheap

The city of Sacramento, capital of the state, has an incubus and wants to get rid of it. That desire is of long standing, but has always been disappointed in fruition. The California Weekly sympathizes with Sacramento, would be glad to help it, and to do so does not mind printing a free advertisement. James B. Hagen, with his 44,000-acre ranch lying just north of the American river adjacent to the city, constitutes the incubus. To unload the incubus it is necessary to buy the grant, as the ranch is called, subdivide and sell it off to small farmers. Some of the land could be sold to advantage for city lots and suburban villa sites. Hagen is willing to sell, but only as a whole. He wants $1,500,000 for the land, or a little more than $34 per acre. Some of the land is as good as lies out of doors, some of it is about as poor as lies out of doors, and a great deal is medium quality. The range of value, according to present standards, may be said to be from $10 an acre to $200, though an expert salesman of real estate would have no difficulty in selling a good deal of it to suburban residents at $500. There is money probably big money, in the transaction for any syndicate which can command sufficient capital, which can wait for its profits and knows how to handle the business properly. Now, who will buy Sacramento's incubus, give the city a chance to grow, and in so doing realize a fortune? In this big country full of men able to handle big propositions in business this one ought to prove easy to somebody.

More Out of Politics Than Mr. Bryan

It is so long since silver was a political issue that most persons are forgotten whether or not it is still being mined, and if mined they do not know what becomes of it. The statistics, those uninteresting but indispensable witnesses, show that in 1907 there were produced 185,000,000 ounces of silver, which was three times as much of the white metal as when the "crime of '73" was committed, and somewhat more than in 1896, when we had the great free silver campaign led by William Jennings Bryan on his prancing warhorse. Silver continues to go down in price, but the world of industry has got into that position where it can hardly stop silver production. In other words, silver is a by-product of other forms of mining and will be brought forth in increasing quantities. It will become an increasingly useful metal as it gets cheaper, but will be of only minor importance as money.

Miller Loomed Larger Than Home Folks Thought

It is said by his townsmen that State Senator E. O. Miller of Visalia, who has been suggested as a Democratic nominee for governor in 1910, is by no means sure that he wants to try for the office. In the present weakened condition of the party in California, the man who heads its state ticket is pretty certain to have to pay its bills, provided he is able to do so; Miller is able, for he has made a great deal of money in oil and land speculations; but he is a good keeper as well as a good getter, and he dislikes the thought of giving up $25,000 to $30,000 on a campaign which, nine chances to ten, would end only in defeat.

By the way, it appeared to surprise the Visalia people a little when Miller gained such prominence and made such a reputation in the legislature. His town's people knew that he was a smart attorney, but they did not regard him as a great leader, and he has never been considered to be the leader of the Democratic party in Tulare county. Indeed, the talk that he would be nominated for governor is received in his home city with some incredulity.

Only a Languid Interest In An $18,000,000 Expenditure

Governor Gillett's $18,000,000 road bond proposition, around which discussion will certainly seethe and froth, before the next state campaign is over, has hardly begun to attract the attention it deserves. A person who has been traveling extensively through the state reports that occasionally one hears the matter discussed by the country people in a languid sort of way, as though they felt it to be an important possibility, but still a long way off. Yet it is not too early to foresee that the division of sentiment is going to be a strong one when it finally comes to be felt that the issue is close at hand. A great campaign will be made for the bonds by the automobile interests, which are becoming wonderfully strong in country as well as in city. Once upon a time the farmer bore a bitter grudge against the prosperous city man who rode in an automobile, but now it is the ambition of every well-to-do farmer to own an auto; many of them are buying, and, by so doing they learn, as they never learned before, the difference between good roads and bad. Yet there will be plenty of opposition in the country to the $18,000,000 bond plan, though it may become a kind of local issue; counties which, like Los Angeles, San Joaquin, Sacramento, and a few others, have voted bonds liberally for road purposes will not be so keen for state bonds as those counties which feel they must have better roads but have so far done nothing to secure them.

A Few Large Cities Will Bear the Burden

Then the state scheme is to build main highways merely, and a great many country people will know in advance that they will not be on or near these highways. The law says the highways are to connect county seats with the towns which are not county seats will not be eager to pay for benefits in which they are not to share. In the southern part of the state, where in the past improvement bonds have been issued most freely, they are now beginning to feel the burden of the increased taxation, and there are signs of a conservative reaction which may have an influence on the fate of all the state bond proposals. And, finally, the attitude of the large cities toward the large cities of all these proposals is in considerable doubt, due to the fact that they will be called on to pay a very large part of the taxes and will derive only indirect benefits. San Francisco, Los Angeles, Oakland and a few other large towns represent more than half of the assessment roll of the state, and would have to pay more than half of the bond tax, but they could hope to have very little or none of the new road mileage constructed within their municipal limits. Many a city taxpayer will doubtless vote against the bonds on this narrow view, although the active campaigning for the bonds also will center in the cities. Indeed, in the country it may prove to be one of the strongest arguments for the bonds that the project is one to get good roads for the rural districts, mostly at the expense of the cities, which heretofore have left the rural districts to pay for roads without help from incorporated towns. In short, there is going to be a great play and counter-play of selfish interests in the decision of this issue, and in the meantime the best thing for everybody to do will be to study up the exact terms and conditions of the legislation on the subject.

Take Your Seat Chief Justice Beatty, Mr. Perkins

proposed that every man should be compelled to serve as a juror unless he preferred to pay fine of $50, takes a different view of the subject from that taken by a celebrated Massachusetts jurist of whom the following story is related. It was in the old days when the richest merchant in the city of Boston was one Perkins, and on a certain ocean Perkins was chosen as a juror. Instead of coming into court he sent a clerk to pay the usual fine of $25, and to say to the judge that Mr. Perkins was very busy that day and could not possibly serve. "Go and bring Mr. Perkins before the court," said the judge to the bailiff. When he had been brought he was asked why he could not serve on the jury, and in answer said: "If your honor please, I am just getting off a ship to China today, and it would interfere very seriously with my business if I should be compelled to sit on this jury. I prefer to pay my fine." "Mr. Perkins," said the judge, "how is it that you are able to send ships to China?" "I don't understand, your honor," said the great merchant. "Well, I will explain myself, then," continued the austere magistrate. "You are enabled to do business only because the laws of your country are enforced, and to enforce the laws requires jury service on the part of all citizens. Take your seat in the jury box, Mr. Perkins." And he took it.

McCarthy and Casey Deeper in the Mire

The McCarthy faction of the Labor party have put themselves deeper into disfavor with the working people by the brazen effrontery of the manifesto they issued earlier in the week to all union laborers, "ordering" them not to sign any other petition than the McCarthy-Casey slate for place on the primary ballot. This slate itself is one that carries small favor with the public. For example, the selection of "Cold Feet" Fickert for district attorney hardly rises to the dignity of a joke when one recalls Fickert's removal from the Stanford football team because he lacked stamina in the nerve-trying rushes that win games. The district attorney San Francisco needs now does not want "cold feet."

Geo. A. Connolly for District Attorney?

Which brings to the front another name now seriously considered as a possible common candidate of the independent Republicans and Democrats: George A. Connolly, a member of the board of supervisors, who has made a good record and who is considered a courageous and able attorney who would continue the graft prosecutions as they have been conducted. William Hanley, the present assistant, is still being favorably considered, also.

Academic Criticism of Pre-Primary Organization

Some criticism has been made of various independent movements to concentrate voting strength upon certain lists of candidates, in view of the intention of the primary law; but one hardly sees how candidates, good or bad, could be elected without pre-primary organization for the purpose of getting men before the people for consideration. These objections sound academic, especially since the law itself provides automatically for the final reference of all "tickets" to the electors, or what-not, back to the people themselves for rejection if the people please.

THE GRAFT CASES.

There have been no startling or particularly new developments in the trial of Patrick Calhoun during the past week. The evidence generally has related to the looting of papers from the prosecution by the defense, and, as was the case last week, Detective John Helms has occupied the stand much of the time. He has testified to receiving the prosecution's papers from E. A. Platt and delivering them to William M. Abbott, attorney for the United Railroads and for Patrick Calhoun. In stealing the papers from Detective Burns' safe skeleton keys were required, and Helms swore that he received the fact to Abbott, had them made on his order, and Abbott paid for the same. Nicholas Korgnold, another detective, also testified to bearing prosecution papers from Platt to Abbott.

Helms testified to efforts made by the defense to prevent him from testifying to the foregoing facts, the effort including the promise of a bribe of $3,000 by Wingfield S. Lamb, who represented Alonzo J. Monroe, who, in his turn, represented the Calhoun defense. In this connection Monroe, although an evidently unwilling witness, was called to the stand. He admitted that he had sent Lamb to see Helms, but declared it was merely to offer his (Monroe's) services in connection with an arrest by forest rangers to which he said he had heard that Helms had been subjected, further testifying that he was not aware that Helms was involved in the graft cases. Thereupon Mr. Heney introduced the following letter from Monroe to Henry Marvel, at Bridgeville, in evidence:

"My Dear Henry:—If either Charles Goff or Helms comes through, please telephone at once at my expense. If you can give me any information that you possess about Helms or Goff, what either one has said about their occupation or otherwise, or who they were employed by, write me fully at once and I will pay you for your trouble. I want all the information I can get about them or their proposed or movements. I will keep strictly confidential what you write, and ask you to keep my inquiries confidential. Burn this letter, so that it will not be seen by others."

From which it is fairly evident that, although Mr. Monroe was an unwilling witness for the prosecution, he was almost too willing in some respects.

The prosecution was surprised when Rex N. Hamlin, who heretofore confessed to having a hand in looting Burns' office, refused to testify on the ground that he might incriminate himself. He was at once dismissed.

The attorney general and district attorney having applied to the supreme court for a rehearing in the case of Louis Glass, convicted of bribery, to whom the appellate court granted a new trial, the answering brief was filed by the attorneys for Glass last Wednesday. It is understood that the supreme court will decide next Friday whether or not a rehearing will be granted.

1. To a Sensitive Judge

Who Loves the LAW and Dislikes Critics.

I am sorry, very sorry that you do not like to have Judicial Proceedings translated into plain language for common people, and am grieved that the Law, the sacred palladium of the liberties of criminals and others, should in your opinion, need such elaborate fortifying against the assaults of ignorant persons.

But I fear that your strictures are wasted on me and suspect that my ignorant "lay" mind cannot meet a mind trained to revere whatever laws happen to have been passed. You may believe that all law spells justice, and is right, but I shall continue to criticize the law, and to criticize those who determine, and thereby in a sense, create the law, whenever I see these sacred persons and this sacred institution, permitting and thereby committing injustice.

Let us look back at the Schmitz case. A crime has been committed. The crime was proven. The man who committed the crime was convicted by a jury. The Appellate and Supreme Courts released a man proven guilty. No layman doubts that Justice was balked and defeated by the release of a guilty man. If the Law is ordained to release the guilty we might fear that it is intended to punish the innocent. There must be some reason for it. Anyhow it ought to be investigated by laymen, as laymen have to submit to it. If the law is so worded as to shield the guilty it ought to be changed, in the interests of Justice and all immortal and immortal things removed from the path of Justice. If on the other hand the Court—but it would not do to say that.

In my humble opinion the Bench and the legal profession ought to be working to make straight and clear the pathway of Justice, instead of decanting on the ultimate sanctity of the law. For to the lay mind, law, after all, is but a tentative and an unsure human striving after an ideal of Justice.

When President Taft sets so eminent an example of dissatisfaction with criminal procedure, is it to be wondered at that humble laymen should criticize the abortions of Justice, attributed by the Bench to the Law? President Taft should be given a jail sentence for contempt.

To pursue a disagreeable subject further: No intelligent man, not even an anointed Judge, can deny the inequality before the law of the rich man and the poor man. The more expensive sworn servants of the law (lawyers) a man can hire, the better his chances of being adjudged innocent. The result as far as Justice is concerned is oftentimes about the same as would accrue from buying a verdict.

How many poor men could have kept out of the penitentiary as long as John R. Walsh, the bank wrecker, if they had been convicted of equal crimes?

In the government's case against the Chicago Packers, the question of their guilt was never tried. After months of sparring by able and extremely expensive attorneys, they were acquitted because their own books of account proved them guilty. Suppose that their agent had found dynamite, fuse and

SAN FRANCISCO'S TRACTION PROBLEM

I. HOW CHICAGO BLAZED THE WAY

Written for The California Weekly by WILLIAM KENT.

The traction situation of San Francisco is not a novel one. In general outline it is practically the same as other cities have had to face. Shall San Francisco ignore the experience of other cities? Shall it take a leaf from the history of Chicago? Shall San Francisco master its problem and dominate its servants? Or shall it permit its intramural transportation to drift from bad to worse in the New York way—trusting to "individual enterprise"—until inflated securities shall have wrecked the stockholders and until it becomes impossible to secure new capital except on terms unfair to the city?

If a constructive policy is to be adopted, the public must be educated to the situation, for the fight will not be a short one and the people must be patient and steadfast. They must be prepared to ignore bait set for their undoing, and they must appreciate the theory underlying franchise privileges.

It might be well, here and now, to lay down some fundamental axioms accepted by all students of municipal civics.

1st. Intramural transportation is a necessity of a large city.

2d. A city must provide for the necessities of its people either directly or through agents.

3rd. The right to charge for necessities such as water, light, or transportation is a right to tax, which is a sovereign right.

4th. If this right to tax be granted to an agent under a franchise it must be regulated and controlled, and the control must be continuing and practically absolute, otherwise the servant may become the master and may exercise the taxing power as heedlessly as Turkish or Roman governors have used their tax farming licenses to loot outlying provinces.

5th. No extramural control can be enforced without the privilege of forfeiture of franchise by purchase by the city or another agent of the city.

Again:

1st. The furnishing of each necessity should be a monopoly, whether exercised directly by the city or by its agent, because competition leads to unnecessary extravagance in duplication of plants, and instead of giving better service gives worse and more expensive service.

2d. The only excuse for inordinate profit is found in a corresponding inordinate risk.

3rd. The element of risk should, as far as possible, be eliminated from the furnishing of public necessities, and correspondingly the cost should be reduced to the consumer, or the quality of service raised to a point where there shall be no more than reasonable returns on actual capital invested.

4th. There is no room for watered stocks or inflated bonds under any sane theory of licensed public utilities, and such superfluous evidences of capitalization proclaim an intent either to wrong the community that the utility corporation is supposed to serve, or to sell gold bricks to investors, or both.

Again:

1st. Quality of service is the first desideratum, cost of service the second.

2d. If a street railway corporation be permitted to charge a five-cent fare the quality of service should be raised by equipment, length of haul and transfer privileges—and the city should receive a percentage of such fares, so as to reduce the profits to a reasonable interest rate on the capital investment.

3d. Any percentage thus accruing to the city should be set aside for transportation purposes and should not be used in the general funds.

So much for theory: how can it be approximated in practice?

Let Chicago answer.

In 1895 Chicago began to awaken to the fact that the traction companies were running the city and the state for the pockets of promoters and grafters, instead of running the street cars in the interest of the traveling public.

The system operated by Yerkes had capitalized jury bribing, aldermanic corruption, the complaisance of mayors and governors. He had added to the burden assumed by the roads his personal debts and the vast charges found in his expansive legal accounts. He and his friends had capitalized bogus construction accounts, and further muddled the situation by worthless guarantees.

The public were being thoroughly damned and the public woke up. When the town began to rub its eyes Mr. Yerkes proceeded to tell the people that he and his rattletrap system had created the city, and he promised volubly to do some more creating if allowed more privileges, but the people judged of him by the past and set resolutely to work to hold Mr. Yerkes down and correspondingly to elevate the transportation and the civic morals of the town.

At the expiration of thirteen years of warfare the end was accomplished—an ordinance passed by the council and accepted by the people by a referendum vote, that in a large measure settled the long controversy in the public interest. Not final in its action, for there can be nothing final in such an adjustment, but the ordinance provides for all contingencies in the future that can now be apprehended, and has the flexibility that will doubtless meet the unforeseen.

First of all the city council resolutely squelched all privileges that would extend the duration of existing franchises. It refused to grant ordinances, for new trackage, to extend beyond the life of connecting lines.

All requests for changes in motive power were viewed with suspicion as likely to harbor some hidden scheme whereby fresh claims could be made against the public.

A policy was adopted and adhered to that no general franchises should be granted until extortive claims were abandoned. Further that no franchises should be granted except they provided the right of purchase at a reasonable price by the municipality. And also that any and all franchises should be so drawn as to insure the city's right to obtain good service.

It was a long, complicated story, this tale of thirteen years of groping, but the end was worth the struggle, was worth the work, the wear and the strain—was worth the valued life it cost, for through it Chicago as a democratic community grew into an appreciation of its civic unity and became a self-respecting entity, besides reaping what it had sowed in the expected crop of decent transportation.

The result was embodied in an ordinance passed in January, 1907, and adopted by the people at an election held the following April. A resume of its provisions may be of popular interest. Those directly interested in San Francisco's problem should study the document itself.

First of all there was an absolute ignoring of capitalization. An expert board gave a liberal estimate of the value of the tangible assets of the existing railroads and added thereto a carefully made estimate of the value of expected franchises.

Upon this property and these rights the company was allowed 5 per cent. interest before the city should put in any partnership claim.

Immediate rehabilitation was undertaken under a board of supervising engineers, one chosen by the city, one by the companies and one selected by those two. The city's representative, in making valuations, Mr. Bion J. Arnold had proven so fair that he was selected as the third engineer and chairman of the board.

This board has the power to specify what improvements and extensions shall be put in, and to see that they are put in and to watch the costs.

Upon all moneys raised for such work the companies are allowed a percentage for brokerage, so that if the bonds sold for such purposes should bring less than par, they would be recognized at par by the city.

In addition, the city permits a contractor's profit or percentage on the work which is done directly by the companies. This profit or percentage is figured at the customary 10 per cent.

Upon all sums thus raised and expended the companies shall be allowed 5 per cent. before making any division with the city. Also, before any division of profits, 14 per cent. of the gross receipts are taken out and set aside to provide for extraordinary expenses, such as complete change of motive power. This constitutes a fund going with the property, and in the event of municipal purchase the amount unexpended goes to the city. Obviously the expenditures out of this fund would not entitle the companies to ask interest on the amount expended.

Lastly, interest having been allowed, and of course all expenses having been provided for, the net profits are divided: 55 per cent. to the city and 45 per cent. to the companies.

This is a partnership agreement, and it is obviously fallacious as well as unfair for a partner to take a percentage of gross receipts.

It is further absurd for a city to empower an agent to perform such a function, and then, by a gross charge, crowd that agent to make money at the expense of the service. Mr. Walter L. Fisher, who drafted this ordinance, found in this "net," rather than "gross," division, his greatest difficulty, but he stood unequivocally for the right principle and fought it through.

The term of the ordinance is twenty years, but the city reserves three options.

First. To purchase the roads for municipal ownership and operation at the expiration of six months notice at a price of par plus 10 per cent.; par meaning the amount recognized in the original valuation and with subsequent cost of rehabilitation and extension added thereto.

Second. To authorize a board of trustees to purchase the property for the city at par plus 10 per cent. Such board of trustees to content themselves with the 5 per cent. allowed on the investment—all net profits going to the city.

Third. To authorize the purchase of the property by others who might make more favorable terms with the city, at par plus 20 per cent.

These are the broad features of the ordinance under which peace and good will have come to Chicago and the traction service, and under which that service is rapidly becoming the best in the country. If at any and all times that service is not good, it can then and there be remedied.

Municipal ownership is but a short step—a matter merely of a definite and fair payment; municipal control is complete.

Needless to say the companies are freed from the possibilities of blackmail and competition. The element of risk is so completely obliterated that capital rushes in to purchase the 5 per cent. bonds at a price well above par.

The advertisements issued for the sale of those bonds recite that under city supervision there can be no overcapitalization. The city in protecting itself has protected the investors.

This does not sound like New York or San Francisco. "Individual enterprise" has run its course in New York as it is now doing in San Francisco. Does San Francisco prefer to follow the all wise theory of "individual enterprise," or at the risk of rapidly becoming socialistic will it protect itself and the investors as Chicago has done?

If San Francisco chooses the latter course it cannot begin too soon to know the facts:

1. The value of tangible railway property.
2. The franchises that cannot be assailed and their value.
3. The franchises and claims that can be attacked in the public interest.

Then a program should be mapped out and adhered to—a program whereby San Francisco shall recover gains from franchise whatever that may add to the values already created by grant; a policy that shall insist upon every improvement in service that can be forced upon the companies. There must be a steady, straight ahead policy that is absolutely regardless of existing capitalization but always prepared to recognize the fact that a well-behaved traction company is a public service and entitled to fair wages for good service.

If the servant tries to become the master and persists in endeavoring to operate the city in its own interests, then the larger the club the quicker the reformation.

In the next paper I shall consider the questions of Municipal Operation, Lowered Fares versus Net Percentage Compensation, together with further reflections on the interests of promoters, widows and orphans, and other innocent and guilty investors.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

It is expected that the Truckee Land and Lumber Company will begin work on a logging railroad from French creek to Stanwood within the next two months.

Down here, where flowers bloom throughout the year, it is difficult to realize that there are parts of the state where travel is made difficult by snow, yet the Truckee Republican of recent date tells of a citizen of that place who started to go to Carpenter's and was compelled to turn back because of impassable snowdrifts. Living in California is but to order what one wants, and then reach out and take it.

On June 7, 1905, a license to marry was issued to Antemileo Arieta and Mary Altro, both of Fresno. Having secured the license, they considered themselves duly married, and have been living together as husband and wife since that time. It was only when a daughter of the woman by a former husband attempted to have the license recorded that they learned that they were in error. A wedding followed, and belated congratulations now are in order.

The other day the fourth annual fiesta given under the auspices of the Modesto Woman's Improvement Club took place in that city, and, like its predecessors, it has been pronounced a noteworthy success. Credit pertaining to it belongs to the women, and the men who sit on back seats recognize the fact.

It is reported that the American Water and Guarantee Company, of Philadelphia, Pa., is about to purchase the properties of the Sacramento Land Company and the Central Canal and Irrigation Company, the present owners of about seventy-five miles of canals in Colusa and Glenn counties. It also has secured options on about 100,000 acres of other lands in those and Yolo counties, making a total of about 250,000 acres, which will be placed under a complete irrigation system. Eventually the land will be sold to colonists.

The Southern Pacific Company has recently received the two largest engines ever run on a railroad track. The length of each engine and tender is ninety-three feet six and one-half inches, weight 600,000 pounds, water capacity of tank 9,000 gallons, and oil capacity of tank 2,850 gallons.

OUR UNDEVELOPED RESOURCES.

There are in the United States 80,000,000 acres of swamp land which can be drained and which will be as arable as a garden when they are drained. This swamp land would provide homes for and support 10,000,000 people. There are in the United States millions upon millions of arid and semi-arid lands, which irrigation could make and is making very fertile. These lands will support 15,000,000 households, or twice the population of New York state. There are what may be called the Lost Lands; lands lost to the public through fraud; lands lost to the public through lack of knowledge of how to handle their peculiar formation. Only twenty per cent. of Uncle Sam's lands are yielding living averages. What of the rest? Conservation says every acre, every foot of every acre, must be made productive of something. If you can't grow crops, grow trees! If you can't drain swamps, grow cranberries and matting reeds! If you can't irrigate, then practice dry farming! If you can't farm rocks, then harness their cataraacts into water power! As to the lands lost to the public through fraud, Conservation says: "Take them back for the public or charge their full price for the public."

And you are still only at the beginning of Conservation's big program. For every ton of coal mined, a ton and a half is wasted; or, to put it differently, for every four tons mined, six tons are wasted. In the petroleum fields, enough natural gas goes to waste to light every city in the United States free of cost. The fire waste of the United States is the highest in the world; so is the bill of fire insurance. And greater than all these is the waste of human life in mine and factory. From "Our National Heritage," by Agnes C. Lunt, in The Outing Magazine for June.

FROM 1878 to 1882 I acted as traveling representative of a firm of hardware merchants in Wharton, Texas. I might describe myself as a "drummer," but that word does not give a sufficient idea of all my duties, which were manifold, including not only the sale of goods, but frequently the delivery of small parcels in communities off the general line of travel and the collection of debts as well. I was little more than a boy at the time, yet sometimes I would return from a trip carrying as much as two or three thousand dollars with me, and, as Texas at that time numbered a considerable sprinkling of desperadoes among its citizens, the position I held was one of some responsibility and danger. I realized then, as I realize now, that I was given the place principally because of my intimate acquaintance with the German language, which was almost exclusively spoken in many communities in that part of Texas.

I had been on my one of my periodical trips, and was on my way home, bearing a considerable sum of money, when the adventure of which I am about to tell took place. Shortly after noon I reached a little rural settlement known from its most prominent citizen as Von Briesen's. At this place Herr Von Briesen himself ran a little store which, although it made small pretensions, transacted a business of no slight dimensions. My business with the proprietor, consisting of the sale of a fair bill of goods and the collection of nearly four hundred dollars, was soon transacted.

During the time while I was thus engaged a tall, sun-burned fellow, dressed in the prevalent frontier style, sauntered in and took a seat near the stove, but as he appeared to pay no attention to me, I paid little to him, and it was but casually that I inquired of the merchant when our business was completed: "Who is he?"

"I know him not," Von Briesen replied in a low tone, "but if I were in your place I should of him beware."

It was at this time that but seventy or eighty miles from Wharton, and it had been my intention to ride fifteen or twenty miles before the night set in and camp wherever it might overtake me, thus insuring my arrival at home on the morrow, for I meant to stop only at Peck's Corners, and there but briefly, on the way. However, the words of the worthy merchant disquieted me, and I was tempted to alter my plans.

"Oh, well!" I finally said to myself, "he does not know this man, who may be a thoroughly worthy citizen, and probably his suspicions are entirely unjustifiable. It would be the height of folly for me to delay my journey simply because Von Briesen suspects a man whom he never saw before."

Thus reasoning, I went out to prepare my horse for the continuance of my journey. I was engaged when the stranger sauntered toward me.

"Goin', young feller?" he inquired.

"Yes," was my laconic response.

"Which way?"

"San Antonio," I replied, for I did not think it advisable to let him know the direction in which I really intended to journey.

"Goin' that way yourself," he said. "Thought of wain't 'till mornin', but it might be kind of pleasant like to jog together, mightn't it?"

"I prefer to travel alone," I brusquely responded.

"Oh, well, if you're that dern partickler!" the man muttered as he turned upon his heel and left me.

This set me to thinking again, and I was half inclined to stay where I was for the night and take daylight for my journey; but I was desirous of reaching Wharton as soon as possible, and told myself that to remain where I was would be, under the circumstances, childish folly, so I finally decided to go on.

I was perhaps twelve or fifteen miles out of Von Briesen's, and already was beginning to consider where I should pass the night, when, at the summit of a long, low hill, I chanced to look back. Far to my rear on the highway I saw that traveler whom I had so casually met, and, by distance, which was moving in my direction. It might have been a coyote or a stray from some herd pasturing in the vicinity, but the money I carried made me apprehensive, and I determined that I would discover who or what was following me, if possible, before I had gone much farther.

HOW I CAPTURED A BANDIT

By A. BODEN

I continued my journey for a half mile or so and then stopped, thinking that I would ascertain the nature of the object behind me as it came over the summit of the hill, but, although I waited the larger part of an hour, nothing appeared. Perhaps, after all, it was some wild prowler of the plains or a scarcely tamer stray steer. This was a reasonable enough supposition, and yet, somehow, I was not satisfied with it. I could not shake off an apparently unjustifiable apprehension that I was being followed, and for no good purpose.

Although I assured myself that this feeling was absurd, it grew upon me, and in selecting my camping place for the night I was influenced by it. I waited until I had passed the summit of another low hill, where a gully several feet in depth ran by the side of the road for some distance. Entering this, I retraced my course about a quarter of a mile, and finally staked my horse in the deepest part of the gully. Then I climbed the side of the ravine and, hidden by sagebrush, awaited developments.

By this time the sun had set and night was about me, but a moon nearly at the full made the landscape almost as bright as it had been by day. I waited so long that I had about concluded to stop only to sleep, when a low thud of hoofs came to my ear, and almost immediately the moonlight glimmered on a dark object some distance down the road. While I waited in anxious expectancy the object drew nearer, and I saw that it was a man on horseback.

The man drew nearer and nearer to where I lay behind the sheltering sagebrush, and just as his head topped the summit of the hill he stopped to reconnoiter the road beyond it. At this time he was but three or four rods from me, and in the brilliant moonlight I recognized him as certainly as I could have done in daylight.

He was the fellow who had interviewed me while I was saddling my horse at Von Briesen's.

At that time he had assured me that he was going to San Antonio; he now was nearly twenty miles on the road to Wharton. He had expressed an intention of waiting till the morrow, and he had not done so. Moreover, it was quite clear that he had followed me, and had tried to do so without my knowledge. There no longer was room for doubt that he was after me, and I knew the men of the plains too well to fancy that he would have any trouble in following my trail, whenever he chose to do so, from the road to the place where I had camped. He certainly would find me, and all that remained for me was to be ready for him when he came.

My preparations were soon made. I restaked my horse where the moonlight would shine upon him throughout the night, knowing that any marauder would presume that I slept near him. Then I retraced my steps some fifteen or twenty rods up the gully to a point where I had observed a large boulder which would serve both for concealment and as a species of natural fortress. Behind this boulder I took my place, looked to see that my rifle was in good condition, and the long vigil began.

The slow, slow hours! It seemed that they never would pass. My senses were strung to preternatural acuteness. Shadows appeared to take shape and move as I sat there, and not the least crackling of a twig beneath the feet of some prowler of the night escaped my ear. A dozen or more times I started, with every muscle tense, assured that my unwelcome visitor was approaching, and as many times I found that my senses had deceived me.

Midnight came, as my watch informed me; then, after a time that seemed interminable, one, two, and finally three o'clock. By this time, as I was young and vigorous, the desire for sleep was weighing heavily upon me, and I was beginning to think that I had mistaken the intentions of the man who had followed me. I suppose that I must have dropped off into a brief nap in which I still fancied myself on guard, for the next I knew the man was within twenty feet of where I sat in the shade of the stone, and I had no idea concerning how he got there. He was standing in a half crouching posture, with a gun in his hand, and as I looked, he cautiously moved toward the place where my horse was plainly visible in the moonlight. So intent was he on approaching the place where he supposed my camp to be without being discovered that his voice was his first intimation of my presence.

"Hands up!" I cried, with my weapon leveled upon him. "Drop your gun!"

He glanced at me, saw that I had the "drop" on him, and obeyed my order without a moment's hesitation. So the dropping was over, and his hands going above his head. Then he turned to me as coolly as if he had just met in the most commonplace way.

"What's the matter, sonny?" he asked. "Think this is a polite way to treat a stranger?"

"What are you doing here at this time of night?" I queried by way of response. "Keep your hands up!" for I fancied I detected a tendency on his part to lower them.

"My horse slipped his rope, and I was hunting for him," he explained, and his hands went a little higher. "You seem to have queer ideas of hospitality, young feller."

"Never mind my ideas," I retorted, "but just keep your hands up while I remove that revolver from your belt if you don't want to stop a bullet."

It was a somewhat delicate job, removing the revolver from his belt, but I kept my own revolver cocked and leveled upon him, and evidently he felt that it would be wiser to offer no resistance. So the dropping was safely accomplished, and I felt that, with reasonable caution, I had nothing further to fear from my visitor; but the question what I should do with him still remained unanswered. Almost as if he knew what I was thinking about, he broke in upon my reflection.

"See here, my captivatin' friend," he said, with undisturbed sang froid, "I haven't done you any harm yet, whatever I was intendin' to do—which we needn't talk about now, seein' as it might be unpleasant—and it's nobody's business what you do with me. I've got a few hundred dollars in a sack where my hoss is staked, and you can have it if you'll let me take the hoss and sort o' fit. What do you say?"

Even if I might otherwise have considered such a thing, which was not probable, his cunning had overreached itself, for I decided that if he was so anxious to get away it was the more my duty to hand him over to the officers of the law. So, compelling him to saddle and bridle my horse as well as his own, and to ride in front of me, we started toward Wharton. In this order, and keeping my gun trained upon my captive, we safely rode into Peck's Corners, which we reached shortly after seven o'clock, and there I hunted up a constable. To him I delivered my prisoner, with an explanation of the circumstances under which I had captured him. The officer looked at my captive; then he gave a long, low whistle, turned to me, and said:

"Say, young man, do you know that you are in luck?"

"Why so?" I asked.

"Well, firstly, I should say, because you are alive after tackling this fellow. Do you know who he is?"

I did not, and I said so.

according to amount; small loans of $500 to $1,000 bearing the highest rates, and those of, say, $15,000 and upwards, bearing the lowest of six per cent.

I have some mortgages on hand now for sale on that basis, besides several applications for new loans on the same terms.

Did you ever stop to consider the advantages offered by a loan like this where you are sole master of the situation so far as this one investment is concerned, and for a lot of other reasons I can name?

This is the safest class of investment known to-day.

The security is almost invariably double the amount of the loan and sometimes a good deal more. Mortgage, note, fire insurance policy and certificate of title go with each loan.

To complete a loan you can either come to my office, yourself, act through your bank or send the money to me, as you choose.

I personally inspect the security for every loan, examine all the papers in the transaction, select reliable fire insurance and title companies and collect and remit the interest to you every month or every quarter, as you like, without charge to you.

The borrower pays all expenses.

I have placed millions of dollars on these loans without a single loss or fire-robbery.

I turn down lots of applications for loans because I am not personally satisfied with every detail. Those that I offer to my clients I guarantee are all right in every way.

I invite closest investigation of my loans, my methods and myself.

The population of Oakland is 240,000 and growing fast; there is much of activity in building and other lines of development here, plenty of opening for capital, and, consequently, unlimited opportunity for the use of money.

Send for list of loans now on hand, and to facilitate matters please state in what amounts you want them. I'd like to write to you.

Automobile Notes.

"There are more ways than one in which to consider the automobile," says Chester N. Weaver, manager of the local Studebaker branch. "To most persons, when the word automobile is mentioned, the first idea is speed—getting from place to place without the use of street cars or trains and in a short space of time comparatively. There are few persons who consider the automobile from a hygienic standpoint, until they have either owned one for a time or have been advised by their physician to use one.

"But, as a matter of fact, from a hygienic standpoint the automobile is the amusement par excellence and it furnishes a very necessary relaxation. Judicious use of the motor car will rejuvenate tired nerves, change the feeling of dullness to one of energy and arouse a keen joy in the beauties of nature. Any physician will tell you that the pace is stimulating to the circulation.

"Three essentials to health are air, light and space. Without these the result will be physical deterioration. Can you suggest more satisfactory method of obtaining these than by autoing? These life-giving qualities go hand in hand with motoring and with the present-day stage of the development of the automobile bad weather need figure little and will have practically no effect upon the true lover of the sport."

In connection with the celebration of the opening of the new Queensboro bridge, in New York, a unique "motor hunt" will start at 8 o'clock from the New York end of the bridge on Thursday, June 17th. Controls or covers will be located at the various public places on Long island in the territory between the Queensboro bridge and the Oyster Bay-Jericho-Hicksville-Central Park-Massapequa road, an area of about 300 square miles. They will be plainly marked by a placard and a yellow banner. The hunter upon finding a control will receive a card showing that he had been there, and also have his own contesting score card punched on the number corresponding to that of the control. The winner will be the driver securing the greatest number of cards.

"Well, he's 'Big Bill,' and I reckon you've heard of him. Secondly, you're in luck because the rewards offered for his capture amount to more than four thousand dollars."

I made no immediate reply, for I knew the reputation of "Big Bill" as one of the fiercest and most bloodthirsty of frontier outlaws, and I actually was scared beyond expression by the thought of what I had done. Many times since I have wondered just how I would have acted if I had known the desperate character of the villain who was on my trail that afternoon and night.

Nothing further remains to tell except that "Big Bill" went to prison for life for one of the murders he had committed, and I really did receive rewards amounting to forty-three hundred dollars for his capture. I gave three hundred dollars of that sum to the constable, one thousand paid a mortgage on my widowed mother's farm, and the remainder made a very respectable beginning of a bank account.

The Pronunciation of Pepsys.

Because Pepsys projected himself rather than the ideal portrait of himself he has been dedicated as the patron saint of gossip—a fate to which Miss F. Z. Hallam Moorehouse is said to demur as unjust in her book, the first biography of Pepsys, to be entitled "Samuel Pepsys, Administrator, Observer, Gossip." Readers who are still doubtful, by the way, of the pronunciation of his name will welcome this stanza, published in the London Graphic.

There are people, I'm told—some say there are heaps—

Who talk of the talkative Samuel as "Peeps"; And some—so precise and pedantic their step—

Who call the delightful old diarist "Peppie"; But those who think right (and I follow their steps)

Always mention the garrulous gossip as "Pepsy."

IN MEMORIAM.

By Tom Gregory.

"Cease firing"—hark, the bugle calls
Over the war-torn ramparts—"Cease."
And o'er the blood-stained trenches peacem
Soft as a benediction falls.

"Cease firing." Now with point reversed
The crimson, reeking sabre drips.
Cold grow the cannon's fevered lips—
Its sulphur vapors far dispersed.

"Cease firing." From the turret's rim
The voiceless muzzles frown across
The sea where the heaving surges toss
The iron squadrons—silent, grim.

"Cease firing." Now the flowers fall
The voiceless troopers' glorious graves.
The flag that led them softly waves
Across the mounds where roses fall.

"Cease firing." See the shattered red Thin battle-line "at ease" the while
The muffled drums from file to file
Roll out the Assembly of the Dead.

"Cease firing." By high Lookout's hill,
By dark Bull Run, by Mobile's beach—
And where the once-stained rivers reach
To gulf and sea, the guns are still.

"Cease firing." Lo, along the great Red field of Gettysburg the rain
Freshens the grass above the slain.
The nesting dove coos to her mate.

"Cease firing." Fierce war disappears,
The blossoms hide its graves today.
The soldiers of the blue and gray
Strike hands out of the riven years.

"Cease firing," all. "Sound taps." Beneath
The sod the fallen warriors sleep.
Above the sod the flowers heap.
Below the flowers is buried Death.

caps, and stolen property on the person of a suspected safe-blower. Would that discovery have been a reason for an acquittal?

Everyone knows of the disgusting Thaw case in New York, and the unconscionable time taken (not to try him but) to try out all the tricks of the law. Fortunately few had to hear of an assault case in Marin county by which an obscure Italian was judged guilty and began his sentence within three weeks of his offending.

No intelligent man—not even an appointed judge—can deny the inequality before the law of the simple layman and the legal trickster. How many laymen could have emulated the record of Collins in delay and in cost to the community that tried to try him? By what version of Justice has a rich man or a lawyer a right to inflict upon the community a greater cost of a trial than a poor man or a layman?

Why not admit (since all men know it) that the law is afflicted with numerous verminiform appendages, any one of which can be irritated into producing the inflammation known as injustice, if properly worked upon by justice-dodging lawyers?

Why not frankly advocate such an operation as will remove these useless and troublesome blind alleys, so that honest people may profit more by the law, than do crooked lawyers?

Alas! I can see you pitying my ignorance and deploring the spirit of anarchy that skulks in that ignorance. But again, alas! alack! with equal sorrow I pity the sad condition of law that leads so often to injustice, and through my tears I also pity those servants of the law who are willing to let it stand as it is, only partially capable of providing Justice.

If England did not do better than we do, I should not be sure that we could do better; but there is a general consensus that England is ahead of us years and miles.

I spent two years in aiding in the manufacture of law in the City Council of Chicago. I should never call upon my fellow citizens to respect the laws we made on account of the sanctity of their source. Congress and the State Legislatures are just about as worthy sources of law as was that city council.

The laws we made were properly subject to criticism and were mercilessly criticized. I believe we must know all laws by their fruits, and if injustice is done, injustice so obvious as to be beyond dispute, I believe it our duty to criticize the law or the court that declares the law or both. One or both must be wrong.

Election of President and Vice-President.

The writer of these articles has sought to make it clear that the national constitution and laws do not constitute the government of the United States, but only the hands and feet, so to speak, with which the government performs its services for the people. It is to the credit of the makers of the Constitution of the United States that so few changes have had to be made in the methods provided for doing things. In fact, the only change of method made so far is in the election of president and vice-president. Another change, that of the method of electing United States senators, is pressing hard for adoption and will be adopted despite the opposition of corporate influence and the resistance of the Senate itself. The power of the people will not always be successfully resisted.

Originally the constitution did not provide for electing a vice-president with a pre-election designation of the particular person to be vice-president. It was provided that the person receiving the highest vote in the electoral college should be made president and the person receiving the next highest should be made vice-president. Had the constitution remained as it was we should, in November last, have elected Mr. Taft president and Mr. Bryan vice-president.

The reason why this plan was not satisfactory was that political parties came early into existence and party antagonisms ran strong. The victors in the presidential contest could not therefore brook the election of a vice-president from the vanquished party and one who, in the event of the death of the president, would become president and so overturn the policies which the successful party had put into operation. It is a little remarkable that the makers of the constitution had not foreseen and provided for this contingency. Although party spirit had not developed in this country at the time the constitution was adopted, it had in England and that object lesson should have proven sufficient.

Although this reason for the adoption of the twelfth amendment was the cause of its submission and adoption it was not the occasion for it. The occasion was found in the incident that Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr, candidates for the offices of president and vice-president, respectively, (informally of course) of the then Republican party had each seventy-three votes in the electoral college. While it was the intent of the voters that Jefferson should be president and Burr vice-president, the constitution had not provided for making such intent effective and the election was thrown into the House of Representatives where Burr hotly contested for the higher office, notwithstanding the fact that his candidacy before the people had not been for that office at all. Alexander Hamilton, distrusting Burr more heartily than Jefferson, who had been his opponent at every step since the formation of the government, secured the election of Jefferson and the enmity of Burr which culminated in the death of Hamilton four years later.

The constitution as it was provided that, in the event of no candidate receiving a majority of all the votes cast, the House of Representatives should choose a president from the five highest candidates voted for. Amendment twelve reduced this range of selection to the three highest.

Another important provision was added so that if the House were to dead-lock on the vote, and fail of choosing a president up to within four days of the date for inauguration, then the person elected vice-president should become president and be inaugurated as he would be in the event of the death of the president elect.

Finally, a clause was added providing, what was not necessary under the former system, that the candidate for vice-president must possess the same essentials of eligibility to office as the candidate for president. This amendment was proposed in December, 1803, and ratified in September, 1804.

It is by no means certain that this method of election of president and vice-president is its final form. Under the method as it now exists a person receiving a minority of the popular vote may receive a majority of the electoral vote and so be elected president. This has occurred a number of times, and always with a sense of popular dissatisfaction. The makers of the constitution distrusted the power of the people wisely to choose president and vice-president and put that function as far from them as they dared, but the people as a whole are not distrustful of their own ability and may some day demand that the popular, and not the electoral college, majority shall be made effective. However, that will be likely to wait until the problem of the popular election of senators has been worked out.

Only Two Fires in Seventy Years.

The city of Cartagena, in the Republic of Colombia, is one spot where the business of being a fireman is no great drain on the nervous system, according to Joseph K. Duffy of San Francisco, who spent some months in Cartagena.

"There have been two fires in Cartagena in the last seventy years," Mr. Duffy said. "One man who now is growing old says his father remembers as a small boy when a house in the town was burned. That was an accident. The other fire, which happened recently, say about a dozen years ago, was believed to have been of an incendiary origin."

"But these fires did not destroy the houses in which they happened, because the houses are built of stone. All that can burn is what is inside. This felicitous state of affairs is ascribed by some of the inhabitants to the influence of San Pedro Claver, a priest of Cartagena a couple of centuries back, who within the last ten years was made a saint."

How Wind Produces Waves.

There are wind waves in water, sand and snow. The great sea waves are produced at that part of a cyclone where the direction of the wind coincides with the direction of the advance of the depression. Along this line of advance the waves in their progress are accompanied by a strong wind blowing across their ridges as long as the atmospheric depression is maintained. So the waves are developed until they become steep. The average height in feet is about half the velocity of the wind in miles.

A wind of fifty-two miles an hour gives waves of an average height of twenty-six feet, although individual waves will attain a height of forty feet. The prevailing wind in all longitudes is westerly, so wherever a westerly wind springs up it finds a long, westerly swell, the effect of a previous wind still running, and the principal effect of the newly born wind is to increase the steepness of the already running long swell so as to form majestic storm waves, which sometimes attain a length of 1,200 feet from crest to crest.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device caters, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the ringing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

Making the Issue Plain.

There seem to be no bounds to the devotion of Mr. Francis J. Heney to the cause of reestablishing justice in this city and state. He does not want to be District Attorney. It will bring under his supervision a lot of executive detail with which he cannot wish to be bothered, and the emoluments of the office are a bagatelle to what he could earn if he were to cut loose from his present work and devote himself to private practice but, having put his hand to the plow, he will neither turn back nor to one side until he has finished the task in hand.

It is tremendously important that the supreme issue, the issue of whether or not predatory wealth is to be made as amenable to law, as liable to punishment, as predatory poverty, shall go to the people of San Francisco squarely. This issue is elemental. Upon its determination rests not alone the reputation of San Francisco at home and abroad, but the integrity of our institutions, the safety of wealth that is not predatory, the honesty of official and civil life, the morale of the general public. In short the pending issue involves all that is fundamental in American life.

With Francis J. Heney as candidate for District Attorney there will be no dodging this supreme issue. It will stand out so plain that not one voter will be in doubt regarding it. San Francisco will go up once again to judgment and that it will come away vindicated. The California Weekly has not the smallest doubt. Ever since the manhood of San Francisco has been measured it has measured up to the highest requirements. In standing for this office Mr. Heney has again placed the city and the state under profound obligations to him, and yet it is probable that Mr. Heney loves justice better than he loves either San Francisco or California, dear to him as both of them certainly are. The light is on. It will be great.

Put the Information to Use.

Dr. Walter Landley, president of the board of trustees of Whittier State School, has been in Europe studying the delinquent child problem and, so report has it, was much impressed with the French system of farming such charges out to the agricultural peasantry under proper surveillance, on the part of the agents of the state, both of the child and of the caretaker. It is to be hoped that upon Dr. Landley's return he will emphasize the need for placing out under home conditions a much larger proportion of the inmates of Whittier school than have heretofore gone out. Such institutions as Whittier are needful only for a sort of rough-breaking of young human colts, caught up off the ranges of our towns and cities, that they may be placed out in family homes fitted for their care. To this function should be added the more prolonged care of the thoroughly incorrigible, at the worst only a small percentage of the whole. Whittier has neglected this work disastrously and largely that the Whittier state farm might be kept in apple-pie order. The lads have been utilized for the farm instead of for the lads, a constant tendency in all such institutions. A proper parole system would cut the population of both our reform schools in half within a year or two, and, by and by, halve the remaining half.

In the Hands of the Mayor.

Those were very serious charges which Attorney M. I. Sullivan made in the course of his address before the mayor in defense of the Board of Public Works. They were that the whole investigation had been inspired by two persons who had failed of securing the adoption of their materials and that the Good Government League had been used for this purpose. Than this nothing could be more injurious to the League or to good government. Upon this the mayor will do well to make a finding of fact that the truth may be known. From other sources we learn that it has been a custom for builders to construe building regulations, and even specifications, in the light of common practice among builders; that it has been the custom to allow wide deviation from specifications in the interests of competition and economy without impairing strength below the line of ample safety with a margin to cover the unexpected; that the builder is given the benefit of this substitution in competition among bidders, in which case, of course, the substitution must have been agreed to in advance of receiving the bids. Whatever the state of facts may be the mayor should set it forth so clearly that the public mind may be at rest regarding the status of building operations in San Francisco, especially with regard to public buildings. No serious harm can come from a searching publicity while from a feeling of public apprehension and doubt very serious consequences are likely to result. The mayor's finding of fact should be so clear as to set the whole subject at rest and do justice to whom justice is due and condemnation to whom condemnation is due. Nothing short of this will satisfy the public mind. It is up to His Honor the Mayor.

The Beginning of the End.

In all likelihood the Calhoun trial will have passed into history by the time The California Weekly pays its next visit to its patrons. So far as the public mind is concerned, the guilt or innocence of Patrick Calhoun is not in issue. That the accused supplied Abraham Ruef the approximate sum of $200,000 with which to buy the trolley franchise through the board of supervisors is denied only to meet the requirements of legal procedure. It is our criminal jurisprudence that is on trial. We have built up a difficult system of administration of criminal law, a system that gives guilt every conceivable advantage, especially when unlimited money is able to surround the accused with seven devils active on his behalf. If no other good results we shall, when these trials are over, know where the fault, with the law lies and shall act about remedying it.

A Massachusetts Idea.

In dealing with problems that vitally affect the people, Massachusetts and New York lead the nation and, of the two, Massachusetts rather sets the pace for the Empire State. The newest venture of the Old Bay State is the establishment of a people's college, a combination of all that is profitable in the modern correspondence school and the university extension courses, the idea being to take higher education to the homes of the people rather than always to bring the people to higher education at a cost they cannot afford to pay. Existing school buildings will be utilized, when not otherwise employed, for courses of lectures, recitations, etc. Regular bachelor degrees will be granted when and where attainment has met all the conditions imposed by colleges generally, and not otherwise. If it take ten years to get a college education that way, instead of four years away from home, what is the odds so it be obtained ultimately when, otherwise, it could not have been attained at all? No doubt something of the "Massachusetts idea" was borrowed from Denmark where the popularization of advanced education has perhaps been more general in recent years than in any other country. Great possibilities lie in the "Massachusetts idea."

A declaration from President Taft, in line with the utterances of Secretary MacVeagh at Chicago, to the effect that, in the event of the failure of the Republican party to fulfill the expectations of the nation that the tariff be revised downward, it would become the duty of the President, as head of the Republican party, to undertake its reorganization, would call forth such an acclim of approval from ocean to ocean as to give an impression that "Teddy" must have returned.

It may be well for the San Francisco Bar Association to consider whether or not facility for spurring persons likely to be wanted as witnesses outside the jurisdiction of our criminal courts may properly be regarded as an essential prerequisite for the privilege of practicing law in the courts of California.

CANNOT "WORSE US" ANY.

When Bryanism was in flower there were many who voted for free silver in the conviction that, whatever might follow the experiment, the event could not "worse them any," as they phrased it. Uncouth though the expression may be it aptly fits the Geary street railroad bond enterprise. Whatever may follow the experiment in municipal ownership it cannot make conditions in San Francisco worse than they are. The mind of man cannot conceive how they could be made worse.

The traction management is part of a malignant, grasping, unrelenting conspiracy to exploit the city of San Francisco. It is part of an incorporated plutocracy that recognizes the efficacy of no law not made to serve its own ends. In its interests, and those of its manager and his predatory associates, the public conscience has been so debauched as to render a percentage of the population unable to distinguish right from wrong, good from evil. The machinery of the law has been disarranged to the last degree, public servants have been corrupted and higher courts brought low in the estimation of public opinion.

Rich men, in their insatiate greed for greater riches, have made it almost a reproach to be rich. The security of honest wealth has been undermined. The confidence of common men in the common law has been broken down. Anarchists have been made of socialists and socialists of individualists. The conspirators are digging the foundations of security from under their own children. In comparison with any evil that can flow from municipal ownership and operation of the Geary street line the existing condition is far the worse.

San Francisco cannot sidestep this traction issue. The service is inadequate. The persistency with which horse cars are run and the public discommoded, rather than make a reasonable concession to the city's interests, betrays the irreconcilable condition of the management's mind. The volume of securities issued upon an inadequate foundation of value shows the exploitation of the investing, and not the service of the traveling, public, to be the final object in view.

Fortunately for San Francisco the light emitted from Chicago's solution of the traction problem may illuminate San Francisco's path. A second article upon the subject, written by Mr. William Kent, who was one of the few who fought that fight through, is a feature of this issue of this paper. Other articles will follow. The way will be made so plain that none need fear to walk therein. If the United Railroads cannot be superseded with a complete municipal system it can be brought to terms by an incomplete one and that will be worth the cost.

THE POWER OF A SANE ENTHUSIASM.

Elsewhere in this paper will be found a brief resume of the work of a young man possessed of a splendid enthusiasm. William Denman, if health and life are spared him, will be heard from hereafter. Not that he is ambitious for himself, or greedy for getting into the public eye. His purpose lies outside of himself and, whatever of recognition or reward comes to him as a result of his achievement, will come apart from his purpose, which is to do a work that greatly needs to be done.

Men who have witnessed the shortcomings of many courts have found their faith in the ability of The People to select judges much shaken, not realizing that the people have rarely selected their judges, that they were selected for them by the one litigant that has cases in every court, special interests which every judge can subserve if he will remember at the critical moment who it was that made him a judge. It has not been generally known, as it early became known to Mr. Denman, that great corporations lay siege to all courts of justice and, too often, effect their reduction to possession without the judges thereof realizing the ignominy of their position.

Judges who would strike the man who approached them with coin in hand, wherewith to secure undue advantage, have been so ensnared in, and made dependent upon, the manipulators of party machinery as to make them subject to a mastery as vicious as it must have been galling had it been fully realized. The only possible remedy for this condition is to emancipate the bench from partisan control.

An independent judiciary has as certainly been the ideal of American manhood as the establishment of justice has been the hope of the race. The only way to attain such a judiciary is to enable manhood to make the selections of all judges from lowest to highest. It cannot be attained by delegating the function to the paid manipulators of a great and predatory incorporated plutocracy. Ever since California gave birth to a corporation greater than itself, and more greedy of power even than of pecuniary gain, the function of selecting judges has mainly been so delegated.

Other men had thought that our judiciary ought to be nonpartisanly selected and elected, but Mr. Denman added to the thought the power of a sane enthusiasm with the result that the judicial systems of two states have already been emancipated. The emancipation of the judiciary of California cannot long be delayed.

The lessons the people of California have learned from the failure of justice in flagrant instances will not have to be relearned soon. The absolute breaking down of the appellate judiciary in the presence of a colossal need for retributive justice has shocked the manhood of this commonwealth like an earthquake. That manhood is resolved that, if an independent judiciary is in fact an unrealizable dream, at least it shall not be dependent upon the malevolent cupidity of an intolerant and ambidextrous materialism. Rather shall it lean upon the free manhood of the commonwealth, adequately equipped for making a free choice of judicial candidates. It is unexpected or desired that judges shall be politically neuter gender, but only that they shall owe no man anything, save the will to establish justice, and that they shall be endowed with common sense as well as with learning.

THE TERMINAL RATE RUMPU.

It is right that there should be competition between water and rail transportation, and it is right that where such competition exists seaport cities should have the benefit of it; but in order to have any claim upon consideration, such competition must exist in fact. No paper competition, no competition dependent upon the mere presence of water without the going to and fro of ships, should enter into the issue of rate-making. San Francisco cannot in good conscience demand that freight rates to interior points shall be made higher than to San Francisco because of water competition unless water competition exists. If it does exist it will be impossible for the railroads to ignore the fact in the making of their rate sheets. It will be impossible for them to deprive San Francisco of a possible advantage except at the cost of carrying long distances at less than remunerative rates. If goods can be loaded on the cars from the wharves of San Francisco at as low a cost as upon the cars at Chicago, then they can be carried into the intermountain region at as low a cost as from Chicago. At some point betwixt Chicago and San Francisco such rates must be equal. That point should mark the sphere of influence of both cities. Neither city should quarrel with it. If San Francisco limps in this pending terminal rate try-out it is because her water competition has been more constructive than productive, because it has existed mainly on paper. That it has so existed has been the fault of San Francisco's business men. They have not dared or cared to avail themselves of God's great highway washing their very doorsills. Complaint of the monopolization of that ocean is a confession of incapacity and want of courage. The freight is here and so is the water. Ships can be built.

WHERE JUDICIAL REVIEW IS NEEDED.

A trial judge in San Francisco is reported to have been made wroth because a jury, that had just brought in a verdict of guilty, ventured to advise the court that the extreme penalty of the law should be meted out to the convicted culprit. The judge rightly felt that the jury was trenching upon his prerogatives.

But if a jury may properly recommend a criminal to the mercy of the court why not to that court's retributive consideration? By what parity of reasoning is the first justified and the other condemned? Both are invasions of the judicial function. If the statute allows one why not the other? The only assignable reason is that the trend of legislation has been constantly in the interests of the defendant, not so much that mercy may be shown as that justice may be defeated.

Nevertheless, if there be any part of the proceedings of a trial court in criminal cases that especially needs to be reviewed that part is the fixing of sentences. We have in California as many kinds of justice as we have trial judges in criminal courts. Viewed from the vantage ground of a state prison, justice, as administered in this state, is a travesty. There are men in our prisons serving sentences ranging all the way from two to twenty-five years for the commission of crimes of essentially similar gravity under essentially similar conditions. Prisoners are given hard "jolts" or easy, but few have justice meted out to them with anything akin to an intelligent regard for making the penalty fit the offense.

A fault with our judicial system is that judges are not trained for their positions. They do not know the things that are needful to be known that they may discharge their duties properly. It helps the situation little to put above them an appellate bench of judges no better equipped than themselves. In Germany judges are educated to be judges and, that they may be fit to fill judicial positions, are taught the things which a judge needs to know.

Among these things is a knowledge of penology, a knowledge of the laws of mind, an acquaintance with the utilities and utilities of punishment and, more especially, a consciousness that punishment is scarcely the purpose at all, but rather the redemption of, or protection of the public front, anti-social persons.

The trail of the serpent of politics is over our whole system of conviction, sentencing and execution of sentence. The political mind is an uninformed mind. When the people themselves shall have become charged with the duty of selecting and electing judges the public will come to cherish more exacting standards. Under the regime that has obtained in California men have been mainly concerned for getting their friends into office in order that those friends may serve them a good turn when they get there. This is all very human, but very unfortunate. Applied to the judiciary it is abominable. The indeterminate sentence would do much to remedy this inequality, much to right this wrong.

Retirement of Waring Wilkinson.

A morning paper has announced the probable retirement of Waring Wilkinson from the superintendency of the State School for the Blind and Deaf after forty-four years of continuous service. The inevitability of the flood of years would compel such retirement sooner or later anyhow, and it were better, perhaps, to be of choice than of necessity, yet it would be better for the institution, the state and its charges if his retirement were to come hereafter. No greater compliment to his efficiency could be paid than this, that during all these years the exigencies of politics have not so nerved any partisan as to make him venture to put Professor Wilkinson out that some retainer might be put into his place. No other public servant has received so high a compliment from political powers that have not scrupled to make merchandise of every other form of public patronage.

With Their Eyes Open.

It is unfortunate that no good enterprise can be started in California without promoting a lot of buncomen to exploit the undertaking for the swindling of the gullible out of their savings. It is so with eucalyptus planting. A perfectly legitimate industry, certain to be largely profitable when followed with right methods in right situations, has given opportunity for innumerable companies to be formed for selling poor land at high prices for the planting of eucalyptus where they cannot produce anything but disappointment, either for this generation or the next. That our readers might be put in possession of foundation facts regarding the industry a series of articles was procured on the subject from one of the most competent men connected with the National Forest Service. His final article appears in this issue. Those who have read this series will have been forewarned. Those who have not seen the articles have been shared with others in the misfortune of not being readers of The California Weekly, whose ambition it is, in due time, to have the truth set forth regarding every important public concern by the person whose knowledge of each subject gives him the best right to be heard. Our thanks are due Mr. George W. Peavy for his interesting and instructive series.

A Word to the Wine Interests.

Word comes from Fresno that the Wine and Spirit Review has arrayed itself and some of the vine growers in open hostility to Fresno's recent determination to close the saloons, while leaving open the bona fide restaurants and family liquor stores. The saloon is not only the worst enemy of temperance, good citizenship and good government, but it is the worst enemy of wine and wine. We do not cite vine growers and wine makers to teetotallers for testimony to this effect, but to the more intelligent and observant among their own people. Writing for this paper last week Professor Bioletti said: "Light wines are practically never sold in saloons and the regular wine drinkers are not patrons of saloons." The Fresno Republican, not at all a prohibition paper, truthfully declares: "If every city in the United States were to enact the Fresno ordinance there would be such a boom in the wine business that all the vineyardists in California could not possibly meet the demand." If California vine growers and wine makers make common cause with the saloons they will find their a lost cause. The doom of the saloon is writ large and to force the enemies of the saloon to become enemies of wine will be for wine to share the doom of the saloon.

Under a McCloud.

The State of California has no adequate means for learning the truth about the recent unpleasantness at McCloud and, inasmuch as the state has not, neither has this paper. There are, however, certain presumptions that may be uninjuriously held in default of anything better to hold. Among these are the following: that the presence of so many raw Italian laborers was due to the McCloud Lumber Company's desire to secure the cheapest help available notwithstanding the tariff maintained to enable American manufacturers of lumber to pay American wages to American workmen; that the company's stores were of the "plunk me" variety; that in making his headquarters with Manager Quale of the lumber company General Lauck was extremely impolitic. If, as he says for himself, it was the most convenient thing he could do he probably now sees that it was also about the most inconsiderate thing he could do. He and his forces are, to draw it mildly, under a McCloud.

These, Our Caesars.

There are gentlemen in San Francisco who assume to own assembly districts, and there are assembly districts in San Francisco that do not resent the assumption of ownership. Leadership is well, but the leader should be the servant and not the master. He should do the will of his district, not the district his will. The direct primary gives the citizen a chance to be free if he cares to be free. If he does not he should be disfranchised and cast out. A fault with our political life is that the citizen has been so long a dupe, if not the slave, of a predatory corporation that he no longer realizes his own political potency. These, our district Caesars, are small fellows at best, very well as servants, very ill as masters. Make them keep their places.

A contemporary ventures the prophecy that the direct primary law will prove disappointing. This is not unlikely. A people long deprived of self-government can hardly be expected to step at once into a full and effective administration of public affairs, but, come what may, the direct nomination system cannot be less fortunate than the political bargain counter system presided over by men of high station and low character.

It is insisted that members new to the United States Senate, no matter what their previous station may have been, should show great deference to those who have "grown gray" in the service in the Senate. The admonition would have more to commend it had fewer of those who have grown gray become the "gray wolves" of that august body.

Mark Sullivan, in Collier's, declares "the principle of tariff revision to be: 'Vote for my lumber and I'll vote for your steel.' Wrong again, Mr. Sullivan. It is, 'Vote for my plunder and I'll vote for your steel.'"

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

The best paying crop of the year is harvested, not in the fall, but in the last weeks of spring and in the first of summer. This harvest is of graduates of university, college, high school, etc. The ceremonial attendant upon this harvest exists in interest all the year, and festivals the world has ever known. There is not only rejoicing that the crop is at last ready for harvest, but a boundless love for the crop itself. It is that love that has given eclat to the commencement function.

Well has this function been named "commencement." These young persons are going out to service or they are going to the bow-wows. There is no alternative open to them. This world has no use for persons who can not or will not serve it, and it is coming to have less and less use for those self-seeking persons who desire especially to be served rather than to serve. The idea of going out to service may not impress some graduates favorably, but that is what living amounts to, and those who serve the largest number to the greatest advantage are the most widely known and honored.

The most successful physician is the one who can carry the most of health to those suffering from sickness. The most successful lawyer is the one who can make the most safely and certainly secure the largest number of clients through the business world, preserving their rights, remedying their blunders, establishing justice where injustice had usurped a right or inflicted a wrong. If we can find a person capable of serving the civic needs of nearly ninety million people we will find him to the highest office within the gift of any people and make him President of the United States.

The finest example of going out to service the world has known was that offered that world by the Nazarene carpenter nineteen centuries ago. The most significant act of his incomparable career was not, as many suppose, the act of perishing upon the cross. That may have called the largest number of persons to his standards. But the most striking spectacle, and the crucifix has been clasped lovingly in the dying hands of millions, and has given peace to multitudes of perturbed spirits hovering upon the brink of the abyss, and yet, "In His Name," tens of thousands have suffered themselves to be led to the stake or to be buried alive. Physical bravery transcends all bounds yet set to test it.

But there is a test of moral courage that is not often fully met, a test set by this exemplar of the world. Believing himself to be the anointed one, the especially accredited messenger of Eternal Majesty, the only begotten son of God, and so looked upon by his disciples, he nevertheless girded himself with a towel and washed the feet of his peasant followers. He had stepped into the sloughs of the unweeded streets of Jerusalem. What an emptying of self of vanity was that!

Going out to service! That is what commencement means. Many who go will hear the call of duty to tasks that will seem to be beneath them, seeing how they have "graduated," and many such will be a long time idle, wanting an occupation that will befit their more exalted station; but whoever seeks honestly and unselfishly for a chance to serve will find the harvest white and the reapers few. All that any of our spring crop of graduates needs is a chance to take hold somewhere, to take hold in humility, simplicity and truth and, once having taken hold with a determination to serve, advancement will follow as rapidly as capacity for service develops. There is a misfortune in having advancement come faster.

What a boon to the world would it be if each graduate of university, college or high school were to carry in the mind's eye, in the heart's most secret recess, the picture of the Christ, girded with a towel, washing the feet of a disciple! Surely no one of them would ever withhold the hand when duty called through fear that the task were beneath him.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

The World's Railroads.

The Prussian ministry of public works has compiled statistics relating to the railroad of the world, which are brought down to the close of 1907. It finds a total mileage of 594,867, which is apportioned as follows: In the old world, Europe has 199,385 miles, Asia 56,294, and Africa 18,519. In the new world, North America (including 2,745 miles in the West Indies) has 270,803 miles, South America 32,166, and Australia 17,700. It thus will be seen that North America has a railroad mileage almost equalling that of the old world, and more than 35 per cent. in excess of that of Europe. Of the 270,803 miles thus credited to North America about 225,000 miles, or 83 per cent., are in the United States. During the year 1907 a total of 14,560 miles was added to the world's mileage, and this was distributed as follows: North America 7,829 miles, or 54 per cent.; Europe 2,917, or 20 per cent.; Asia 1,628, or 11 per cent.; South America 1,380, or 9 per cent., and Africa 998, or 7 per cent. The new world outstripped the old in railroad building in the ratio of nearly two to one. Within the ten years terminating with 1907 the world's railroad mileage has increased by more than 23 per cent., and it is estimated that approximately $50,000,000,000 now is invested in these enterprises, the per capita for the world's population being about $32, while that of the United States is nearly $200.

Elementary Education in Italy.

Statistics recently published by Professor Beniamino Rinaldi, of Milan, give a view of elementary education in Italy which perhaps is as interesting as it is depressing. It appears that here at the present time but 9,776 public schools in Italy, although the number fixed by law is 82,043, and their teachers are by far the worst paid public servants in the kingdom, averaging from 37 to 46 cents a day. The 55,000 teachers thus employed cost the state but $4,600,000 a year, an average of $83.63 a year to each teacher, a sum which does not suggest luxurious living. As against this average salary of $83.63, note that the other Italian civil employees receive an average salary of $404.35, or nearly five times as much as the average teacher receives. Italy pays for the state telephones $400,000 a year more than it pays to all its teachers, and its army bill exceeds its instruction bill in a ratio of more than twenty-five to one. Professor Rinaldi, as the result of his investigations, declares that Italy is exceeded in illiteracy only by Turkey. The whole record needs to be changed if Italy is to maintain a reputable place among the nations of the earth.

New Calendar for Russia.

It is considered probable that Russia will adopt the new calendar for the year which is advocated by Professor Solodiloff. Under the system the calendar year would begin at the spring equinox, and the quarters would be reckoned from the equinoxes and solstices. The first two months of every quarter would have thirty days each, and the third would have thirty-one days. This would provide for 364 days, leaving one day, 48 minutes, 46.7 seconds of the solar year still to be accounted for. To provide for this omission there would be a New Year's Day which would have no weekday name, and every four years there would be a day to be designated solely as the Day After New Year. Once in 128 years the Day After New Year would be dropped, and thus the length of the solar year would be sufficiently regarded in the calendar. As will be observed, the Russian calendar, if thus adopted, will differ from our own in various particulars, but it will attain about the same end in paying deference to the sun as the final arbiter of the length of the year.

German Cities Decreasing in Population.

The industrial depression which characterized the year 1908 in Germany, as well as elsewhere, resulted in a decrease of the population of the leading cities of the German empire, according to a report made by Consul lift of Nuremberg. This decrease was due to emigration, and was general, very few cities showing an increase. Berlin, which heretofore has grown more rapidly than any other European city, showed a net loss in population of 4,419, decreasing from 2,111,361 at the end of 1907 to 2,106,942 at the end of 1908. During the same year there was an excess of births over deaths of 16,415, but this was more than offset by a net loss by emigration of 20,834. Nuremberg is noted as an exception, its population increasing from 311,651 at the close of 1907 to 316,176 at the close of 1908, an increase of 4,525, but of this increase 4,444, or all but 81, was due to an excess of births over deaths. Consul lift asserts that statistics show that the decrease still is being continued.

Berlin and the Unemployed.

Notwithstanding the decrease in population due to hard times, mentioned in the preceding paragraph, Berlin prides herself upon her system of looking after the unemployed. To this end she has established a central labor exchange, which is maintained by the co-operation of the municipality, the trade unions and the workers who do not belong to unions. The cost of operating this exchange is about $25,000 a year, of which the municipality pays $5,000, while the unions and the workers contribute the remaining $10,000. The exchange furnishes shelter for the unemployed, if desired, for nothing if the applicant belongs to a union, upon payment of a registration fee of five cents if he is a non-union worker. It has two large buildings to provide this shelter, and during 1907 it furnished it for 138,098 men and women, and found employment for 95,678 of them, an average of 262 having been given work daily. Taken as a whole, the exchange is said to be a model of thorough and paternal organization.

World's Most Effective Cannon.

What is said to be the world's most effective cannon was recently tested at Woolwich, England, and gave satisfaction. It is a twelve-inch wire, breech-loading gun, and has the highest velocity of any weapon yet made. Twelve-inch guns heretofore made have had an approximate range of sixteen miles; this is said to be effective at eighteen miles. It is announced that cannon of this type will form part of the armament of Dreadnaught battle-ships, and it is understood that the British government will place orders for them with the royal arsenal at Woolwich as soon as the requisite shrinking pits, now in process of construction, have been completed.

Remarkable Sale of Pictures.

For a long time Americans have borne the reputation of being willing to pay more for the work of celebrated artists than the people of any other nationality. Now, however, it would appear that our British cousins have decided to run us a race for the distinction, judging by the recent sale of the collection of the late Sir John Charles Day in London, a sale which the London Time terms "quite the most remarkable event of its kind which has ever occurred in this country." There were 123 oil paintings and 165 water-color drawings in the collection. The paintings brought $366,500, or almost $3,000 apiece, while the water-colors sold for $96,830, or nearly $600 apiece. The paintings included works by Mikl. Corot, Harpignies, Rousseau, Manet, Jacob Maris and Willem Maris. The highest price paid for any one piece was $25,500, which was given for Millet's "The Goose Maiden." Some of the pictures were bought by American dealers, but a large proportion, including some of the most expensive, went to Englishmen.

WORTH KNOWING.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription and dispense your remedies, and a store that will "grab" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician and will discharge any clerk in its employ that it substitutes one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

AS 'TIS DONE IN FRANCE.

Paris witnessed last week an impressive example of applied democracy, occasioned by the inauguration of l'Abbe Loisy at the College de France. Truly Gaulois was the attempt to unite two radically opposed principles into one speech; to hold the residue of freedom of speech, or rather freedom of teaching maintained by police! To be sure, it was not unexpected, this hybridizing, in a milieu that demands to be regulated to infinitesimal detail.

The selection of M. Alfred Loisy to the chair of History of Religions in the College de France produced a little tempest of comment. The clerical party regarded the choice as a direct deft to itself and as a reward to the various anti-clerical elements for past support or as a bid for attitude. A modernist, a notorious excommunicate crowned for his apostasy with opportunities for further mischief; or a hero and martyr for the cause of mental and religious enfranchisement, to be supported and encouraged in his work. Such were the parties.

May 3d was the day signaled for beginning his collegiate functions. Mutterings of trouble began. First off, the Camelots du Roy, a band of hot-headed ultra clerico-royalist, planned, or were accused of planning, a renewal of the disturbance for which several of their leaders were arrested and jailed last spring. Rumors of their hiring interrupters at seven francs a day circulated through the Latin Quarter. Next, a great yellow placard appeared on the signboards appealing, in the name of Les Etudiants Republicains, to all students and lovers of liberty, etc., etc., to defend M. Loisy and the principle of freedom of teaching, etc., etc. To formulate and organize this defense a meeting was called for May day.

A great crowd responded. The meeting opened quietly enough, with a brief address by the student chairman, who explained the prophylactic nature of his plan: We, the Association of Republican Students, etc., have heard of the menaces planned and have decided like good physicians to take preventive measures for defense. M. Guignebert, professor at the Sorbonne, followed with a resume of M. Loisy's life and work, and a justification, from the savant's point of view, of his election to the faculty—a very keen, witty, good-tempered but critical address, which brought the audience to its feet with applause. M. le Senateur Delpeche added a brief speech, severely anti-clerical. "Rise, young men of the Latin Quarter!" he cried. "Rise and defend the liberty of thought and teaching; defend it with reasonableness, and arguments, and if you can, defend it with the Right Fist and the Left Fist, if you must!" Again wild cheering, through the midst of which a pale, nervous young Camelot rose and demanded the floor; he was granted the privilege and mounted the platform, only to begin a rambling, highly emotional general harangue in justification of the Camelot campaign against the "insulters of Christ and Jeanne d'Arc." Suddenly he turned to M. Delpeche and shouted almost in his ear, "incoherent personality about 'that politician, the unspeakable Delpeche.'" On the instant a dozen hands grabbed the unwise youth and hustled him away with unnecessary violence; one of his conferees attained the platform, shouting and protesting against the conduct of his friend, and demanding in the name of "Republicanism" the right of free speech, which he claimed had been guaranteed by the chairman, but violated atrociously; he was appeased and the other young fellow led back to the platform, where he weakly admitted that the word "politician" had slipped out unintentionally, but decreed bitterly his rough handling. The meeting closed with a rainbow of promise built up of vows to "handle the situation without police aid" and "vive la Republique."

Next day continued the campaign of education by proclamation. Messieurs the Came-lots and Etudiants Patriotes announced that the proclamation of Messieurs the Etudiants Republicains was a Lie, nothing less; that nothing could be further from their plans now (sinister and significant little word!) than to disturb M. Loisy, "that creature of Jews and University Protestants." Le Matin publishes a personal letter from M. Loisy himself, in the course of which he says: "I wish to withhold myself from all politico-religious quarrels. I present myself as a savant, and I have no other concern than my scientific work." It is neither as apostate nor as member of the church that I enter the College de France. . . . I am afraid that the 'turbulents' of whom you speak may not be very responsive to arguments of good sense. If they have not been able to see that my nomination was an affair of the strictly scientific order, that politics nowise entered into it, that my candidature was not a candidature of combat against the church, all the explanations that one could give them now would be superfluous.

At action Francaise—rabid clerico-royalist journal—on the other hand, maintained its fusillade of insinuation. Further affiches appeared on the bulletin boards. The Republicans had announced their endeavor to supplant the police. My hopes rose high. Here I should see an exhibition of intelligent self-government, of "efficient democracy."

On the morning of the third I found myself at nine o'clock surrounded by a crowd which already besieged the great iron gates of the college. The president of the Association of Republican Students and many of its members mingled with the crowd. All was going peacefully. But alas! suddenly a whole company of gendarmes swung around the corner and completely besieged the college; soon the familiar "Allez-vous-en, Messieurs," "Circulez-vous, Messieurs," sounded up and down the street and my dream of democracy faded. The Republic had not quite the mustard-seed of faith in its own republicanism and sent force to secure democracy and fair play.

At half past nine the gates swung open; the crowd surged through the narrow courtyard, crushing a little woman against a post in its course, and crammed the amphitheater. Followed an hour of tension, of curiosity, of expectation, of resolution. Precisely at half past ten, eighteen members of the faculty mounted the platform, led by M. Levasseur. At the end of the column—M. Loisy. Salvoes of applause which after a minute or so turn into a rhythmic "Vive Loisy! Vive Loisy! Vive Loisy!" A Camelot attempts some counter-cry, but is lastly suppressed. Through all this demonstration M. Loisy attempts to hold himself unperturbed, and at the first moment of calm began the reading of his address, in a low but remarkably clear and precise voice. No rhetoric, no polemic, no sops of any sort to the general disputatious public. He immediately plunged into his subject, told us dryly and sympathetically of the work of his predecessors, set forth his general ideas of his subject and his plans for attacking it. He had been careful to write out, and even to print, this address in advance, and kept close to the printed pamphlet, avoiding any possible descent into emotions of the moment, though it is a moot question whether theologians or historians of the critical school ever experience emotions. There was no emotion apparent; for example, when he read: "Religious can be materials for science; there is nothing to prevent the application to them of the methods of observation and criticism which serve in the study of history." Nor again when he began to treat of the history of religions it is necessary to regard men of his sympathy and indulgence that one must have for everything human. It is not, however, necessary to limit oneself to the narrow point of view of one particular or exclusive religion. If one believes in the religious is the perfect expression of the religious ideal it is useless to occupy himself with others. For myself, I believe that when a man does not know others he knows but poorly his own religion." And whatever was lost to dryness or coldness was more than compensated in vigor and precision.

But towards the end, a burst of emotion, thrilling emotion, illumined the reading of the last words of his answer to the question, "What do you expect of me?" He had been outlining his program, matters and methods. With a sudden gesture, he concluded: "Vast program; shall I accomplish all its steps? I do not know. All that I can promise you (and here all the strength of the man rose to emphasize sharply his words) is to march on courageously. And I shall have no other concern but for the truth!"

Almost before the applause began he had slipped away to the shelter of his colleagues. The customary battery of cameras lined up expectantly at the college gates—but vainly, for a side-door opened quietly and the hero of the day was hurried out into a carriage and whipped away without more ado. Another camelot attempted to spit on him as he mounted the fiacre, but was seized by a vigilant gendarme and thoroughly shaken. A curious and very illuminating phenomenon thus, that on such a propitious occasion for demonstrating the very democracy of democracy the gendarme had the last word.

SHAW ON THE DRAMA'S POWER.

George Bernard Shaw, in a recent utterance, gave voice to the following brilliant description of the true place of the stage in the education of the public:

"The theater is literally making the minds of our urban populations today. It is a huge factory of sentiment, of character, of points of honor, of conception of conduct, of everything that finally determines the destiny of a nation. And yet it is openly said that the theater is only a place of amusement. It is nothing of the kind; a theater is a place of culture, a place where people learn how to think, act, and feel; most important, that all the schools in Christendom. A healthy Englishman amuses himself in the field and in the society of his friends; the theater can offer nothing in the way of amusement to compete with these except vice; and at that it can easily be beaten by places that the Nationalaters. Would any sane man call the National gallery or the British museum a place of amusement? It is true that these institutions are commercial failures, just as Westminster abbey is a commercial failure. And I sincerely hope that the National theater will be an equally conspicuous and equally priceless commercial failure. It is with that view, in fact, that we are asking for an endowment of half a million for it. Who speaks first?"

PATTI'S SECRET.

Now that I have plenty of time for reflection, says Adelina Patti in the current Strand Magazine, I am intensely amused at the wonder of which I am the object. People wonder at what they are pleased to call my perpetual youth, and they wonder how I manage to kill time here at my castle in far-off Wales, away from society and social excitements. Such shoals of letters I receive, begging me to tell them the secret of my voice, my complexion, my figure. I endeavor to satisfy them by their word that, if I will only tell them all, it will be held inviolable. As if there was any secret, unless temperance in all things is a secret! I never strain my voice, I avoid all pastries and rich dishes, and I am a slave to nothing; I endeavor to sprightly and busy for an idle moment, I love to manage my own house, to call upon my neighbors, to entertain my friends—M. Jean de Reszke and his charming wife have just traveled all the way to visit me—to practice scales, and what is left over is devoted to reading and needle-work.

MEN WHO DO THINGS

WILLIAM DENMAN.

Mr. William Denman.

father, James Denman, was the founder of the first free school in San Francisco, and was afterwards for many years superintendent of schools.

After graduating from the University of California, in 1894, Mr. Denman entered Harvard Law School, from which he graduated in 1897. He immediately began to practice law in San Francisco, and at the same time acted as assistant professor of law at Hastings Law School and as law lecturer at the University of California. While on the university faculty he was tendered one of the Philippine judgeships, which, after some hesitation, he declined. He has steadily risen at the bar and is now among the foremost of the attorneys of San Francisco, practicing especially before the federal courts.

He has, at the same time, been active in politics, as an organization Democrat, though he voted for Roosevelt and Taft at the last two national elections. He is, properly defined, a Roosevelt Democrat. In college, Mr. Denman organized the New England League of Sound Money Clubs, an organization with locals in all the eastern colleges, which had a considerable effect upon the political results of McKinley's campaign. He has, since leaving college, been a delegate to seventeen Democratic and non-partisan conventions. The second of these was the famous "Jim Budd convention." Here the regular order of nomination was reversed, on the plea of "taking the judges out of politics," and the nominations for supreme court justices were made before the nomination for governor. The real purpose of this plan was to nominate Judge Murphy of Del Norte for supreme justice, so that, when the nominations were made for governor, the Budd forces could object to the nomination of Barney Murphy on the ground that two Murphys on the ticket would alienate the German vote. This was successfully done, and Barney Murphy was defeated by Budd.

In thinking this "clever" piece of convention politics over, Mr. Denman first saw the menace to the character of the bench that was in the nomination of judges by conventions primarily interested only in the most "politic" selections to be made for immediate strategic, party reasons. Here a supreme court justiceship was handed about as a political shuttlecock in a game to win another man the nomination for governor. Where was the prospect of sound judgment from judges so selected?

Many things in Mr. Denman's experience tended to confirm this misgiving. He noticed the difference in procedure in the federal and the state courts—the one expeditious, brushing aside technicalities to get at justice; the other dilatory, and using technicalities as a means of favoring the side that had "pull." He noted the ease with which political lawyers got extensions of time in which to prepare briefs, in the state courts. He observed in a thousand ways the effects of political pressure upon the state of mind of judges in procedure and decisions alike.

These things led him to undertake a fight to get a law through the legislature providing for the non-partisan election of judges. He enlisted the co-operation of the San Francisco Bar Association, which endorsed the idea and appointed a committee to work with the members of the other bar associations of the state to forward the movement. This committee, which has been continued in office, is composed of Charles P. Eells, chairman, Judge Charles W. Slack, John F. Davis, Matt I. Sullivan, and Warren Gregory.

He carried the fight to the state legislature, and the bill that he drafted passed the Senate and came within five votes of passing the Assembly. He had the votes to carry it in the Assembly, but a bereavement in his family prevented his presence at Sacramento until the last two days of the session, when it was too late to rally his adherents.

The movement is still under his guidance, however. He is now preparing to further it through the new state association of bar associations. He is preparing for the press a series of letters containing the votes of the members of the legislature on the bill, and, as far as can be learned, the pressure that was brought to bear upon those who voted against it. He is also writing to each member of the legislature, pointing out the reasons that the public believes caused him to vote as he did on the bill. He has a large faith that, with the strength the idea showed in the last session and with the better quality of members likely to be elected under the new direct primary law, the measure will easily pass at the next session.

An interesting sidelight of the campaign is the fact that Mr. Denman brought about the passage of this law in two other states by trying to get it passed here. He wrote last summer to a majority of the governors and chief justices of the several states, inclosing a rough draft of the bill and asking their opinion of it. He recently heard from the governor of North Dakota, who said that Mr. Denman's letter had come just when he was writing his message to the legislature; that he had incorporated the idea of the bill in his message, that the legislature had promptly adapted the bill to local conditions, and passed it, and it is now the law in North Dakota.

The chief justice of Montana wrote that he had referred the letter to the chairman of one of the judiciary committees of the legislature with the result that it had been made the law in Montana.

All the while Mr. Denman has kept up his interest in politics. In the Democratic municipal convention of 1899, in San Francisco, he led the fight to keep the national platform out of the local platform on the ground that the silver question had no bearing on good government in San Francisco, and after two defeats, his resolutions were carried on the third day. This fight was in line with the other movement, to dissociate in politics those things that have no mutual relevancy toward the main matter at issue.

Mr. Denman is a member of the board of governors of the San Francisco Bar Association, and a member of the committee appointed by that association to prosecute the disbarment proceedings against George D. Collins, which, by the way, were prosecuted to the last ditch that the courts would permit them to be carried in view of his imprisonment and consequent withdrawal from practice.

Enough has been told above to show that the man who is primarily the founder of the non-partisan judicial movement is high enough in the law to command the respect of the profession, and versed enough in politics to know how the pressure is applied to judges and to know the rational, safe way of removing from the evil influences of political manipulators the judges of the state.

Mr. Denman is making a fight for one of the essential reforms of our governmental system, and deserves the heartiest co-operation of all citizens, as well as a place in this paper's gallery of "Men Who Do Things."

THE GRAFT CASES.

After practically four months of wearisome effort the trial of Patrick Calhoun is drawing to a close, and any day now may see its termination, at any rate, so far as the trial court of Judge Lawlor is concerned. Last Wednesday Assistant District Attorney Heney announced that the prosecution probably would have all of its evidence presented on Thursday (yesterday), and as it is understood that the defense will offer no testimony in its own behalf, there then would remain in the

OAKLAND, CAL.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Only the Crucified Live.

As from the old we have known it.

For all of the years attest it.

That a crown of thorns is woven

For him who would serve us best.

Deep in our lore 'tis graven:

He who would be our friend

Knoweth Gethsemane's garden.

Calvary at the end.

Heroes of right and duty.

Holding God's standard high.

They in their love have called us.

We answered them, "Crucify!"

Yes, but the slayers moulder.

And all that the aeons give

To them is the shame that brands them—

Only the crucified live.

Socrates, Huss and Bruno,

Ye who were tried by flame

Or by the hemlock's poison,

Yours is a deathless name.

Still as the years are added

Unto this rolling ball,

Ye are our honored heroes—

But where are your judges, all?

Dust of the dust unheeded,

This are your judges now;

Ye live in the wide world's honor,

Laurels upon your brow.

High on the cross of torture,

Jeered by the rabble mean,

Whispering, "Father, forgive them"—

Lo, 'tis the Nazarene

But the blood-mad mob has vanished,

Seeking oblivion's trust;

Dishonored and all-forgotten—

Save only the loving Christ.

Hold to this truth, brave battler

For duties the high gods give;

Though you be crushed and broken,

Only the crucified live.

Should He Give Up Smoking?

It is as you say, Elnora. If John loves you he should, knowing how much it would gratify you, be not only willing but pleased to give up smoking. He should for your dear sake be willing to give it up, just as you would give up—give up—well, say, wearing a hat that is likely to sever his jugular vein when he rides next to you. No, on second thought, that would be asking too much of you; but he should be willing to give up smoking, for your sake, just as you would give up something that was not too important, for his sake. Yes, you are right; he ought to give it up.

And yet, do you know, Elnora, I should not ask him to do so if I were in your place. No, I should not take the chances.

Once I knew a man whose dear wife asked him to give up the smoking habit, to which he had been addicted for years. He was a fine man, gentle, kindly, a fond husband and a devoted father. His wife admitted that she could not see that smoking hurt him any, but she had heard that it was a bad habit, and so she urged him to give it up.

He did so, and the first day thereafter the family noticed that he was different, but they said that they must be patient with pa under the circumstances. The second day the canary attempted to warble after he got home, and he threw the bird, cage and all, through the window. The third day he kicked the cat after the canary, and his language—well, this paper is to go through the mails, and so I cannot attempt to repeat it. The fourth day the rest of the family hastily went to visit a cousin of the mother, and thence they sent the man a round robin earnestly pleading with him to go to smoking again. He did so, and now anybody could live with him.

Yes, Elnora, John ought, out of regard for your feelings, to stop smoking, but were I in your place I should not ask him—not until you have found out what sort of nerves he carries, anyway.

The Opinions of Rufus.

A prison's a place where we confine men for being guilty of not havin' money 'nough to live expensive lifestyles.

The main difference 'tween soshal gossip an' malignant gossip is that the first is told on your neighbor an' the last is told on you.

Lots of men love babies, but they can more or less control their affections when the infant's howlin' 'long 'bout 3 o'clock in the mornin'.

"The pleasure of gittin' out in the country an' eatin' apples, penches an' sech fresh from the trees is what I call bucolic," said Lufe Jones. He tried it, an' after that he left off the first syllable. Didn't persist it was pleasure, either.

A Christmas without Santa Claus, a Fourth of July without noise, an' a Heaven without any sense o' humor in it—Oh, it's no use my tryin' to be good.

We men poke a lot of fun at the women, but if you think they don't get even why don't you get married?

"This better to have loved an' lost." Lots o' fellers that's tried it an' won say they's no doubt 'bout it.

The profoundest man I ever knew was a feller named Skaggins. He could tell the difference in principle 'tween the physical party he belonged to an' the one he didn't belong to.

The only thing I know of that's more depression than not to attain the ideals of youth is to attain 'em an' find out what they really 'mount to.

These waste-basket hats is improvin' to some sossen, for they ain't no doubt that they cover up considerable of their faces.

Not Very Good in School.

Not very good in school was I;

Didn't know whether to smile or sigh

As the battered schoolhouse I now recall.

With its desks deep carved by the urchins small.

There I studied somewhat, or truancy tried,

Wooded by the charm of the world outside.

And dreaming today I hold it sure

That the teacher's task was no sinecure.

But earnestly, faithfully, patiently still,

The master guided us up the hill.

And, though 'twas little we gave him heed,

Taught us the lessons the years would need.

Not very good in school am I,

In the great, great school where our fates we try.

Fall often I turn from the books away.

The lessons unlearned while I truant play.

And I cry in my folly: "Let Duty pass;

I will dance with Pleasure, the bonnie lass."

And I turn from the Master, all loving, kind,

For a child am I, and the child is blind.

But the Master heeds though afar I stray,

And He guides me still in His chosen way.

And patiently, tenderly, He doth lead

My soul to the lore that my soul shall need.

Modern Definitions.

Smart Set—Ironical term, generally applied to people who are almost anything else.

Higher-up—One who has money enough to keep out after he has been caught at it.

Appellate Court—An intermediate hope for those who have been caught with the goods on them.

Love—A strange emotion which thrills one at sight of a person clad in the garments of the other sex.

Divorce Court—A place for scratching the necks that are mad in heaven.

Patriot—One who loves his country and belongs to your party. Frequently the order is reversed.

"She was greatly disappointed, after marriage, to find that her ideal of a husband was not what it had been before marriage." "What did she do about it?" "Changed." "What? The ideal?" "No, the husband."

Thoughtful Man on Payment of Prosecutors.

"As a citizen and a taxpayer, sir," said the Thoughtful Man, "I protest against the payment of any of the graft-prosecution's expenses out of the public funds. It is an outrage, sir, an infamy, a—yes, it is all of that. Why should the public pay for a corps of gunshoe artists for the prosecution, when Mr. Calhoun pays for his own, or, at any rate, permits the acrobats who ride in street cars to pay for them? Why should this invidious distinction be made, and why should tax-payers tolerate it? Dummit, they shouldn't."

"It is not as it would be were a man to enter my store and steal a loaf of bread. In that case he naturally and justly would be arrested one day, tried the next, and started for a five-years' sojourn in San Quentin on the third day; and the public could afford to pay a hawk-eyed sleuth for the seven minutes services that occasionally might be required in such a case. But to pay such sleuths for weary months after weary months of repulsive service in hounding a noble and patriotic citizen who has done nothing except to pay out $200,000 to helpful supervisors in order to improve his business chances—sir, it is intolerable. My heart rebels at thought of it, and I rise in indignant protest. The tax-payers should make home row—I mean, Rome howl, in refusing to permit it."

"But if the tax-payers should not pay prosecution expenses, what shall be said of private citizens who go into their own pocket-books to secure what they malignantly term justice for the philanthropist who paid $200,000 for the privilege of supplying this city with the latest and most luxurious style of street-car straps, of which the citizens avail themselves at five cents per avail? Could human conduct be more basely objectionable? It could not. Yet these men proudly hold up their heads in our midst and act as if they were engaged in the laudable enterprise of prosecuting a man who has been unable to secure work and hence is amenable to the vagrancy law. The shame of it! Strange that they do not appreciate the infamy of helping to prosecute a man—I should say, a public benefactor. It should not be tolerated."

"But," said I, "if neither the public nor private citizens should pay for prosecution, who should?"

"That is not my affair," the Thoughtful Man replied. "Let the prosecution decide that for itself. Why should I mix in its affairs? I am merely expressing the sentiments of the large and honored class to which I belong, sentiments which you may hear repeated in some of our clubs almost every day. S'long."

And he s'longed. * * *

The Man Who Sows.

The man who sows a kindness, he may reap it by and by

In the country of our dreaming somewhere out beyond the sky;

The man who sows a duty, he may garner in its sheaves

Far beyond this narrow valley where the spirit hopes and grieves;

The man who sows a loyal faith may breathe its fragrance here.

It blossoms into sweeter life and blessing "Over There!"

These as they sow shall also reap, but this is true, I find:

Who sows but greed of yellow gold his harvest leaves behind.

The Wretch.

He gazed upon the cold tombstone which he had had erected to his wife's memory.

"She is at rest," the simple inscription read. There's two of us, he enigmatically said, as he turned from the quiet place to the burly-burly of the great world.

Wherefore it is written in the records that he was a wretch.

("The Graft Cases"—Concluded.)

argument of counsel and the jury's decision.

A large part of the evidence presented during the week just past has related to the papers stolen from the prosecution and found in the keeping of officials of the United Railroads. These papers, largely consisting of reports concerning jurymen, have been placed in evidence, and different batches of them have been identified as the property of the prosecution by Raymond Schindler and W. H. Russell, both of the prosecution's detective force, chief clerk Alexander McCabe of the district attorney's office, and Miss Marian Doyle, a stenographer. The defense, of course, attempted to minimize the effect of this evidence, but without shaking its credibility.

Alexander Lathan, Ruef's former chauffeur, who accompanied the ex-boss at the time the latter is supposed to have secured the money he paid the former supervisors for their votes for the United Railroads' franchise, refused to testify, on the ground that he might incriminate himself. Lathan's wife, however, furnished an interesting bit of testimony in swearing that when her husband left the state at the time when he was needed as a witness in the graft cases, he went in the employ of the father-in-law of Luther Brown, of the United Railroads detective agency. Moreover, according to her testimony, her traveling expenses as well as those of her husband and $150 a month, were paid for Lathan's services.

And at last, after an absence from the state of about two years, appeared George E. Starr, treasurer of the United Railroads, he having been recalled by the illness of his wife. The account books of that company, which were sent East, still are there, but Mr. Starr testified that Calhoun sent him East, and, further, that he had on August 23, 1906, on Calhoun's order, credited the United Railroads Investment Company with $200,000 on the books of the United Railroads, Calhoun explaining to him that he had borrowed this amount of the investment company. There was no attempt to explain the coincidence that $200,000 is the amount supposed to have been used in buying Ruef, Schmitz and the former supervisors.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

All rights of way for the extension of the Visalia electric railroad from that city to Woodlake and Redbanks have been secured, and contracts for grading are being let. The line will be constructed as rapidly as possible.

S. R. Barnett, editor and half owner of the Suisun Courier, and Miss May A. Cobb, of Copperopolis, were married last week. The bride formerly was a schoolma'am, and the groom being an editor, congratulations may be extended with neither hesitancy nor misgivings.

A Los Angeles company has purchased 3,200 acres of land in the Yucaipa valley, near Redlands. An irrigation system will be established, and then the land will be set out to cucalypts.

Thousands of acres of land near Hanford recently were flooded through a break in the levees along the Kings river, the volume of the river having been swelled by melting snows. The flooded country was about five miles long by a mile or two in breadth.

California's first capital, Monterey, recently decided by a ten to one vote to issue bonds in the sum of $150,000 for municipal improvements.

It is reported that all the bonds issued for the construction of the Clear Lake Northern railroad, to be laid between Lakeport and Pieta, have been sold.

Court records show that D. D. Gilstrap, of Gridley, has brought action for divorce against "Lillian J. S. D. A. Butts-Gilstrap." It appears that Mrs. Butts-Gilstrap was named after five aunts, as well as one or two other people, and, as all of the aunts now are dead, she has abbreviated her wealth of initials by substituting for the five the figure and letters "5 D. A.," the same being interpreted, "five dead aunts," her method of signing her name being that under which she is sued in the complaint.

New York capitalists have purchased 13,000 acres of the Hickman ranch in Stanislaus county. It is said that a large sum of money will be expended in cultivating and otherwise improving the land, a pea cannery to be one of the first improvements.

An unconfirmed rumor asserts that Asiatics employed on the Western Pacific Railroad in Nevada recently burned one of their number as a sacrifice to Buddha.

Last week a nugget bearing gold valued at $1,100 was taken from the Phoenix mine, near Harleton, Butte county.

A QUAIN LITERARY RELIC.

Thomas Wentworth Higginson, in an article on immortality in Harper's Bazar, quotes from a letter, never before published, written by Elizabeth Penbody, whom he calls the source and founder in America of the kindergarten system. The letter, addressed to a friend who had lost a child, includes these words: "Just now you are, I dare say, in the mood of Emerson's wail in the Threnody. Do you know that it was quite at first he poured out that song of woe, and it was not till a year afterward he wrote the rest—from the words, 'The Deep Heart Replied.' This fact gives both parts more meaning—and I think you will find solace in reading now the first part and thinking of the rich consolation it store and for you. But excuse me for making suggestions," the letter concludes, quaintly, "when God has spoken to you so intimately."

The well-merited appreciation of The Bank of Germany, 1225 Broadway, Oakland, is due to the capable financial methods of the well-known business men forming its board of directors. Their energy and foresight have placed it among the leading institutions of its kind in Oakland.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Two Good Men Decline to Run The writing of this page has been deferred to the last possible moment in the hope that the events which have crowded the social calendar of the week would eliminate the choice of Republican candidates for mayor in San Francisco before The California Weekly goes to press. However, when this is written, James Rolph, Jr., and Marshall Hale, the two men either of whom would seem sure to be elected if he would consent to run, have not refused, and the Independent Republicans are still at sea for a candidate. The striking fact, however, is that the Municipal League of Independent Republican Clubs has risen, in a few weeks, to be tacitly regarded by the public as being the controlling element of the Republican party in San Francisco, and, more the deciding factor in the municipal campaign. The League is a group of district clubs, organized under the model club in the Thirty-Ninth District under the active direction of Edwin McMurray and with the cooperation of a body of men of remarkably high average of public spirit and character. The League absorbed most of the strength of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League for the municipal needs of the hour. Each club elected "conferees" to attend a "conference" committee meeting—in reality a convention, but a convention directly responsible to the district clubs which must endorse or condemn the action of the conferees. And at the end the convention binds nobody; it simply acts as an organized expression of recommendation of a ticket as a means of attracting public attention to the best men that the best sense of a representative gathering of Republicans can agree to recommend.

Old and New Conventions The action of the San Francisco Democratic Club (the anti-McNab Democrats) in holding a similar conference, indicates what The California Weekly has before pointed out, that no system of nominations will ever eliminate the pre-nominating gatherings to unite on candidates. Such an end, in fact, is undesirable; the desirable thing, and the thing that the direct primary seems to achieve, is the elimination of the old style convention with power to practically "freeze out" all candidates for office not "slated" by the practical politicians.

Heney is the Issue Of course, the sensational and encouraging event of the week is Francis J. Heney's agreement to enter the race for district attorney. The Independent Democrats have nominated him and he has accepted, and the issue, thus squarely raised, makes it inevitable that the independent Republicans will follow suit and that the Good Government League (rapidly growing in strength and likely to be a powerful factor in the campaign) will do likewise. Mr. Heney did not want the office, but when it became evident that Nat Coughlan and "Cold Feet" Fickert were the only others in the field it became necessary for him to enter the race. Coughlan, in reply to Heney's attacks on him, thoroughly discredited himself by a letter of virulent and vulgar abuse, published only by the disreputable Evening Globe. The candidacy of Mr. Heney is a good thing. It puts the paramount issue squarely before the people, and the coming campaign will clearly separate the sheep from the goats in San Francisco as a result.

Union Labor Entanglements The Union Labor ticket is having a rough road. Even the Royal Arch is complaining against having nine saloonkeepers among the eighteen candidates for supervisors, fearing its effect on public sentiment in favor of prohibition. McCarthy, with his Call libel suit, and with the discrediting co-operation of Jerome Bassitt and Eddy Yoell, is in an uncomfortable position toward the public. Tom Finn, the chameleonic water-front politician, is still impudently claiming that he will receive the Republican endorsement for sheriff—a grim piece of irony if true, which it isn't. Mulcrey has failed to work the independent Democrats for an endorsement for county clerk.

Campaign Possibilities Among the possibilities as candidates are H. G. Mathewson for auditor (he is now chief deputy and commended to the Republicans by the retiring auditor, Goodhue for recorder); and Percy V. Long for city attorney—all Republicans. Another probability is that many of the present supervisors will run for re-election on the strength of the Good Government League's pledge to endorse heartily the candidacy of any incumbent who has made a good record—a pledge that involves the endorsement of all but two or three members of the present board.

League of Justice Not Lincoln-Roosevelt A "rousing" League of Justice was formed at Los Angeles a short time since and a committee of one hundred is at work completing the organization for effective work. A mistaken notion has gone out that this league is to take the place of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League. This is not so. The League of Justice is non-partisan. The Lincoln-Roosevelt League is political. The first has to do solely with the reformation of the judiciary and of judicial procedure to the end that justice may be more speedily and impartially administered. The second has to do with the emancipation of the Republican party from corporate domination in this state. Both organizations will be offered by essentially the same type of citizen if not the same persons, and neither can accomplish its purpose unless the other accomplishes its purpose also. It will be impossible to reform the judiciary in this state and still permit Mr. Herrin to name the judges, and it will be impossible to reform the criminal procedure and permit the Herrin organization to control the legislature; and yet the League of Justice has mainly to do with justice without regard to party, whereas the Lincoln-Roosevelt League, bidding godspeed to the better element in Democratic politics, will find hard work in reforming the Republican party from corporate domination. These two leagues are friends and allies, but neither has been substituted for the other in the cradle.

League of Justice to be Made National Prof. George H. Boke City taking steps necessary for making the League of Justice national. It is a grand concept and the need for it is certainly national. It will be a splendid achievement for California if it shall become a national movement for the reformation of criminal laws and procedures and the securing of better men to occupy judicial positions. The malady from which we suffer is national and not state. California is not the only state in the union whose appellate judges are carefully selected by the political handy men of a great corporation, selected because of types of mind suitable to the purposes which these great corporations have at heart, or selected that they may remember at the crucial instant who was that selected them. New York is as much corporation-ridden as California, and Pennsylvania is more so. Professor Boke has entered upon a magnificent undertaking. California sends greeting to New York and craves its co-operation in making the League of Justice national in its scope and as efficacious in producing results as comprehensive in its field of operation.

The Saloon Issue While Los Angeles does not hold its city election until spring, municipal politics is beginning to ferment there already and there are signs that the saloon issue may cut some figure in the campaign. Los Angeles has the best system of saloon regulation in the state, but it has the saloon and the saloon as an institution is under condemnation there as everywhere, despite the fact that the saloons of Los Angeles are as decent as saloons can be made. But the stirring up of this issue is not coming from prohibitionists or anti-saloon forces in any form. It is coming from the liquor interests that have grown resolute under restriction and want to widen the saloon zone and lessen the quantity of liquor which may be sold in original packages not to be drunk on the premises. No city that has taken a forward step in this particular ever took a backward one to stay backward, and Los Angeles will not. It will not suffer the saloon to invade the residence districts under any pretense and, if the issue be forced, it may do as Fresno has voted to do, cut the saloon out altogether and confine liquor selling to restaurants and family liquor stores. However, the forces are lining up and can hardly fail to be a factor in the next campaign.

Wallace for Mayor of Los Angeles San Francisco, like San Francisco, suffers from an embarrassment of riches when it comes to men fit to be mayor, but, like San Francisco, it has not always selected its best timber. In fact it has made mayors of indifferent stuff for some years, with results lamentable to contemplate. Indications now are that public sentiment is looking about for the man for the place and, among others, it is looking over the qualifications of A. J. Wallace. If it wants a clean man, thoroughly conversant with public business, it will find such an one in Mr. Wallace. A trouble in both the big cities is that the best men are still in business harness and loth to hang it on the peg for a short term as city executive. We need more men who, having acquired enough to make them independent, are disposed to give some years to the service of a public that made it possible for them to become independent.

It Was Nice Of Nat Coughlan The Honorable Nat Coughlan conferred an important favor upon the citizenry of San Francisco when he launched his philippic against Francis J. Heney, and especially when he launched it in the Globe. Everybody now knows exactly where Nat stands. All should have known it equally well before, but Nat has now, himself, taken cognizance of his own state of mind and political affiliations. Not one man can now vote for him for district attorney with any expectation that, if elected, he will do anything that the higher-ups do not want done, or will fail of doing anything they do want done. There is nothing like having the issue made plain. Thanks to Nat. Awfully grateful, don't you know.

SAN FRANCISCO TRACTION PROBLEM

Second Article. By WILLIAM KENT.

In my first paper, published in The California Weekly of June 4th, there were considered the broader theoretical outlines of the relations that should exist between an intramural transportation system and the city. It was shown that transportation, being a necessity, should either be furnished directly by the municipality or else under stringent license by an agent of the city, and that in the revocable (but not confiscatory) terms of such license lay the only ability of the city to control its agent.

Granting such control there is an open question as to whether or not the city should directly operate the roads. Whether municipal ownership of the franchise rights with full control and with private operation is more advisable than the assumption by the city of this function. In favor of the city's operation of transportation, as opposed to the plan made necessary in Chicago on account of inability to raise money for the purchase of the properties, there is first of all the fact that the city would enjoy all net profits, instead of 55 per cent. of such profits.

There is a saving in obtaining money for construction and equipment; inasmuch as a municipality can borrow at a rate of 4 per cent., where even a protected corporation must at present pay 5 per cent. Brokerage and construction profits can also be eliminated from the charges against the city.

Granting equally good management under public as under private operation, there would be little doubt that with the economies above mentioned, Chicago could, by dropping its 55 per cent. of net receipts, furnish its patrons with the longest of hauls, and the best of service, for a four cent fare and have a comfortable margin for unexpected contingencies. But the limitations of bonded indebtedness made it impossible for Chicago to adopt this policy, and so in spite of a desire for municipal operation the other plan was adopted as the only choice.

The opponents of municipal operation oftenest satisfy themselves by making the assertion that cities are necessarily incompetent and corrupt and therefore should not be entrusted with any so-called business enterprises.

Certainly no business can be performed except under the continuity of a non-political civil service. As far as corruption and mismanagement are concerned no public operation can ever be more disastrous to the community or the stockholders than some of the "private enterprise" concerns have been.

A municipal government capable of organizing an intelligent, fair and honest system of control ought certainly, with proper civil service laws, to be capable of operating.

The danger that rests in the possibility of a vast army of employees organizing to run politics in their own interests is more worthy of consideration, but even this could doubtless be fended against.

There is no danger so great as the one that springs from the hostile attitude of unrestricted individual greed, with its continuing assaults on the integrity of public officials.

Personally I believe that the close and more obviously municipal government approaches the welfare of the citizen, the more attention the citizen will pay to municipal government, and intelligent active interest is the need and the hope of democratic government.

Indirect Tax of Compensation.

The Chicago plan provides for a division of net profits, in other words the city levies an indirect tax on the traveling public. This indirect tax resulted in the city's obtaining in the first year of the arrangement approximately $1,500,000. Under ordinary conditions such an indirect tax would be entirely indefensible. The city's profit should be left in the pockets of the riding public. But Chicago had declared for municipal ownership, and the only means by which this could be obtained under bond limitation was by accumulating a fund for this purpose. The tax is one levied on present patrons for the benefit of future patrons, and cannot be expended for general purposes. Moreover, the city can use its percentage, if it so desires, for the lowering of fares.

Anyone who has been through the war against franchise privilege can foresee and foretell with accuracy the arguments that will be used against any effort to curtail the privileges of municipal beneficiaries. Our old friend "Vested Rights" will immediately leap to the front, and will proclaim that the pleasant license already enjoyed must be continued indefinitely, or there is the horrid injustice of "confiscation." We shall hear the pitiful wailings of Wall street "widows and orphans" who have placed their little all in the gold bricks and toy balloons of inflated finance. At the most heated period of the Chicago struggle, Mr. "Dooley" solemnly advocated hanging the "id—widdies and orphans" as the real oppressors of the city.

We shall hear much of the corruption and incompetence of city government, but nothing of the swindling of "high finance," or the wickedness of purchased legislation and corrupted juries. We shall be told that we are fouling our own nest, whenever we try to kill off the insects that infest it. And worst of all, from Captains of Industry and the bankers, brokers, and lawyers they own, we shall learn the awful news that CAPITAL is being DRIVEN AWAY, and that from now on we must make our choice, "surrender or walk." Chicago did not surrender, Chicago is riding in luxury, and the bankers who once sold inflated "Yerkisms" under bogus guar-

THE EUCALYPTS IN CALIFORNIA

IV. THE PRODUCT: ITS USE AND VALUE

Written for The California Weekly by GEORGE W. PEAVY, United States Forest Service.

The idea of treating timber trees as a crop, planting and harvesting them in regular rotation, is a novel one to the average American. Europeans accustomed for generations to the utilization of forest crops regard the matter as prosaic as they do the production of barley and potatoes. The forester of foreign countries, fortified by the results of centuries of practical experience, can tell almost to a nicety the volume of material which a given tract of land will produce if planted to a certain species of tree. In our own country, forestry is still almost a matter of experiment that the volume and character of the returns from tree planting are largely a matter of conjecture. It is true that European experience is of some use and that the examination of native forests yields valuable data, but until our lands have been classified through the harvesting of crops of forest trees on them, forestry proper in this country cannot be the exact science it is abroad.

Uses of the Eucalypts: Shelter Belts.

The planting of eucalypts in California has been practically for three purposes: To form shelter belts for the production of citrus or other crops, to produce wood for other domestic uses, and to grow material for the market. To urge the importance of wind-breaks to the orchardist or rancher of southern California is unnecessary. They have become a common and most important factor in the horticultural development of that part of the state. In fact, the necessity for shelter belts is so great that in some sections certain crops cannot be raised without them. To their protection may be attributed, in a large measure, the fine quality of California's citrus crop and through their agency large sums are indirectly returned to the state. Properly managed, the wind-break may also be made to yield a large amount of fuel and, near seaport towns, piling for wharf construction.

In the San Joaquin and Sacramento valleys there is a wide field for the extension of this form of planting. A systematic introduction of eucalypts in those regions would, in the aggregate, return almost untold wealth to the ranchers by lessening the effect of the hot, drying winds which sweep up and down the valleys. At the same time, the trees would make the country more attractive by breaking the monotony of the level stretches; they would furnish a supply of wood for domestic purposes and shade for the stock. It is very evident that these two regions are now yielding but a fraction of the wealth which they are capable of producing, and it is very important that attention be directed to shelter belt planting as one step toward bringing them to a higher degree of productivity.

Eucalypts for Domestic Uses.

Closely associated with shelter belt planting has been that for producing material suited to use as fuel, posts, etc., upon the ranch. The available supply of native oak is rapidly diminishing and it is very desirable that the rancher should have an independent wood supply for future consumption. There is hardly a ranch which does not have some waste land in arroyos or on hillsides which could be put to growing eucalypts, and the thrifty rancher should see that such land is put to this use. He may be sure that any surplus which may be produced will find a reasonably good market.

Commercial Planting.

The business of planting eucalypts for the purpose of producing commodities for the market is still in its infancy in this state. Just how remunerative the business will prove is still largely a matter of guess-work since the future market is uncertain and the productive-ness of the various grades of soil and the adaptability of the different species of American grown eucalypts to commercial uses have not yet been determined. Groves have been estimated which show a yield of more than 115,000 feet board measure, or 25,000 cubic feet of material per acre in eight years. It is well to understand, however, that no mill man, under present conditions, would get that amount of merchantable lumber out of them. This is without question a phenomenal growth—one that could not be duplicated unless the conditions under which it was made could be reproduced. On the other hand, groves have been measured which have produced only 6,000 feet board measure, or 3,000 cubic feet of material in twenty-eight years. These are extreme cases of course. It is very certain, however, that the yield from the great majority of commercial plantations will fall far below the maximum figures indicated above.

From measurements made by the forest service of about 180,000 trees grown under all conditions, the following average figures for height, diameter, and volume growth were obtained:

Age Years.	Height Feet.	Diameter Inches.	Volume Cords.	Value Per Acre.
6	48	4.0	32	22
8	55	4.6	20	29
10	61	5.2	34	38
12	65	5.8	38	44
14	70	6.4	44	50
16	73	7.0	43	56
18	76	7.4	46	62
20	78	8.0	48	68

It must be understood, of course, that the poorest as well as the best grades of groves are included in these measurements and that individual trees in the poorest groves will exceed the diameter and height figures, while in the best groves individual trees will fall below these averages. The purpose of quoting them here is expressed in the hope that they will serve as a mental corrective to those who are inclined to accept as authoritative the yield estimates presented by some of the eucalyptus companies. This information is quite different from that told in a booklet issued by one of the most prominent of the eucalyptus companies, in which Circular 2, published as the result of a co-operative study made by the forest service and the state, is quoted as showing the average diameter growth of trees grown in all sorts of places and under all conditions to be eleven inches at ten years, and the height ninety-two feet for the same period.

Present Market Conditions.

At present there are three principal uses for which eucalyptus timber can be employed. These are fuel, piling, and lumber in its various forms. The fuel market is not an active one. In general, consumers will not accept eucalyptus if oak can be had. About San Francisco, it is not generally even used for fuel purposes, some of the dealers even refusing to handle it. This may be due to improper methods of seasoning. In Santa Barbara and the vicinity of Los Angeles, the price to the consumer is from $10 to $12 per cord, delivered. The owner of a cordwood grove can get from $1 to $1.50 per cord on the stump. The difference between the stumpage price and the price to the consumer represents the cost of working the stuff up, delivery, and the middleman's profit.

American grown eucalypts have never given satisfactory results in contact with the soil. Consequently, there is no market for the timber for use in the form of posts, poles, or railroad ties. It may be possible that improved methods of seasoning or the application of preservatives will increase the durability of the timber in contact with the soil to such a degree that it will have a value for the purposes above mentioned. The planting of eucalypts to supply a market which does not exist, and for a use to which the timber is not fitted, is precarious business from the investor's point of view. At the least, and the man who buys eucalyptus acreage on the representation of some concern which promises him a yield of 500 poles per acre valued at $5 each may very properly be said to be taking a "flier," in spite of the fact that he may have been assured that the estimate is a most conservative one.

The common blue gum, E. globulus, has proved to be decidedly satisfactory for use as piling. It is comparatively resistant to the attacks of marine borers and does not readily decay in the water. It is a difficult piece of timber to handle for this purpose, however, owing to its great weight and to the fact that it cannot be floated. Eucalyptus piles from thirty to sixty feet in length and with a butt diameter of from twelve to eighteen inches are now being delivered at the San Francisco dock for from twenty to twenty-four cents per linear foot or, in round numbers, from $6 to $16 each. If the cost of cutting and hauling is taken into consideration such trees are worth on the stump from $2 to $10 each. It will be readily understood that a plantation must be located close to the market in order to make the production of this form of material profitable. At the same time, only selected trees will be accepted since comparatively straight sticks are required.

But few of the eucalypts planted in this state have reached a size suitable for sawing into lumber; consequently, there is a very limited market for stumpage for this purpose. About $15 per thousand may be regarded as an average figure for this class of material. As in the case of timber for piles, only the choicest trees will be purchased by the millman. The price indicated above, $15 per thousand, which the owner of the grove receives for his material, is quite at variance with the price, $130 per thousand, which some of the eucalyptus companies selling stock and acreage say will be received. It should be clearly understood that the first of these prices is the value of the raw material on the stump; the second is the price of the manufactured product of the highest grade ready for the consumer. The wide discrepancy between the two prices represents the items of cost and profit in cutting, milling, seasoning, transporting, and marketing the material. The first price is similar to that of the wool on the sheep's back; the second to the price of the finished garment; or to use another figure, the first may represent the rough stone as it comes from the quarry, the second the same material in the finished structure. It is as reasonable to base a quotation of the price of wool or the price of marble on their final form as it is to quote the price of the highest grade of the finest finished material as the price which the grower of eucalyptus timber will receive for his uncut material. At present, a good grade of eucalyptus lumber, cut from mature trees, is being imported from Australia and laid down in San Francisco for $85 per thousand feet, board measure. In large lots a price of $77 per thousand can be made.

The Cost of Establishing Plantations.

Those who have been paying or who contemplate paying from $150 to $300 per acre for land planted up to eucalypts will perhaps be interested in knowing just what it costs per acre to establish eucalyptus plantations. In the first place, the initial cost of lands similar to those which certain of the companies are offering for sale is $8 to $30 per acre. Some companies, without question, have purchased more expensive lands. The cost of thoroughly preparing an acre of ground for planting should not exceed $6. Seedlings can be purchased for $6 per thousand. Actual planting has been done this season for less than $3 per acre, planting 1,000 trees to the acre. The cost of cultivating and otherwise caring for an acre for two years should not exceed $6. Assigning a value of $25 per acre for the land, the total cost of carrying a plantation through to the end of the second year should not be in excess of $50, a figure which will include interest on the investment, taxes, and protection against fire.

As was indicated in the preceding of these articles, it is certain that the business of growing eucalypts for profit has a great future in California. It is equally certain that it will be carried on eventually, not by companies selling stock and acreage, but by conservative business men who are willing to undertake an enterprise from which the returns will be moderate but comparatively sure. No business man is attracted by an investment which holds out promise of a return of 30 per cent to 240 per cent, on his money. It is very certain that many people are now putting their money into eucalyptus culture who have absolutely no conception of the business, many of whom are going into it on the installment basis and who will as inevitably default in their payments as do those who buy life insurance or investment insurance with the expectation of realizing large returns in the form of dividends.

The state forester, in a recent interview on the subject of the commercial planting of eucalypts very pointedly says that it appears that some of the companies are more concerned in obtaining the widow's mite than in actually propagating eucalyptus timber. There can be no question that it is more important that the mite of the widow and of others of moderate means should be safeguarded than that people now comparatively wealthy should be further enriched. The American Lumberman, perhaps the most conservative publication representing the lumber business in the United States, says in a recent editorial:

"There are signs that eucalyptus schemes are going to be presented to the public without anything but wind back of them, which will yield phenomenal profits to their promoters but heavy loss to those who invest their money. We fear that many people, within the next few years, are going to invest their money in eucalyptus prospectuses and handsomely prepared stock certificates, deeds and contracts, instead of real eucalyptus properties."

After all, the eucalypts are only trees, which live and grow according to laws as to those of the Medes and Persians. They must have space in which to grow, moisture and sunlight. Treated rationally, they are sure to become a valuable resource. Exploited like a bonanza mine, they are sure to yield disappointment and loss.

HAVING concluded the discussion of the question for the evening, the charter members of the Galoot club found themselves the sole occupants of the smoking room. Instinctively elevating their feet to the periphery of the card table and tipping back in their chairs, they put themselves in a state of respectful receptivity for another installment of personal romance which, for some time, the Reverend had, in strictest confidence, been disclosing to each other.

"Look here, Judge," demanded the newspaper man, "you have listened to all that the rest of us have had to disclose in relation to our experiences in affairs of the heart, but, aside from an occasional and cautious expression of astonishment, you have been strictly mum. Tote fair, Judge. It is your turn."

"The fact of the matter is," declared the Judge, apologetically, "there has not been in my life the smallest element of the romantic."

"I can well believe you," ventured the Professor, "for the domestic life altogether, which your married life comes as near as may be to typifying the best that is possible in connubial felicity, and in such instances I have noticed that there is apt to be little of romance."

"I thank you, sir," said the Judge, bowing to the Professor in the courtly manner which had so much to do with his being made and retained as Superior Judge in and for that county. "And really," he continued, "I can not say that you are far in the wrong. It has not occurred to me that there is anything wanting to make my domestic life altogether agreeable to me, and I have the happiness to believe that it is not less agreeable to my wife. I think that our happiness in each other has not cost either of us a conscious effort."

"A case of pure affinity, I suppose," observed the newspaper man, "but tell us about it, anyway. It is your turn, and you can tell something."

"I do not mind telling you gentlemen the little there is to be told about our courtship and marriage," replied the Judge, "but I warn you that my story will be short and wholly uninteresting."

"My wife's brother and I chanced to be chums at college. Charles always was communicative and, as he seldom tired of telling me about his sister Nell, I conclude that he was equally inclined to writing to his sister Nell about me. At all events, when I went home with him at vacation his sister came to meet us at the gate and, after kissing him, extended her hand to me and said: 'I know all about you already.'"

"Thanks to your brother, I feel quite a little acquainted with you," I replied. We went into the house, fell to visiting, and have been visiting ever since. If you gentlemen can make a romance out of that you are quite at liberty to do so."

"It was agreed that, however satisfactory wedded life might be under such circumstances, the manner of its being brought about was excessively uninteresting as material for romance."

"But, gentlemen," the Judge continued, "while I am able to impart to you nothing of romantic interest in relation to my own courtship and marriage, I can relate a quasi-personal experience which befell me only four years ago that will tax your faith in my sanity to the utmost."

"You know me, for a matter-of-fact man, one who has had small patience with the ists and isms which so many (if I may so designate them without giving offense) shallow persons affect. It is because of my known attitude towards everything of this kind that I venture upon this narrative with the greatest timidity."

"All of you, no doubt, noticed the recent reports in the newspapers touching the death of the Reverend Oliver Langworthy, rector of a popular church in one of the fashionable suburbs of Chicago. The incident was discussed at the time around this table, but no satisfactory explanation of the manner of it was afforded and, indeed, the Chicago police are still as much at sea to account for the affair as ever. I am sure for it perfectly, and perhaps ought to, and yet I should enter upon the task with the heartiest reluctance."

"You will remember that the remains of deceased were found in a small summer house or study in a corner of the grounds of the rectory. The discovery was accidental, the roof of the study having been burned by sparks from a fire across the alleyway. Also that the remains were found in a low chamber over the study, approached through a closet by a ladder fashioned of slats nailed at intervals across the wall, the rude stair being concealed by a curtain hung up before it. The chamber was ventilated by two small apertures in the gables and was furnished with only a mattress, robes and coverlets, spread with considerable abundance upon the floor.

"No marks of violence were found upon the body and the autopsy disclosed no organic reason for the departure of life, save a noticeable emaciation, which, however, was not great. Deceased had been absent from his duties little more than a week. His wife testified at the inquest that her husband was supposedly absent on a visit to Boston and intermediate cities, and she produced letters from him, written upon hotel paper at Detroit, Rochester, Albany and Boston, the latest mailed only four days previous to the discovery of his remains, but an examination of the hotel registers at those places failed to disclose his having registered there and none of his friends, whom he wrote as having seen, had seen him during his absence from Chicago, yet for the first time in his letters relating to his friends was strictly true in each instance, even to the smallest particular. Beyond these known facts the detective forces of Chicago have not progressed, as I learn from a letter from the chief of police received this morning, in making an inquiry I made as sympathizing friend."

"Now for my share in the mystery. It doubtless has not been forgotten by any of you that, four years ago, I spent a number of weeks visiting in the east, returning home through Florida, Key West, Galveston and by the Sunset route."

"To come at once to the point, while in Chicago on Sunday I started out quite early on one of the suburban railways and, riding about aimlessly until the hour of church service, my feet, chance dropped into the church where the Rev. Oliver Langworthy was rector."

"Gentlemen, the sermon I heard that day marked an epoch in my religious life. The edifice was crowded to suffocation and rapid attention was given. The duration of the sermon cannot have been over forty minutes, but so absorbed was I that I was not aware of its possessing the element of duration. The speaker was delicately organized, but his voice was ringing and resonant and not an intonation was lost by his hearers."

"What his text was, if he took one, I do not recall, but he talked of the people, of their struggles in life and in soul-life, disclosing such knowledge of the subtler phases of the mind and heart of the world as astonished me beyond measure. He took his congregation by the hand, as it were, and led them through the labyrinths of the heart and mind of human kind, explaining processes of action as a father to his children."

"I was so charmed with the sermon that I remained in my seat until the congregation had dispersed and, handing my card to one of the ushers, begged the privilege of speaking to the rector personally. I was invited into his study at the chapel, intending only to thank him encouragingly and to express my surprise at the depth and compass of his information, but before I knew it I had spent an hour of sweetest communion with what seemed to be almost a divine personality. When we parted it was like a parting of friends of long standing."

"By divine personality," interrupted the newspaper man, "I presume you intend us to infer that the eloquent gentleman was a hectic. I have noticed that where there has been a blessed outpouring of the divine spirit men in the full flush of health and vigor are regarded as of the earth, beefy."

"Objection overruled, with leave to amend at some proper time," remarked the Judge with chilling civility, as he resumed his narrative."

"I continued on my way eastward, then southward, and in due season reached St. Augustine, Florida, where I took rooms at the Alcazar."

"As I entered the dining room for lunch, and allowed my eyes to scan the hundred strange faces at the tables, I was astonished to find at one of them the strikingly refined physiognomy of the Reverend Oliver Langworthy. Catching sight of me, he beckoningly invited me to have a seat at his table, which I did."

"He explained that he had been summoned to St. Augustine to the bedside of a dying parishioner and was to leave for home with the remains at a very early hour the next morning. He was glad, he said, to meet one who might induce him into more cheerful atmosphere, the strain upon his organism having been more tense than he could well bear."

"The hotel was just then the rendezvous of an editorial association, and gentlemen of the press and their female companions were much in evidence. That evening they were invited to dine in a body at the Ponce de Leon and, as I had been invited to join the party, bringing with me any friend I chose, I requested the pleasure of the company of my clerical friend and he accepted with undisguised satisfaction."

"The afternoon was spent in the most agreeable manner possible, only a single incident transpiring that was in any way noteworthy. In looking through the gardens of the Ponce de Leon we came unexpectedly upon a gentleman and lady walking among the shrubbery. My companion suddenly turned upon his heel and, catching me by the arm, drew me rapidly away. He readily confessed, as soon as we had passed out of sight, that a vis-a-vis meeting with that couple, in view of the little diversion we had planned, would be decidedly not to the purpose."

"The dinner hour arrived and, having dressed, we moved toward the Ponce de Leon. To my surprise, my companion led me by a circuitous path to an unfrequented part of the ample gardens in shadow from the electric lights, then, turning full upon me, in a low tone, but with great earnestness, not unmingled with emotion, said:

"It seems to me that you have known you always, as perhaps I have, for who can know of a certainty whence we come or whither we go. I am about to trust you with my deepest secret, a secret that I have shared with none other, but present conditions are extraordinary and justify extraordinary measures. You have marveled at my knowledge of the human soul and of life. I am about to show you how I came by that knowledge. Trust me now as you have felt trust in me until now, and do not evince surprise at anything that takes place. It will be best for me to assume a customary incognito for the evening, which I will at once proceed to do."

"Casting a hurried glance about him to see if anyone were approaching, he dropped upon his hands and knees and disappeared under a thick copse of vines and shrubbery. I walked to and fro for perhaps ten minutes, when I saw someone approaching from the other side of the copse, through a by-path. Taking my arm, this person said: 'Now we are ready,' and led me out into the light."

"And here, gentlemen, is where I must put my reputation for veracity and sanity to a severe, but only preliminary, test. How shall according to amount; small loans of $500 to $1,000 bearing the higher rates, and those of, say, $1,000 and upwards, bearing the lowest of six per cent.

I have some mortgages on hand now for sale on that basis, besides several applications for new loans on the same terms.

Did you ever stop to consider the advantages offered by a loan like this where you are sole master of the situation so far as this one investment is concerned, and for a lot of other reasons, can name?

This is the safest class of investment known to-day.

The security is almost invariably double the amount of the loan and sometimes a good deal more. Mortgage, note, fire insurance policy and certificate of title go with each loan.

To complete a loan you can either come to my office yourself, call through your bank or send the money to me, as you choose.

I personally inspect the security for every loan, examine all the papers in the transaction, select reliable fire insurance and title companies and collect and remit the interest to you every month or every quarter, as you like, without charge to you.

The borrower pays all expenses.

I have placed millions of dollars on these loans without a single loss or forfeiture.

I turn down lots of applications for loans because I am not personally satisfied with every detail. Those that I offer to my clients I guarantee are all right in every way.

I invite closest investigation of my loans, my methods and myself.

The population of Oakland is 240,000 and growing fast; there is much of activity in building and other lines of development here, plenty of opening for capital, and, consequently, unlimited opportunity for the use of money.

Send for list of loans now on hand, and to facilitate matters please state in what amounts you want them. I'd like to write to you.

I make others, and especially the police department of the city of Chicago, believe that which is inherently so preposterous, and yet, to me, so absolutely unquestionable?

"Rest easy, Judge, about the police department of the city of Chicago," interrupted the newspaper man reassuringly. "If it is anything like our own department you can give it a fill with any old thing."

This interruption endured with so little grace that the newspaper man was perceptibly abashed and did not "chip in," as he called it, until another irresistible opportunity offered.

"At the moment when Oliver Longworthy disappeared under that shrubbery he was of rather less than medium stature, thin to the point of sparseness, so delicate in organism as to suggest invalidism, stooped in the shoulders and his whiskers were thin and almost downy in texture. When he came out from thence he stood shoulder to shoulder with me, and my height is just six feet, was straight as an arrow, weighed not less than 200 pounds, and his beard was thick and bristly. His skimmed-milk complexion had changed to a ruddy peachblow."

"Mr. Hyde," announced the newspaper man with much confidence, but the constrained glances of his associates confined him to the single ejaculation and the Judge proceeded with his narrative.

"You promised not to be surprised at anything," he said, as I halted under the full glare of the electric light and, with heart beating wildly, gazed full upon him.

"But," said I, "when I made that promise I did not have in contemplation the witnessing of a new birth in the image of one's maker."

Automobile Notes.

"In finish of body, no concern manufacturing automobiles has arrived at the point acquired by the Studebaker company in its fifty years of vehicle making," says the manager of the San Francisco Studebaker branch. "Every car turned out by the Studebaker factory has been given twenty-eight separate operations in the paint shop, occupying a period of eight weeks, and one needs but to inspect the upholstery to appreciate why persons of distinctive taste purchase Studebaker cars."

"Mechanically, the Studebaker concern embraces all that is regarded as best practice among skilled mechanics of the industry. Take the make-and-break system of ignition for instance. As applied in the Studebaker-Garford cars, it has killed the argument of every salesman who has jump-spark ignition to offer. It accomplishes all that is asked of it, and so much more that the man who has longest owned a Studebaker-Garford becomes the most enthusiastic talker in its behalf. Never has the old adage, 'A pleased customer is the best advertisement,' proven more correct than in the growth of the Studebaker automobile business throughout the country."

The official announcement has just been made that kerosene may be used as fuel in the 1910 models of the White Steamer. This is the first time that any important automobile concern has been able to recommend any fuel other than gasoline and the innovation is of no small significance. It has many times been predicted that with the number of automobiles constantly increasing there would soon come a time when it would not be possible to produce sufficient gasoline, at least at anywhere near a reasonable price.

Kerosene as a fuel obviously possesses many advantages over gasoline. First of all is the greatly reduced cost of kerosene, which in some sections of the country is only one-half to one-third that of gasoline. Secondly, kerosene may be obtained wherever civilized men dwell together, because it is in universal use as an illuminant and it can be stored anywhere and handled with impunity. There is not a cross-roads store, there is hardly a farm-house, where the tourist cannot procure a supply of kerosene. Thirdly, kerosene is more efficient than gasoline as a fuel in that a gallon of kerosene contains about 15 per cent. more heat units than a gallon of gasoline, and therefore a car can travel proportionately further on a gallon of kerosene.

A DAY IN A DRY TOWN

By ONE OF THE STAFF.

Tulare City was the first town in the San Joaquin Valley to vote "dry." It has had more than a year of experience without a saloon in it and anyone acquainted with the town before it went dry will be interested to learn just what the situation now is and how Tulare people feel about it. That The California Weekly might carry this message to other communities a representative of the staff spent last Saturday in Tulare, and what is here set down as true is true.

A bit of review of the history of this valley will be useful to an understanding of the shake-up which the campaign for a dry town gave it. It was organized by the Pacific Improvement Company, when the old Southern Pacific was built up the valley, and it was made a division headquarters, with repair shops, and was typically a railroad town. When the policy of concentration and elimination in railroad operation came into vogue, three divisions were concentrated into two and the division headquarters, shops, etc., were removed from Tulare, and the people scattered from Oakland to Los Angeles. The town lost a third of its population, and was set down as finished, it not dead.

To work out of this condition an irrigation district was organized with the purpose of increasing the supply of water for irrigation in the surrounding country, and the town bonded itself with the district for half a million dollars. The panic of '93 left the farmers without a market for their products; they first defaulted on the interest on these bonds and then, being badly advised, sought to repudiate them. After a five years' contest a compromise was effected, the debt discharged and the bonds burnt. Meantime hundreds of houses had been moved out of town, in the hope of saving something out of the wreck, and the population had been reduced from 3,000 to scarcely more than 2,000 souls.

After the burning of the bonds it took some years for the people to recover from the herculean effort put forth to pay the debt and, just as the people were on their feet with fine prospects for good times, here came this agitation for a dry town. As elsewhere, the saloons had been run regardless of decency. High school lads were being ruined and workmen were being robbed of their wages and a few petty gamblers thrived. The merchants and property owners, who had borne ten years of struggle with patience and fortitude, felt unequal to this new burden and, almost to a man, opposed prohibition. They pleaded that the business would go to Visalia and Hanford, on the one side, and to Porterville and Bakersfield on the other, and the prohibitionists would be dry as a bone. They were right, greater than they could bear, and that without effecting the purpose they had in view, as prohibition would not prohibit.

Do Not Want Saloons Back.

During his "Day in a Dry Town," the writer of this continued his inquiries to those who had opposed making the town dry and had voted against it. With one accord they all freely confessed that not one of the bad effects they had anticipated had resulted. Being a dry town had brought as much trade as it had cost. Men who had never thought of trading at Tulare drove there to trade because it was dry or, if they did not drive, they came by train. The trade of the town has so increased that all the old saloon buildings were speedily occupied by other lines of business, and only two store rooms are now vacant. One of these was vacated only a short time ago, so that the stockkeeper might enlarge his facilities and double his stock. It is to be doubted if Tulare has one business man who would vote to bring back the saloons.

One old resident, who had been a drinking man all his life, put it this way: "I have had my whisky all my life, and will have it here if there is any in the country to be had. I buy it by the keg and keep it in my home, but I don't want any more dirty saloons in my town." Another, who once kept a saloon himself, said: "I want my beer once in a while. I think I ought to have it and that there ought to be some way for me to get it, but I don't want any more saloons in Tulare." Few felt that the present status was final, but no one wanted the saloons back. It was conceded that about all the old fellows who had habitually used whisky still use it, but less than ever before, while great numbers who drank beer or whisky because it confronted them everywhere, and not because they cared especially for either, go without it to their gain. The money they formerly spent for such things they now spend for better things to eat and wear, and general business is helped and absolutely not hurt.

Advertising Value of "Dryness."

Another important result has followed. Having voted the town dry, the people capitalized the reputation for being dry for all it was worth, with the view of attracting the better sort of investors and residents to the community. As a further attraction to this better class, they began to fix up the town, to paint, put in new fronts, take down crippled old awnings and to give the town a city aspect and air. The tendency to fix up became almost a mania with the result that Tulare has been transformed. It may be set down as the spickiest, spannest, newest, neatest town in the San Joaquin Valley, if not in the state; and the pride and courage, the local patriotism and optimism of the people, suggest that they must all have come from Los Angeles. They have not, but they have got the Los Angeles spirit, and Southern Californian investors and homeseekers are coming right here. Not one croak can be heard in Tulare. There is not one vacant home to let, and if homes could have been had the school census would have increased more than 100 over what it did increase. During this year of being a dry town between fifty and sixty new residences have been built and the song of the saw and the hammer is still heard.

Substitute Thirst Killers.

Wine is making its appearance on some tables where it was not known before. A club has been organized and equipped for the accommodation of gentlemen, but no hard drinks are allowed there. If a thirst becomes intolerable Visalia is only twelve miles away, and some do go there to slake it. It is commonly believed, too, that the three drug stores in Tulare act as Good Samaritans when life-saving stations are needed. Physicians are not heartless in the matter of making out prescriptions in extreme cases, but the one fact that stands out clearer than all others is that, whether prohibition prohibits or not, no citizen of Tulare wants the saloons back. There is no street and no part of any street along which ladies may not pass without being made uncomfortable and, from out behind no swinging door comes any maudlin, drunken, beastly guffaw that sounds like the laugh of a hyena welling up from caves amid the tombs.

Tulare City may not always persist to be a dry town, but it now seems improbable that it will ever contain another saloon. With The California Weekly many Tulareans are looking for something that will be better than either the saloon or prohibition, with The California Weekly, the last man of them infinitely prefers a prohibition that does not prohibit to such saloons as Tulare supported for more than thirty years, open from year's end to year's end and knowing no law but inclination, no purpose but gain.

When closed up and closed out some of the saloon keepers went into other lines of business and are doing well. A few brushed the dust of the town off their feet and went elsewhere with their gains, but the remarkable part of it is that no one of these is believed to have carried to exceed a thousand dollars with him. The business had not proven a wealth-producer, even to the saloon keeper.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Thirteenth Amendment.

Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.—Amendment XIII, ratified December 18, 1865.

The chief value of this amendment at this time is as a landmark from which we may look back to see how far we have come. From the time when the Dutch brig, laden with slaves, landed at Jamestown until the adoption of the Thirteenth amendment this western civilization had wrestled with a great curse, and the curse had gotten the better of the argument. We are still wrestling with it.

It is unnecessary at this time to review the historical events leading up to this culmination, and it is especially undesirable to strive to fix the blame here or there. The people of America sinned against heaven and against humanity, and it paid the penalty required by retributive justice.

It is of value to a student of citizenship, now and again, to take the measure of the limitations of human kind. No man but knew in his heart that slavery was wrong. It was known as well North as South and South as North, but neither North nor South were willing to give it up as long as it was profitable. At the breaking out of the Civil War the property value of the slaves in the South was not far from two billions of dollars, and their earning capacity paid interest on the investment.

It was a good deal to ask of the South that it lay that wealth upon the altar of human welfare and brotherly love, even the altar of justice. The sacrifice was so great that the North rarely never asked it. It merely asked that slavery be kept where it then was. The South was fearful that it could not be kept where it then was, and continue to be there. It was felt that it must increase or diminish, wax or wane, extend or contract, and, with this purpose in view, some fatality prompted the South to undertake to dismember the Union. That the North would not stand, despite the erasing cowardice of its commercial interests, and the war followed.

Let it be clearly understood: The North was fighting to save the Union, not to free the slaves. The South was fighting to hold the black man a slave, whose shackles the North was not trying to break. The issue was not between liberty and slavery, but between union and disunion.

But that power which moves upon the deep of human history wrought for human liberty and it came as an incident to other issues far more incidental than itself. This justness of progress has no care for cost and no pity for those who must pay the bills. When, in the course of human events, the time came for doing away with property rights in men those rights, no matter how securely vested, were done away with.

The most significant, the most discouraging, fact of it all is that the nation should have deserved such punishment as it received. It was not great enough to rise in its majesty for the righting of a great wrong. Its statesmen were not great enough to come together in humility in a spirit of conciliation to do that which the far-seeing knew must be done, and so it paid the price of shortsightedness and of a blinding, devouring greed, paid it with interest compounded, and paid it in heart's blood, as well as in gold.

The lesson of this supreme tragedy of the nineteenth century is that there is no divinity to save a nation from the consequences of its own acts, a people from punishment for its own sin. Not that special dispensations of Providence mete out wrath to nations and to men, but that history, whether individual or national, is a record of cause and consequence and never of gathering figs from thistles. There is a shallow optimism that holds cheerily to the belief that everything will come out all right in the end. Everything will come out right in the end if right-minded men fight for the right and strive for that end, not otherwise. The direction of least resistance, the direction of non-resistance, will lead to the brink and the abyss.

True enough the slavery issue did come out right, but what of the cost? Shall we not count a cost that has paid pensions enough to have rectified all our national waterways and built half a dozen Panama canals, a sacrifice of half a million young lives, the engendering of hatreds of neighbor for neighbor that live and forty years have scarcely effaced? Our national history will be what we make it. Every wrong inflicted, every blunder made, every duty neglected will be paid for, principle and interest. That is the lesson taught by the Thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds, including and exceeding the loudest. It overcomes the buzz and roaring ear noises and also constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

The Issues Involved.

Before another issue of The California Weekly reaches its readers the case of the People against Patrick Calhoun will have been somehow determined by the jury or the jury will have determined not to determine, not an improbable outcome of half a year's labor.

That the boodle supervisors were paid money to vote for the trolley franchise, that the money paid came from the coffers of the United Railroads and that the payment was authorized by Patrick Calhoun no one doubts and practically no one denies. Whatever verdict the jury may find Patrick Calhoun will stand before all the world convicted of that charge. No earthly power can save him from that fatality.

But there are other issues of great importance involved. The world is waiting to know if, under the rules of the judicial game, a person of great wealth may be convicted and punished for a crime the commission of which is practically undenied.

The public is waiting to know whether or not, under our system of selecting a jury, it is possible, after four months of effort, to select a jury that is not packed.

As being representative of public sentiment, the world is waiting to know from this jury whether or not San Francisco sees any harm in bribing public officials to grant special privileges to greedy corporations, and if inability to obtain such special privileges without bribery is to be accepted as a complete justification for such bribery.

The paramount issue involved in the case at bar is whether or not the constitutional right of those who know all about the facts to refuse to testify to those facts, is a right that ought to exist.

When these San Francisco graft cases shall have passed into history we shall know, and the whole world will share the information, whether or not our system of criminal jurisprudence, and the constitution of our appellate courts, has been sanctioned, or condemned, by a crucial test applied to them. We shall know whether or not we, in America, have one law for the control of the predatory man and another, or none at all, for the control of the predatory millionaire, whether our government is free and equal or if it may be ridden over rough-shod at the pleasure of an incorporated plutocracy.

And the determination of these issues will be worth all they cost in time, in effort, in money, even if there must be added thereto the lives of martyrs to the cause of even handed and expeditious justice.

San Francisco's Level Best.

Boston has organized a tremendous civic improvement work to be accomplished in less than six years, a work that will make that city do her level best to become a model for other cities to follow. San Francisco has an opportunity to do her level best this coming week. There are nine public improvement propositions to be voted on. Every one of them should carry. San Francisco has the credit, it has all the time there is in which to redeem its pledges, and it has the every-day need. If it lacks anything it is the spirit to do its level best for the civic whole instead of merely for self. That every San Franciscan does. No fault can be found with him for lacking individual enterprise. His fault, if he have any, is that he has not taken the thought he should for his city, has not lived, fought and voted for the good of San Francisco. If every San Franciscan will do his level best for San Francisco's level best next Tuesday and Wednesday a new era of civic improvement will be ushered in, so that when, in 1915, Boston invites all the world to come and see what The Hub has done for parks, schools, playgrounds, civic centers and public utilities generally, San Francisco can extend a further invitation to come and see how much better San Francisco's level best is than Boston's. Now Boston is no mean city, and San Francisco will have to hustle to beat Boston.

The President's Special Message.

The probabilities are that the value of the President's message to Congress, asking for a 2 per cent. tax on the net incomes of corporations, and for the submission of a constitutional amendment to the states providing for an income tax, is mainly strategic. It is to be accepted as a showing of the executive hand in the tariff issue. This paper will not undertake to interpret the exhibition. It does not know how. Anyhow the President is not as somnambulant as he has seemed. The proposed tax upon corporations is as objectionable as his proposed tax upon inheritances, and for the same reason. The states are resorting to indirect taxation instead of direct and largely through taxation of corporations. The general government would be trespassing. The income tax idea is everlastingly right and the supreme court of the United States was everlastingly wrong in declaring it unconstitutional. It should be made to eat that crow by a reversal of its own decision. The ratification of a constitutional amendment providing for a graduated income tax by three-fourths of the state legislatures is problematical. If it were to be by the people of three-fourths of the states there would be no doubt, but legislatures rarely represent the people and might misrepresent them on that issue.

Nevertheless Not Vindicated.

George D. Collins has "gone across the bay," and apologists for our existing system of administering criminal law may be tempted to point with pride to the consummation as a vindication of that system. Nevertheless our criminal jurisprudence is not thereby vindicated. Quite the contrary. Here we have a congenial scoundrel guilty of an atrocious crime against society, his own children and the woman who bore them, without the respect of bench or bar, alone, conducting his own case, unprotected by any political bureau or association of predatory villains. It was to no man's interest to protect him from the law's retribution, and yet his final incarceration has taken three years and eight months and has cost the state and the city of San Francisco tens of thousands of dollars and made the ministers of the law no end of trouble. And he has done all this by taking advantage of the intricacy of legal machinery. An adequate system of criminal jurisprudence would have required fewer months for working out its end than this case has taken years, and would have cost the public fewer hundreds of dollars than this has thousands.

The Final Word on Hetch-Hetchy.

Mr. Marsden Manson's article on the Hetch-Hetchy water proposition, elsewhere in this issue, is so clear and convincing that it would seem that the discussion of the issue might appropriately terminate with it and all hands fall to and help put the project through to completion. It will be a great task and a long struggle, but if the men of this generation were to leave no other achievement as a heritage for coming generations they would be entitled to a generous degree of ancestral worship from posterity because of that achievement alone. There is no greater blessing than an abundant supply of pure water and, next to this blessing, may well rank such a self-perpetuating supply of power as will subserve all the requirements of municipal use for ever and aye. In fact, it is the possibility of a power supply that makes this proposition pre-eminently attractive. It is a splendid concept and its materialization should be an object of solicitude to every resident of the bay district. It can not be that all shall think alike. It is too much to hope that so great an enterprise can be carried to completion without leaving some heart-burns somewhere and inflicting some injury, but it may be doubted if any similar enterprise ever went forward less handicapped by such burdens than will the enterprise of bringing water and electrical energy from Hetch-Hetchy valley to San Francisco bay. A good beginning has been made. It only remains to stand steady and true and a glorious ending will be achieved.

NO SIDE-STEPPING, GENTLEMEN.

The issue in the forthcoming campaign in San Francisco is as to whether or not efforts which have been making for nearly three years to bring successful rascality to the bar of justice, that the laws may be vindicated and the guilty punished, are or are not to cease, and whether or not the failure of the law, when confronted by predatory millions, is to be confessed. Who are the men who most unequivocally represent the efforts to enforce the laws? They are Rudolph Spreckels and Francis J. Heney. If they are not themselves put in nomination before the people for the office of mayor and district attorney then whoever are put in nomination must be as thoroughly identified with their purposes as they are themselves. Why not these two as well as any substitutes for them? The issue is one to be met in absolute frankness before the people. It is an issue also to be met in absolute frankness before the civilized world, for the world is looking on. It is not only successful rascality that is on trial, but also our modern system of jurisprudence. It is just as important that our system of criminal jurisprudence be put to the supreme test here and now, that it be made to bear the burden or break down under it, as it is that the supremacy of successful rascality over honest methods and honest men be determined one way or the other. This double issue must not be sidetracked until all the world knows what to believe. If our civilization is a failure let its failure be writ so large across the canopy of heaven that the children of men may see and know and profit by our unfortunate example. It is important, too, that San Francisco take the measure of its own manhood. It will know then whether it has or has not a right to respect itself. To shuffle, to sidestep, to evade or gloss over, is to confess in advance a lack of moral and civic courage. If these prosecutions are to go on until the law breaks down or rich rascals break rock let us know it. If they are to stop with the end of the present administration let us know that. We shall all breathe easier when we know the truth. The world will think better of us if our righteousness goes down in defeat than if we permit it to be shunted to one side to die a living death in shame and humility. Let there be no side-stepping, gentlemen.

PROOF OF SINCERITY REQUIRED.

An up-country periodical demands that The California Weekly prove the sincerity of Spreckels, Heney and their associates, else it will not believe in the guilt of San Francisco grafters. The sincerity or lack of it of these men has as little to do with the guilt or innocence of Calhoun, Glass, Ruef et als. as whether or not Editor Rod Saul's great-grandmother was a monkey has to do with the municipalization of the Geary-street road. The issue is incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial and unworthy of consideration, so far as the indicted men are concerned, by any person not in his dotage. The issue that confronts the accused is: are you or are you not guilty? Nevertheless, the sincerity and disinterestedness of Spreckels, Heney and their associates are proper subjects for discussion so far as they, themselves, and their own standing in the community are concerned. From this point of view, and not from that of the guilt or innocence of the accused, the issue may be considered.

John the Baptist, alone, in prison, hourly facing death at the caprice of a tyrant, came to doubt the advent of one whom he had himself been the first to proclaim the Anointed One, and so he sent messengers to ask of Jesus if he were truly the Christ. The messengers were told to see for themselves what was being done. They saw and went away convinced. There is no other way of proving the sincerity and disinterestedness of Spreckels, Heney and their associates.

The men have given nearly three years of tireless effort to the cause. Mr. Spreckels has devoted to the cause a sum of money large enough to constitute a generous competency for any well-to-do man, and Mr. Heney has worked three years, as few men could have stood it to work, without compensation. They have fought against vast wealth incorporated and entrenched for predatory purposes, fought against a polluted press and a saturnalia of conspiracy and intrigue seldom equaled in human history and have not flinched or shown the white feather at any time. Their lives have been in danger every day and hour and, although shot down, Mr. Heney got up from his pallet in the hospital and went at it again. And they are still fighting!

Now what can imagination require that these men do in proof of sincerity and disinterestedness that they have not done? Will some doubter point to some one thing left undone that could be done to render the purity of their motives, and the sincerity of conduct, more evident? Whoever is not convinced by what is open to be seen of all men would not believe were one to rise from the dead to assure him. Those who doubt are either benighted, bedeviled or bought.

THE LARGES OF THE KING.

Denouncing Andrew Carnegie for the ruthlessness of his career, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, of New York, lately declared that this country needs justice more than libraries. This is a true saying, and it may be taken as true while holding that we need libraries not less, but justice more. Not yet has Andrew Carnegie earned the right to be known as a philanthropist. This country never produced a more heartless slave-driver than he. While his great steel works were bringing him in millions upon millions he kept the wires hot with admonitions to crowd the men harder and ever harder. He took them in the prime of young manhood and made them aged men at forty-five. In forty years he and his associates reduced Pittsburg from a self-respecting American city to a cringing, poorly paid, task-driven Babel of forty tongues to the end that forty multi-millionaires might be made who did not know what to do with their money when they had made it.

Time was when all the burdens that people bore were heaped upon their bent backs by their kings and all the beneficences they enjoyed came through royal bounty. It was the king who founded universities, hospitals and libraries, if there were any. Are we reproducing that condition in this country? Are all our benevolent institutions to come to us from great industrial warriors who first extort from us, and then bestow upon us, to the extolling of their virtues forever and ever? It would seem so, but if so let us not forget what manner of men these our benefactors were? Let us demand justice not instead of, but as well as, libraries, hospitals, colleges, institutes and let us call no man a philanthropist who gathered his gain by cashing in the lives of children in short clothes, the eyesight of needlewomen, the bodies of young girls. Let us not extol overmuch the virtues of a man who gives what he can by no means take with him beyond the brink of the grave, the capitalized result of having shortened the productive span of a strong man's life from forty years to hardly more than twenty. Let us judge righteous judgment that men who wish to stand well in the estimation of their kind may form correcter ideals as to what constitutes a claim upon public consideration.

It is fit that this demand for justice, rather than for the largess of kings, should come from a Jew. The basis of the Christian faith is love and mercy, that of Judaism is justice. Job had the moral courage to demand of Jehovah that, first of all, he be just, and Christianity places justice before mercy if not before love. There is not today a Jew, not recant to the faith of his fathers, who is not standing for justice, in San Francisco or elsewhere, justice first if mercy afterward. Justice marks the highest concept of the Jewish race and its religion, and it is good news that the eloquent voice of Rabbi Wise is being lifted up on behalf of the ancient ideal of the prophets of his people. For many there are of that fold who, in quest of gain, have wandered far from the time-honored standard.

Whoever amasses wealth through honest, humane service—let him receive the meed of praise for being a philanthropist, even though he found no libraries, colleges or institutes. There is no higher benefaction than finding something for people to do who might otherwise stand around all the day idle, but let us draw the line where blood is transmuted into gold, warning the ambitious that whoever crosses that line leaves behind him all hope of honorable recollection in the remembrance of posterity.

GRIM BUSINESS.

It is grim business that is going on in the United States Senate these days, and it requires grim men to do it. To all intents Nelson Wilmarth Aldrich is the United States Senate, and he is as grim as the visage of death. In that one personality is focused all the greed of which an uncorrupted plutocracy is capable. Its one purpose is to shackle the power of resistance of the American consumer while organized rapacity goes through his pockets.

We in this country are all protectionists, Democrats as well as Republicans. There are not more free traders in America than there are anarchists. All of us want all the protection that is needed to give the American producer as good a chance in the American market as any foreign producer can have. We all of us want a tariff wall around our border high enough to equalize the cost of production at home and abroad, and high enough to prevent that process of dumping excess of commodities that tends to demoralize industry and to prevent stability of supply and demand.

Democrats have confused the issue by declaring for a tariff for revenue only, because it constituted a shibboleth which slipped glibly off the tongue, but never at any time have Democrats in Congress voted for a tariff for revenue only. They have always voted, as they now vote, for a tariff that will protect. Protection is the American tariff doctrine and only the policy of the vulture and the hyena applied to tariff-making can produce such a revulsion of feeling in America as will cause the overthrow of the protective idea.

But the foundation of the protective idea of tariffs was that there should be a free market at home, that competition within the tariff wall should have free course. It has this no longer. The concept of combination of allied interests has been so worked out that every market, and practically every commodity in every market, is under duress. Competition is eliminated and every commodity has not only its wholesale, but its retail, price fixed for it before it leaves the factory. This is so nearly the universal law of modern trade that the exceptions prove the rule of the law.

Nelson Wilmarth Aldrich is the person whom the allied plutocracies have commissioned to see to it that the American market for their commodities is made a closed market. The commodities not produced by allies of these plutocracies will have no share in this exploitation save as, through community of interest, displayed in voting right, they get under the plutocratic umbrella for protection. The makers of commodities that stand out in the storm will find their wares on an enlarged free list to get on as best they may with a competition as wide as the world.

It is grim business, this tariff making, and Nelson W. Aldrich is a grim man. He can see the pressure of a decreasing wage and an increasing cost of living bearing down upon the millions with the weight of mountains without the twitching of a facial muscle. He can see the plight of Pittsburgh reproduced in every manufacturing city and hamlet on the continent without a sigh of sympathy or a qualm of conscience, so that his masters reap rich dividends and make him their high commissioner to enforce their greedy will upon an impotently protesting public.

They say on behalf of Aldrich that he understands the tariff question. So he does. If he did not some other man, and not Aldrich, would occupy the seat of the mighty. He knows exactly what he is doing and exactly why he is doing it. He takes care of his friends. Let others do likewise, and to the victor let the spoils of victory go. His emblem is the black flag.

When at last this record of rapacity is wrought out and signed by the President, as it is not unlikely to be, the cry will go out, "Let the tariff alone. Suffer the people to get to work." It will be so. Factories will start up, business will move, prosperity will come to all who can shift the burden of an increased cost of living to other shoulders than their own, and Aldrich and his fellow ravishers of helplessness will be justified by results.

But just as surely as the coming of the Day of Judgment to Aldrich, as it has come already to H. H. Rogers, the pressure of life will bear harder and harder upon the consuming multitude, their standard of living will shrink lower and lower until the pauper problem of America will be as hard to solve as that of Europe and, if the policy of organized spoliation be long enough persisted in, then as hard as that of Asia.

"All the protection that is needed without one dollar of tribute to the grim monster of organized rapacity," should become the shibboleth of a tariff reformation of the immediate future. May La Follette and Beveridge carry the war into the enemy's country. Do it now.

Bryan for the Senate.

The ambition of William Jennings Bryan to occupy a seat in the United States Senate is a proper one. Whatever efficacy there is in a nation-bound public sentiment should be focused upon Nebraska that it may send Mr. Bryan to the Senate. Since Thurston the general public has not known if Nebraska has or has not been represented in the upper house, save as some years ago investigation was made into disreputable methods of getting there. The conferring of senatorial honors upon Mr. Bryan would restore Nebraska to the map. To be sure Mr. Bryan is, and ever has been, something of a false alarm, but whatever of vagaries may get into his head his heart is right and a little right-heartedness injected into the grizzled ranks of the citadel of American plutocracy would serve a useful purpose. Upon reference to the congressional directory it will be found that one Elmer Jacob Burkett, by name, occupies a seat in Nelson Aldrich's assemblage of nobles, a seat that will become vacant in 1911. Get up, Mr. Burkett. Mr. Bryan, have his seat.

An Allowable Presumption.

The granting of a rehearing, as it is called, by the supreme court in the Glass case is to be accepted with satisfaction. It raises the allowable presumption that four of the seven judges constituting the higher court entertain an inkling that the district court of appeals may have turned Mr. Glass loose on insufficient grounds; but this does not necessarily imply that the higher court feels that, by going farther and looking deeper, it may find additional grounds for nullifying the conviction of said Glass. We shall know more about this when the rehearing has been had and a decision rendered. And it should be remembered that the district court of appeals retained one un-shot arrow in its quiver to which it called special attention. This was as to whether or not the evidence of guilt sustained the verdict. It seems likely that this will be gone into in the higher tribunal and the public need not be surprised if it be found that the jury, as well as the court below, had erred. Nevertheless, whatever the finality, it can do no harm, and may do great good, to have the issues in that case threshed over in the limelight of publicity. Responsibility for palpable miscarriages of justice must be fixed. If it does not lie with courts of appeal we must find where it does lie. No remedy can be applied until the fault is found and responsibility fixed. What becomes of Louis Glass is relatively unimportant. It is what becomes of justice that is crucial.

Tamalpais Centre.

George Kennan told years ago of an exile in far Siberia who looked up with a spark of intelligence beaming from his eyes long enough to exclaim with some exaltation: "We have a new cemetery." In his daily round of exiled doing, the setting apart of a new fence corner to be a repose for the dead was the only event that could warm his imagination enough to set his tongue loose. The narrow range of human interest off there in the unknown had stupefied him. Next to hereditary tendency, and the life of excess, more persons lose their minds from a narrow range of interest, a range that leaves seven-eighths of the brain unused, than from any other cause. People need other people. The blight of farm life, which the younger generation runs from as from a pestilence, is the loneliness of it and the narrow horizon. This spirit kept the American colonies asunder in early time and made the several states hate one another like alien lands. It required more than a century to develop a national life and spirit which, had it been developed soon enough, would have saved the horror and cost and agony of civil war. Therefore whoever undertakes to bring people together in friendship, and for a broadened range of interest and activity, is a true benefactor. Social life is to humanity what aeration is to water; it keeps it from stagnating. The Tamalpais Centre should furnish a model for the state. It will re-create many a dead one.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Humility is not an American trait. Quite the contrary. We have made ourselves ridiculous in the eyes of the world, almost contemptible, by our propensity to brag. We are recovering from this malady by appreciable degrees but a permanent cure seems a long way off. We regard the Japanese as a "cocky" people, but who ever heard a Japanese brag of administering a thrashing to Russia? Had we done it we should have strutted over the whole earth.

Now these characteristics that are national are so because they were first individual. The things that the American people do we do, the things that they stand for we stand for. Our nation's faults are ours as certainly as are its glories. The way to remedy them is to begin with ourselves.

There is no harder lesson to learn than humility. Perhaps it was made hard to learn because it is not a good thing to learn too much of it. To be humble without being timid is difficult, and timidity is a misfortune. It has caused the failure of what would otherwise have been very useful careers. There are persons so timid that they appear always to be apologizing for their own existence. There are women whose timidity has stood in the way of their marriage and men who have never been able to screw themselves up to the sticking point of proposing matrimony to the women of their choice. No one not a sharer in timidity can form any conception of the burden it forces its victims to carry.

Somewhere betwixt that boastfulness which is our national humiliation and that timidity which makes infirm of purpose there should be a calm consciousness of ability to do and dare, without the marring effect of bluster and brag. This is a thing to be striven for ardently, for it can be gained to a helpful degree.

But to accomplish this end it must be entered upon systematically. The propensity to brag must be restrained, deliberately, continuously, just as one may deliberately, by watching himself, cease using profane language, bad grammar, spitting on the sidewalk. One who undertakes to do this must say to himself: "Henceforth I will let my deeds proclaim my virtues." They will do it if he has virtues.

The task of the timid person is harder. If the boaster can come to an understanding that he is a boaster, and that boasting is vulgar and thoroughly discreditable, his victory is half won. The timid person has no story to know that he is timid, and that timidity is a handicap, but he must force himself against the grain to take forward steps that he desperately dreads to take. He must say to himself: "Look here, my fellow, you can do this thing; you know you can. It is in you to do it, and now I am going to force you right out on the firing line where you have got to make good or show the white feather, and that would be a disgrace that you never had been ashamed to face. They would not have been inspired by a desire to excel, but dread of failure has nerved them to a dogged persistence that overcame all obstacles and produced important results.

The spirit of self-assurance is disagreeable, but, in our country, where it is so common, it is not a serious hindrance to success. Timidity is, and needs to be fought. We are not even humbly, not dejectedly, and we are not even required to walk humbly except before our God. At all events we should neither crawl nor crawl. The tendency to shrink from contact with the world, from the work that we might do, is to be resisted and whoever is parent of a shrinking child should strive as hard to cultivate it out of that child as though it were a downright fault, which it is, and a common one, too.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Our Nation's Manner of Growth.

A report prepared for the New York chamber of commerce compares the development of the United States in 1858 with that attained in 1908. In the half century the population of the nation increased 193 per cent. This seems a very pretty showing until we compare it with the increase in wealth, which has been almost three times as rapid, or 563 per cent.

The United States has increased its riches about three times as rapidly as it has increased its population. In the same time its people have multiplied their bank deposits by more than thirty-four. On the other hand, the indebtedness of the nation has been increased in the ratio of nearly 24 to 1—which might seem to be unnecessary while we were piling up wealth so rapidly and while government receipts were increasing by 1,186 per cent. Our army expenditures have increased by 329 per cent, and those of the navy 745 per cent. Imports per capita have increased from $8.35 to $13.70, and exports from $9.14 to $21.04. In but one thing of any moment has there been a decrease during this fifty years, and that is—but need it be named?—in the amount of foreign commerce carried in American ships, which decreased 39.06 per cent.

The Burden the Japanese Carry.

Whether one likes or dislikes the Japanese, it is impossible for anyone not to admire the splendid devotion they are displaying in dealing with a national debt which far exceeds, in proportion to numbers, that which any other modern nation has borne. It may be questioned whether any other people could or would bear a burden so heavy, yet "the little brown men" are not only carrying its weight of interest, but are quite rapidly reducing the principal. The national indebtedness of the Mikado's realm is about $1,250,000,000, or one-eighth of the total wealth of the country, more than two-thirds of which sum was incurred in the wars with China and Russia. During the last three years the people have paid not only paid the interest on this immense debt, but have paid $55,000,000 a year on the principal, a rate which, if maintained, as it seems likely to be, will obliterate the indebtedness in less than twenty-three years. In this manner the Japanese are meeting their obligations as debtors, but at fearful cost to themselves. They are turning 30 per cent. of their net income into the national treasury. Land taxes have increased from 2.5 to 17.5 per cent., and the tax on incomes, including the lowest, varies from 10 per cent. to more than 20 per cent. By radical means, and which the foregoing examples give an idea, the national revenues have been increased, in eight years, from $127,000,000 to $318,000,000; and still, it is asserted, the people do not complain. Like or dislike the Japanese, as you will, but when you feel the need of a lesson in patriotism look in that direction.

Mexico's Next Vice-President.

At the Mexican election which will be held next year, President Diaz doubtless again will be chosen to succeed himself, but President Diaz then will be well along in his eighty-first year, and it is probable that he will not live to complete his six-year term of office. Hence the choice of the vice-president likely to succeed him in the presidential chair is of interest not only in Mexico, but also on this side of the Pacific. There are two aspirants for the office. Ramon Corral, the present vice-president, and Bernardo Reyes, governor of Nuevo Leon. What gives the situation interest here is the fact that these two men represent what may be termed the American and the non-American party, and he is making the most of a charge that Corral did what he could to obtain a favorable concession for E. H. Harriman in connection with his Western Mexican railroad. Mr. Harriman is an American, and represents American interests when they do not clash with his own, so sympathy up this way will be with Vice-President Corral and the American party.

"Drunkards' Island."

Whatever else may be said of the Salvation Army, it will not be gainsaid that it is eminently practical in dealing with the ills that afflict humanity. In New Zealand it has adopted a method of sobering drunkards, and keeping them sober, which is perhaps the only way, in many instances, in which that end could be attained. The Army has obtained from the government of New Zealand the small island of Pakaton (now known as "Drunkards' Island"), and on it has established a colony composed of those who are victims of alcoholic liquors. The island is twenty-five miles from Auckland, and the only means of communication with the city is by the Army's motor boat. No alcoholic drinks of any kind are allowed on the island, and the New Zealand legislature recently passed an act permitting magistrates to commit persons four times convicted of drunkenness to the care of the Army there. The island is said to be beautiful, and there the colonists work at small manufactures, gardening and fruit culture and—keep sober.

Salary of Men and Women Teachers.

The United States bureau of education recently published some interesting statistics relating to the salaries paid men and women teachers in the high schools, both public and private, of this country. In considering them it should be remembered that the salaries paid in such schools are the highest paid in our common schools. Men's salaries range from $300 to $3,500, with the exception of a few principals who may receive as high as $5,000, and the women receive from $200 to $2,500. The average salary of the men is $700, that of the women $550. The monthly average throughout the year, in the case of the male, is $58.33; in the case of the female $45.83, and in each instance the average time expended in preparing for the work of educating is eight years. If you will consider these figures, perhaps you will wonder, not that we sometimes have unsatisfactory teachers in high schools, but that we have those who are satisfactory as often as we do.

Harriman's Operations in Mexico.

Few have more than a confused notion of the great work the Harriman interests are doing in Mexico. They are giving the west coast of Mexico a complete system of railroad transportation, a system of lines linking up the principal towns and joining the Mexican Central, the backbone railroad of the sister republic. This has required the building or rebuilding of 1,800 miles of railroad, including the old Huntington line from Nogales to Guaymas. Mazatlan is 760 miles still farther south, farther than from San Francisco to San Diego. From Mazatlan the road goes on south as far as Tepic, some 200 miles, thence eastward to Guadalupe, where connection is made with a branch of the Mexican Central. This system of roads will involve an expenditure of $70,000,000 and is being financed by the Southern Pacific Company. The Mexican government helps with a subsidy of $10,000 a mile, a modest bonus considering the character of country which must be built through. More than half the construction work has already been done.

Hawley's Operations in Mexico.

The prophecy has been freely made that the successor of Harriman as the colossus of American railroads will be Edwin Hawley, and he appears to be about to dispute Harriman's supremacy on the Mexican Pacific. Hawley controls the Clover Leaf, the Clover Leaf controls the Chicago & Alton, the Minneapolis and St. Louis, and the Iowa Central and the Chesapeake & Ohio. The Kansas City, Mexico and Orient has fallen into the same hands and all that is now needed to complete a vast system of railroad from the Atlantic to the Pacific, ramifying the heart of the continent, is a line from Cincinnati to Chicago, which will probably be acquired in the purchase of the Chicago, Cincinnati and Louisville and the completion of the Kansas City, Mexico and Orient to Topolabampo on the Gulf of California. This port, rechristened Port Stillwell, is 1,000 miles east of San Francisco and 500 miles nearer to Kansas City. This road is completed as far as San Angelo, Texas, and is building through Chihuahua now and expects to reach tidewater in eighteen months. It will make another transcontinental road and has already contracted with the Hamburg-American company for a line of transpacific steamers. The Hawley system already embraces about 5,000 miles of road and is extending in all directions, and is to be reckoned with even by Mr. Harriman.

A monument to the genuine negro poet, Paul Laurence Dunbar, is to be unveiled in Woodlawn cemetery, Dayton, O., on Sunday, June 26th, his birthday. The memorial is a fine granite boulder, bearing a bronze plate on which is engraved a verse from Dunbar's "Death Song."

Musical circles are much interested in the fact that Richard Strauss is hard at work on a light opera. The composer of "Salome" and "Elektra" will not talk about his ideas for the composition, but it has leaked out that the time of the action will be in the latter part of the eighteenth century, and that the name of the opera is to be "Sylvia and the Star."

WORTH KNOWING.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "grail" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. The store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES.

EDWARD EVERETT HALE.

On the day of going to press with our last week's issue, too late to be chronicled in The California Weekly, word came that Edward Everett Hale had passed from this life. Perhaps he was not a great man. If he was not then we have none, for he was as great as any we have. He had made his name a household word throughout this country. For full sixty years he had taken a man's part in all that his country did and was. It is probable that none of his books would prove imperishable, but the influence that went out from them will, that is, if man is immortal, for his books and sermons have impressed themselves upon plastic minds and hearts by the millions.

He was not a philanthropist who gave with lavish hand wealth wrong from unrequited, life-devouring toil, but he so organized the fountains of charitable endeavor in Boston as to carry hope to despondent hearts by the thousand, thus setting upon their feet those that had fallen. It was he who declared that if some way could be found for taking care, in Boston, of all the pauperism and misery that had been caused, directly or indirectly through intemperance he and his church would agree to take care of all the rest.

He was a man of great simplicity of character and directness of speech. If he was not a great writer at least he was a lucid one. His rules for composition were characteristic and entirely sound. They were: "Know what you want to say, say it, use short words rather than long and use your own language, then cut out all the passages that strike you as being particularly fine." There were no "dictionary words" in any of his written productions.

A stalwart, shaggy, bristling man with a stentorian voice, strong in his convictions and steadfast in his purposes, he had made himself as gentle as a little child; tolerant, patient, a minister—not one to be ministered unto—he gave his life to service and after eighty-seven years, fell asleep. Greater men America may have produced, as it is to be hoped that many much greater will be produced hereafter, but of the men of his time there was perhaps none who lived a more well-rounded, wholesome, sane and useful life than Edward Everett Hale.

Capt. Nathan Hale was executed by the British in 1776. His grandnephew, Dr. Edward Everett Hale, has just died at the age of eighty-seven. The young patriot who gave his life for his country at twenty-one declared that he would gladly give many lives in the same manner if he had them. Doubtless the aged patriot who has been with us so long would have done the same just as gladly. But he served his country gloriously throughout his long life, which from first to last radiated patriotism and goodness. The kindly and wise American who wrote "The Man Without a Country" in the midst of the Civil War and who not only had for his motto the inspiring words, "Lend a hand," but led many thousands to adopt that motto for their own, had an enduring place in the records of this republic.

The late Sir Edwin Arnold while in Japan was much impressed by the Japanese method of announcing the death of a person of distinction. "He descended to die," was the serene declaration of those islanders. If this phrase is allowable in western philosophy one must think that when an aged good man whose presence has been a benediction to those about him for many years finally departs, his work has thoroughly done and in the best of order, it may be spoken of him without offense.

A few years ago Doctor Hale gave to the public his plan of attaining long life. Here it is in his own words, as he summarized his views and his method.

"1. Rule both mind and body with an iron hold. You are master.

"2. For the body, enough good sleep, enough good food, enough good exercise.

"3. For the mind, regular work; work in the line of your genius and stop when you are tired.

"4. After you are forty you may, if you are not a fool, choose your own rules, your own medicine and your own food. But you will find that the more you are in the open air and the more you are with other people, the better you will succeed. You will also find that there is nothing gained by brooding over failure.

"1, 2, 3, 4, 5 (and always). The great central statement of life and history in this matter is: 'He made himself of no reputation and took upon himself the form of a servant, wherefore God has highly exalted him'."

These rules of life are not the poorest part of the rich legacy which Doctor Hale has left to mankind.

MISS KNAPP'S VERSATILITY.

A versatile ability which made it possible for her to do almost everything well, though perhaps she lacked the special talent which might have given her first rank in any one department of literary work, characterized Miss Adeline Knapp, the California writer, who died recently in her California home. "I was born in Buffalo," she once said, "but it was merely incidental, because I never lived till I came to California in 1887."

For a time she edited and published a weekly newspaper in Irvington, Alameda county, and afterwards she was a writer on San Francisco daily papers. One of her first literary successes was a book called "Upland Pastures," which was issued by the Roycroft establishment. In 1901 she was commissioned by a New York publisher to go to the Philippines and write a school history of the islands, and on her return she became editor of a magazine in New York city. She contributed serial stories to St. Nicholas and other magazines, and did a great variety of other literary work. Personally she was a brilliant, witty woman, though she appeared to be well known only to a small circle of admiring friends.

Of Miss Knapp's occasional efforts in verse the following are examples:

Summer Hills.

A flood of sunlight, a circle of swallows,
The eddy of grass in little hollows;

The breath of cattle in upland meadows,
A bluebird's note in leafy shadows;

A hum of bees from slopes of clover,
A swish of trees the wind blows over;

A blue expanse to the far Forever,
A dream of life, and pure endeavor.

To William Keith, Painter.

Here where the tired day steals out to sea—
Past the tall guardians of the Golden Gate
Down to the rim of Time, where rest doth wait

Within the portals of Eternity—
Dwelleth a wizard; cunning-handed he,
With seer's insight and with poet's heart;
And he hath seen and shown by very Art
The soul of color, and its mystery.

To him the reaching oaks their glory show;
Tis his to learn, and his to make us know
The mystic beauty of the greenwood old;
The promise of the hills; the valleys sweet;
The golden wonder of a world complete;
The glory of a vision yet untold!

DAVID BELASCO'S DEBUT.

The story of David Belasco's debut upon the stage was told to a member of the staff of The California Weekly the other day by one of his boyhood schoolmates in San Francisco. At the old Lincoln school, on Fifth street, near Market, "Dave" was considered an odd character, with his profound seriousness, his bushy head of hair, and his fondness for dramatic recitations. The school had "speaking" every Friday afternoon, as the custom used to be, and Dave was invariably one of the speakers and he invariably recited "The Maniac" with a great tragic air and much thrashing of his hands through his foretop.

Then, in the early '70s, Sheridan, the tragedian, brought "Julius Caesar" to the old Metropolitan theatre on Montgomery street, and hired a lot of supernumeraries for one of the big scenes. Dave joined the supers, and his classmates, hearing about it, packed the peanut gallery on the opening night. When the big scene came on, with Dave in the troop of supers, the gallery began yelling "Three cheers for Dave." The racket brought the action to a halt. Then somebody yelled "Speech! speech!" and a voice rose from the clamor, calling "Give us 'The Maniac,' Dave!"

And Dave gave them "The Maniac." Gravely marching to the front of the stage, he ran his hands through his hair and dramatically let them have the whole piece.

The curtain had to be rung down, and from the sounds that came from behind it the audience judged that Dave was being discharged to the tune of the riot act. Anyhow he appeared no more with Sheridan's caste. But he had made the plunge that started him toward his present pre-eminence, not as an actor, but as the greatest American dramatic producer.

SONNET.

By John Keats.

When I have fears that I may cease to be
Before my pen has glean'd my teeming brain,

Before high-piled books, in charactery,
Hold like rich garners the full ripen'd grain;
When I behold, upon the night's starr'd face,
Huge cloudy symbols of a high romance,
And think that I may never live to trace
Their shadows, with the magic hand of chance;

And when I feel, fair creature of an hour,
That I shall never look upon thee more,
Never have relish in the fiery power
Of unreflecting love—then on the shore
Of the wide world I stand alone, and think Till love and fame to nothingness do sink.

AN ACTOR'S REMINISCENCES.

Frank Teweke, who recently celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his entrance on the stage, has published his memoirs, in which he says that he appeared 8,718 times in the thousand parts of which he has kept a record, says the New York Tribune. In that time, in his capacity as an actor, he was "thrown from the stage" 742 times, married 2,519 times, was Kaiser Joseph 89 times, was king once, prince 46 times, duke 259 times, baron 483 times and banker 717 times. "I had more wives on the stage than all the sultans in the world combined, and as many legions as did on the stage only 39 times, and these catastrophes occurred in my young days, when I committed the misdeeds allotted to me in 'Don Carlos' and 'Kabale und Liebe.'" Of his own experience as king, Teweke says: "It was at Pressburg in one of Birch-Pfeifer's tragedies. In one of the scenes my queen's veil became entangled in a piece of furniture, and I advanced to assist her in loosening it, when from the wings I heard the beer basso voice of the stage manager: 'Here, you! Don't you know you're blind?' I dropped the veil, and from that moment on the play ceased to be a tragedy."

Henry B. Harris, the proprietor of Hackett's theatre in New York, has notified James K. Hackett, the lesser, that the place he is being presented at the theater is a public nuisance and must be withdrawn or he will take steps himself to have the nuisance abated.

Sir Charles Wyndham, the eminent English actor, who is now appearing in New York, first appeared on the American stage in 1865 with John Wilkes Booth only a few weeks before Booth assassinated President Lincoln.

AN ASSOCIATION FOR NEIGHBORLINESS

ORGANIZING VILLAGE COMMUNITY INTERESTS AT TAMALPAIS CENTRE.

The people of Marin county, across the bay from San Francisco, are organizing enthusiastically an association to promote neighborliness. They call the association Tamalpais Centre, and they plan that from it shall radiate the community social life, organized, in turn, into outdoor sport clubs, children's playground associations, clubs for the study of botany, music, art, theatricals—in short, that the part of life in Marin county which everybody can enjoy together better than they can enjoy it privately, shall be sympathetically fostered and organized by the people themselves through the medium of this parent supporting body. This is a community movement, and it has taken hold of the imagination of all the people in a most encouraging way. The association will soon be formally launched, with a membership of about 1,000. The plan is that the membership fees shall support all the activities of the association, but that these fees shall be so graduated that everybody may share in the benefits of membership.

A clear idea of the purpose of the association is expressed in the letter of the trustees

Situated at the base of Mt. Tamalpais, the idea is to create a community of fellowship and interest in all the things which go to build up a healthy body, a healthy mind, and healthy citizenship. The land will be set out with baseball diamonds, handball courts, tennis courts, a swimming tank, a racetrack, and buildings for clubs, public hall, and gymnasium. It is an attempt to solve the problem of the village community; to make life worth living for those who want to live as they should live, and to realize that "there are others."

The Rev. Ernest Bradley, the Associate Rector of Trinity Church, San Francisco, has been asked to be the executive head of the institution. When seen about it Mr. Bradley was very enthusiastic. There is no work he would rather do than this kind of work, and there is no place he would rather work than Marin county, which he considers peculiarly adapted to just the work the executive committee have in mind. Tamalpais Centre is situated in the midst of a number of small towns within walking distance of each other, to do with the broadest outlook upon life, and the building up of healthy bodies and healthy minds. It is a centre for everyman, where everyman can be a brother and work for the good of the whole.

And most admirable is the democratic character of the plan. This is the people's own movement. They are organizing it, their enthusiasm and energy will carry it through, and its benefits are for the enjoyment of all. No better method has been devised to foster community interest and friendliness and intellectual alertness. No better practice in the elementary functions of organized life seems visible than this democratic community organization to promote the welfare and the happiness of all. The value of this discipline in independence and community team-work will be inestimable to the growing citizens who are now the boys and girls of Marin county.

May-Day at Tamalpais Centre.

inviting the Rev. Ernest Bradley to accept the post of executive head. The letter says:

"Tamalpais Centre, as you know, has been established to meet the social needs of our time and place. It must be a centre of neighborliness wherein all of us working together may more fully enjoy the life granted each of us. It is destined to mean opportunity for rest, recreation and instruction for men, women and children.

"Our community is composed of people of all creeds and of no creeds. Any recognition of denominationalism in our work would destroy the possibility of each of us being able to claim the Centre as his own.

"We must have a library and reading room; we need civic and literary clubs; the boys and girls must be assisted to organize their amusements, and they need chances for the study of subjects not included in the school course, such as manual training, domestic science, natural history and the arts. We hope for good lectures and good music and must provide a platform for the expression of highest thought."

Tamalpais Centre is the result of the interest and gifts of Mrs. A. E. Kent of Kentfield, Marin county. Twenty-nine acres of land eminently suited for the work were presented to the community on May Day, and over 4,000 enthusiastic citizens gathered to show their appreciation of the gift, and to organize for future developments. At this May Day fete the Marin Stadium Association provided the games and races, and the event was considered a red letter day in the annals of Marin county.

Tamalpais Centre is what the name indicates.

and on the same line of railway. To get to the Centre will not require any more trouble than it takes to get down town in a larger place, and not as much in some instances. Besides this matter of distance, there is ample breathing space, mountain, forest, and seashore; in short one of the beauty spots of the world. In the course of a few years there will be a big population about the Centre and by that time it will more than have proved its right to be, and have shown the wisdom and vision of the donors and workers.

Mr. Bradley goes to Chicago at once to study at Chicago Commons, and other centres, and to make investigations especially along the line of play grounds. In the meantime the land is being prepared and a building erected which will contain a hall for public gatherings, concerts and lectures, club rooms, etc. Mr. Bradley will return in September and complete the work of organization. Various clubs will be organized for boys and girls, and for men and women of an athletic and literary character.

Along the line of athletics the Marin Stadium Association is already doing some good work, and is full of enthusiasm for the future. The whole thing is to be community interest and development based upon play, the improvement of mind and body, a working interest in arts, civics, and moral questions, and the wholesome religion of neighborliness. The fact that Mr. Bradley is connected with the Episcopal Church will have no bearing on his position as the executive head whatever. The work will be absolutely without caste, creed, or politics except as these things have

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

To My Only Love.

'Twas back in a country olden,
In a land of vale and fell,
Where the days of our lives were golden,
I courted my little Nell—
Or, hold! I am not exactly certain whether it was Nell, or Bell, or Dell. Well, it doesn't really matter; to a word of the sort I am bolden—
I need it my rhyme to swell

Her lips were as cherries mellow
That swing in the sun all day,
And I was her one best fellow,
The love of my making May—Say, now that I reflect, I guess that May was not the one, but what does that matter?
Don't you find that you get a little mixed on their names sometimes? So, if I do the same, kindly do not tell. O,
May does for the rhyme, anyway.

Thoughtful Man on Calhoun's Coyness.

"Why should I condemn my friend, Mr. Calhoun, because he did not go on the stand and tell what he knew about that $200,000?" the Thoughtful Man inquired. "Coyness, shyness and innate modesty are beautiful characteristics, and it was these, and these alone, that made him shy from telling what he knew. He felt bashful of the result, although, possessing a vivid imagination, he knew that he would pass through the ordeal unscathed. It would be about this way: 'I understand that your name is Calhoun,' says the cold-blooded Heney. 'It is,' the noble man on the stand replies. 'You are a grandson of John C. Calhoun?' says the crafty Heney.

"I am," my friend responds, while a flush of pride mantles his face. "You are also a descendant of Patrick Henry?" the odious Heney continues. "I am," my friend replies, while he adds some more mantle.

"You feel proud of your ancestry, do you not?" says the ruthless Heney.

"I do," is the modest reply.

"Then why don't you give them a chance to reciprocate?" says Heney.

"Order in the court! His Honor sternly commands the crowd.

"Then the callous Heney suddenly turns upon his victim.

"For what did you pay that $200,000, Mr. Calhoun?" he inquires, with the cunning of a serpent.

"My memory concerning it is somewhat vague," my friend replies, "but it is my present impression that I paid it out for a fare on one of my cars."

"But the price of a care-free is five cents, is it not?" the wily Heney continues.

"That, as you well know, Mr. Heney," my friend replies, "my dignity is the price of hanging to a strap, if you can get the strap. To obtain a seat is quite a different matter. Lots of men would testify that they have not been able to secure one at any price."

"You might think this would settle it with Heney, but even clearer explanations do not convince him. He at once sidesteps.

"Where did Ruef get the $200,000?" he paid the supervisors for your over-head-trolley franchise?" he impertinently inquires.

"But my friend is patient as well as coy. 'I regret to state, Mr. Heney,' he responds, that Ruef always has refused to tell me. Time and again I have pleaded with him to give me the information, but he was obdurate.

"Tell with you!" was all he would reply."

"And so it would go. Can you wonder that a man of delicate and refined sensibilities and great coyness felt that he could not endure it? He knew his own innocence, but he was afraid it would be too hard to explain it. Ah well, whatever comes, there is one consolation."

"What is it?" I asked.

"The appellate court," the Thoughtful Man responded, with a sigh of relief.

The Opinions of Rufus.

The world owes every man a livin'—after he's proved by earnin' it that he's entitled to it, an' not before that.

Your an' my shins is consid'ly barked by stumblin', Silas, but ain't you never noticed that it them times stumbles that taught us how to shy clear of rocks?

I don't know much 'bout it, but I shouldn't wonder of Old Nick is more upst by one deed of lovin' kindness than he is by a hull fusillade of amens an' hallchuyers.

I've heered of fashinable churches where fashionable Christianity is fashionably preached, but I've had tolerble reliable information that the Man of Nazareth bl'onged to the other kind.

I notice that I'm a blame sight more disposed to hit the other feller's v'riety of sin a crushin' blow than I am my v'riety. Anybody orto be able to see that they's a lot of mitigation circumstances 'bout the latter.

Course I regret that they's so much of the 'iginal Adam in me; still I can't help admittin' that I'm under obligations to the old feller for consid'ble fun.

"Let us then be up an' doin'," for if we ain't the chances are that we'll be up an' done—brown, too.

When you reflect that great men may be born of mothers that was these waste-basket hats you can't help reelin' what a handicap it is that men has to overcome to make any-thing of their lives.

Believin' that they's a little good in the worst of men, I'm clingin' to the trust that The Almighty knows how to develop it, an' they ain't no doubt that eternally 'll give Him plenty of time.

The Great Auction.

Mine was a babe, and I loved her well—

Oh, 'twas in older days—

For she held my heart in the potent spell

And the charm of her baby ways.

But Time, the auctioneer, waited not.

And she passed like the flush of dawn,

Or a roseate dream too soon forgot,

With his "Going—going—gone"

My babe was gone, but a maid was mine.

Oh, little we maid, my love,

You came to me with your eyes ashine,

Like a messenger from above.

And my days you blessed. But the Auctioneer

Paused not—like a startled fawn

You passed to the shadows that fold us here.

With his "Going—going—gone."

My babe is gone, and the little maid

Passed over the shadowy hill.

They were mine one day, but afar they strayed.

And vainly I seek them still;

And I wait, I wait for the Auctioneer

Who holdeth my soul in pawn,

For I hope to find what my heart lost here,

With his "Going—going—gone."

The Best Man—

Didn't frequently advertise the fact that he considered himself so, either by word or action.

Didn't thank the Lord that he was not as other men, but left it to the Almighty to decide whether that was to his credit or discredit.

Didn't feel that the poor devil who needed help must be able to present testimonials concerning his good character;

Didn't feel that the thought of heaven should draw down the corners of a righteous man's mouth;

Didn't feel that prayer would amount much higher than the spirit of an action of kindness;

Felt that a heathen in hand is worth two in the South African bush, so far as hopes of redemption are concerned;

Let his charity begin at home, but didn't feel it necessary to keep it there all of the time.

As We Dare Believe.

I am thankful today that the "narrow path" Has widened somewhat since the olden day.
That our God no more is a God of Wrath
Who feels no pity for those who stray;
And I thank the Father who sits above,
No more the Avenger all dire and grim,
That my soul may trust to His perfect love,
Who knows I wandered, but cried to Him.

A Trying Situation.

Ever pause to reflect how you are going to feel when you attend that last mass convention and the recording angel pulls the record on you and reads it aloud right out in meeting? Be awfully embarrassing, will it not? Strikes me that way. No reservations, no concealments, no holding-back, you know; and before the biggest kind of a crowd at that. You, for instance, who claim to be a pretty good fellow, how are you going to feel to have your record read in something like the following form:

Blikins, J. K.—Held himself respectable; liberal with money—anybody's; fond of wife—several, in fact; beat trusting friend out of $1,000; gave $10 to church; public conduct model—when he was in his home town; had chance to steal $3,000—said, "No, I'd get caught at it," didn't take the chance.

How would Blikins feel, I ask, after that sort of thing had been strung out for an hour or two? Then think of Mrs. Blikins' feelings in listening to something like this:

Blikins, Elizabeth Zenobia—Quite devout—at times, attending church regularly—when she had new costumes; extremely neat—so much so that she pulled her skirts carefully to one side when she passed an erring sister; public conduct excellent—told herself that she would lose her social standing if it were not.

I might continue, and still be within the facts pertaining to human nature, but I sympathize with Mr. and Mrs. Blikins, and so I will not; but bear in mind that the recording angel will not cease reading until the whole record has been introduced. Oh, it is going to be a trying occasion, I tell you.

What! What's that you say? Why don't I introduce some of my own record here, instead of Blikins'? Oh, I prefer to wait for the great recorder to do that, and when he does I mean to ask him how he would be willing that I should go out somewhere in the back lot and wait there until the reading is concluded.

A Summer Lilt.

About this time of year is when

Each pot feller grabs a pen

And straight indites a soulful lay,

Which lilt along in 'bout this way:

Now am'rous Summer wooing comes,

With promises of cheer;

The bee in flowery kingdoms hums,

And birds—make mine a beer—

And birds, with throats attuned to praise,

Cheer travelers on their way,

While suns in skies unblemished blaze —And drat these flies! I say.

In sun-loved vales the brooks' acclaim

Is sermon sans a text.

A sermon—ah, yes, I'll take the same—

A sermon—was, next,

I wonder—sermon, ser—Oh, well,

The summer is all right

Is what I started out to tell,

Thus doth the soulful poet man

THE GRAFT CASES.

In the case against Patrick Calhoun the past week has been mainly occupied by the arguments of attorneys, Assistant District Attorney O'Gara making the opening argument for the prosecution and being followed by Attorneys Alexander C. King and A. A. Moore for the defense.

In his opening address to the jury Mr. O'Gara insisted that there are two cardinal questions on which the decision of the jury must hinge: First, was there bribery, preceded by an offer to bribe, of former Supervisor Nichols? Second, if there was such an offer, was it made for and in behalf of Patrick Calhoun? In connection with the first question, Mr. O'Gara maintained that the offer was conclusively proved by the direct evidence of Nicholas, Gallagher and other former supervisors.

In connection with the second question O'Gara also held the evidence conclusive, showing, as it did, that the former supervisors were bribed to vote for an overhead-trolley franchise for the United Railroads; that the bribe-money thus received came from Abraham Ruef; that about the time it was thus paid $200,000 was transferred from the United States mint to Tiry L. Ford on the order of Patrick Calhoun; that after this transfer Ruef visited Tiry L. Ford in the office of the latter; that Ruef had direct dealings with Calhoun, and other circumstances bearing upon the case.

The arguments of Attorneys King and Moore, for the defense, differed rather in manner of delivery than in effect, the former running to monotone, the latter to declamation. Summarized, their argument ran about as follows: None of the evidence shows a connection between Ruef and Calhoun; even if Ford supplied Ruef with money for bribes there is no evidence that Calhoun was cognizant of the fact; the evidence of the former supervisors is unworthy of credence; even if there were a bribe, no preliminary offer has been satisfactorily shown; even if the jury believes that $200,000 was paid to Ruef, it may presume that it was paid him as a fee.

At this writing Assistant District Attorney Heney still is to make the closing argument for the prosecution; then will follow Judge Lawlor's charge, and the case will be with the jury.

Last Saturday the state supreme court ordered a rehearing of the case against Louis Glass, in which the appellate court had reversed the verdict of guilty found against him in the trial court.

Actions have been begun to enjoin City Auditor Koster from paying the salaries of Detective Burns and his assistants and of Assistant District Attorney Harrison.

The cases against Jerry Van Wormer, Albert McKinley, W. J. Corbin and Rex N. Hamlin, charged with the grand larceny of papers from the office of Detective Burns, have been continued.

It is understood that the case against John Claudianes, charged with participating in the dynamiting of James L. Gallagher's residence, will be dropped for lack of sufficient evidence to convict.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

The shipment of cantaloupes from Imperial valley began about the first of this month, and by the seventh the traffic was in full swing, the melons being then shipped by the carload.

It is anticipated that Colusa's water carnival, which will be held during the three days beginning today, will attract a large number of visitors to the pretty little city on the Sacramento.

The Redlands Facts reports that the orange crop for the season of 1909-10 probably will be light, large quantities of that fruit having dropped from the trees during the recent variable weather in Southern California.

Under the terms of a recent decision of the state supreme court Terminal island, and contiguous territory, belongs to San Pedro rather than to Long Beach, which had attempted to annex it.

More than 800 resident voters of Santa Monica and Ocean Park have petitioned that the two towns be consolidated under one municipal administration, and in the election, which will follow, it is believed that this result will be attained.

Indians of Colusa county have decided to sue in the United States supreme court to recover possession of several thousand acres of choice land in that county. The red men maintain that they are entitled to the land under the terms of a treaty made more than a half-century ago.

The state road between Placerville and Lake Tahoe now is open, an automobile having passed over it on the ninth instant. In order to get through, it was necessary, in some places, to dynamite a passage through snowdrifts.

A young California condor was captured from its nest in Piru canyon, near Ventura, recently, by a Mrs. Ellis, who was lowered to its nest on the face of a precipice by means of a rope. At present the baby bird is about the size of a goose, but after he is grown he should measure 12 or 14 feet from tip to tip.

Rumor has it that the Los Angeles and Salt Lake Railroad company soon will build a Lake from Riverside to Redlands and Highland and thence through Cajon pass to the desert, and finally to Daggett, thus doing away with the necessity of using the tracks of the Southern Pacific and the Santa Fe.

The well-merited appreciation of The Bank of Germany, 1225 Broadway, Oakland, is due to the capable financial methods of the well-known business men forming its board of directors. Their energy and foresight have placed it among the leading institutions of its kind in Oakland.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Men Talked of There are but three men who at this writing can be considered avowed candidates for the Republican nomination for governor, and these are ex-Senate Senator Charles M. Belshaw, Secretary of State Charles F. Curry and Philip M. Stanton, Speaker of the Assembly. This leaves out Governor Gillett, who may decide to be a candidate, and also others who may hereafter make a similar decision; just at present the governor's friends are inclined to think he will not run. In the rather improbable event that no candidate save these three should come into the field, some good people might feel considerably at a loss to know how to "line up," because they would regard none of them as ideal.

Herrin Less Obvious Another question of interest would be where, in the improbable event before mentioned, the Southern Pacific railroad company would bestow the favor of its support? Its most natural affiliation would be with Secretary Curry, but sometimes Mr. Herrin reports to affiliations which appear unnatural, though they can always be traced to a good solid basis of self-interest for the railroad corporation. Last winter Herrin started on a new deal with the legislature, the object of which was to make the people believe that the railroad is no longer offensively political, translated into other language, that means only that the same objects as before will be sought to be accomplished, but it will be wholly by indirection. In the pursuance of this policy, it might be Mr. Herrin's goal to seek to make a deal with Belshaw, with Stanton, rather than to support a candidate so obviously favorable to the interests as Secretary Curry.

Candidates With Fights On Without attempting to discuss either Mr. Stanton or Mr. Belshaw at this time, it may not be devoid of interest to point out that if the convention system should be hard pushed to secure that hearty endorsement from the people of their own counties which is necessary to a successful candidate under that plan of nominating, and although under the direct primary a solid "trading delegation" from the home county will (thank God!) be an unknown factor, the lack of neighborhood unanimity will be likely to make itself felt even with the new plan of nomination in operation. The independent voters of Los Angeles, a mighty host, will have none of Stanton, and in Contra Costa county there has been brewing a tremendous ruction which may result in the overthrow of the faction with which Belshaw has long been identified.

The State of Perkins' Health As for Governor Gillett, the opinion now generally prevailing, that he will not try again for the governorship, appears to be based on the belief that he wants to be United States Senator and thinks that he sees a chance. This does not imply that any one thinks the governor will try for the senatorship before the next legislature; the politicians who put forward this explanation of the governor's attitude postpone his candidacy until 1915, or whatever earlier date at which Senator Perkins' seat may fall vacant, not thinking it credible that Gillett would presume to come out and contest with Frank Flint. But if Gillett is not a candidate for governor (and nobody seems authorized to guarantee that he will not be), there may be other reasons for it than a desire to wear a toga. It is worth while to recall under what circumstances Mr. Gillett became a candidate in 1906. It is an apparently well authenticated fact of political history that he did not break the chrysalis and spread the wings of his soaring ambition until he had first received a good solid assurance that the Southern Pacific would make his campaign for him, and it is just possible he is waiting for a new contract of that sort before he ventures again. There are some politicians who would be willing to bet that the contract will never be renewed, because there is an impression abroad that without any violent break, the governor and the Southern Pacific company have drawn apart during the last year. This may be because of a mutual disgust or for the sake of appearances.

Some Southern A short time since another Los Angeles man, Motley H. Flint, postmaster, was talked about as a candidate for governor, but naturally there could not be much substantiation to the candidacy of anybody for that office who has a brother who is a candidate for United States Senator. There was another and really greater disqualification in this instance, however, for M. H. Flint is a machine politician of the rampant and offensive kind. It would be more to the purpose if that Los Angeles county would bring out for governor, say, State Senator N. W. Thompson, who made so good a record last winter. In the last election, if we are correctly informed, Thompson was acceptable to both the reformers and the regulars.

Go As You Please Politics While in San Francisco the campaign for the November election has taken the form of a series of unofficial assemblages, in the nature of conventions, to suggest candidates to the electors, in Sacramento, another city which is to renew its government in November, the candidates are making their contests individually, and the politicians are connubiating privately and not publicly. M. R. Beard, a Democrat, who was defeated for mayor in 1907, although at that time he had organization support, is making his canvass, and several of the present holders of less important offices have filed petitions. The uncertain quantity is Mayor White, who has not yet consented to stand for reelection, although both his reformer friends and the organization politicians are trying to persuade him to do so. The organization is actuated by several things, one being that it has no available candidate of its own. Another is that it hopes by accepting White for mayor to make its peace with the voters and be left alone to recapture the city committee and to choose candidates for the other offices.

When Satan Was Sick! Meantime the saloon question. A question which eclipses in interest everything else in Sacramento. Immediately after Fresno went partially dry, and when it was reported that Rev. Bristol, who connected that successful campaign, would go to the capital city to inaugurate prohibition there, the liquor interests had a bad case of stage fright and decided that something must be done right away. A public meeting was called at which Marshall Diggs, an eminently respectable citizen, presided and speeches were made on the necessity of fighting saloon abuses on one side and prohibition on the other. A committee composed of very good men who do not believe in prohibition were appointed to draw up a model license and regulation bill, and to present it to the city council. After taking as much time as was needed for deliberation the committee reported a license ordinance of which the main features are: Raising of the saloon license to $600 a year; closing at midnight and half day on Sunday; yearly renewal of licenses and none to be issued without approval by majority of tax-payers in the half block; no license to be renewed except on favorable report by chief of police; no side or rear entrances and no private rooms; no increase in number of saloons, but gradual reduction to one hundred; saloons to be banished from residence districts after January 1, 1912. How far these excellent proposals will get is uncertain, as the city trustees are not believed to be favorable to them, and the liquor interests have now partially recovered from their panic.

Henry Certainly The supreme political development of the week in San Francisco politics is the certainty that Francis J. Heney will be a candidate for district attorney. He was nominated by the Independent Democrats, and neither accepted nor declined. It is now certain that he will be nominated by the Municipal League of Independent Republican Clubs at about the time this paper reaches our readers. Earnest friends of Mr. Heney, out of the best intentions and out of fear of the policy of risking him personally in a fight for the office, have labored to produce another candidate whom Mr. Heney could endorse so that, if defeat comes, it would not fall upon him who has already sacrificed the most for civic righteousness. But events have made his nomination inevitable. The California Weekly, for one, is glad of it. San Francisco now squarely faces the issue, and if San Francisco fails to elect Francis J. Heney district attorney, the humiliation is San Francisco's and not Mr. Heney's. And if he is defeated, The California Weekly expects to see the people of the state of California rebuke San Francisco and the corruptionists who have fought him by forcing his election to some office of more distinguished honor and of more far-reaching power for good.

George L. Center The reform movement that has found voice and power in the Municipal League of Independent Republican Clubs has found a leader in its municipal campaign. Mr. George L. Center, the "dean of the Mission," has laid aside his personal inclination and plans for recreation in Europe to accept the nomination for mayor. With independent wealth, an independent mind, and the fighting qualities of his Scotch blood, he makes a fine man for the place. He stands right on the continuance of the graft prosecution. He has been identified all his life with the advancement of San Francisco. He has made an excellent supervisor. He represents a high type of business man and public-spirited citizen who does his civic duty in politics. He will head the ticket, Heney will be district attorney, and with a sound list of candidates for the other offices, such as the League has proved its ability to select, that ticket should win, and probably will win first at the direct primary and then at the election. If we had the right kind of a law the issue would be settled once for all at the first election. The ticket of the Municipal League of Independent Republican Clubs would sweep the city.

Third Article. By WILLIAM KENT.

In two preceding articles, published June 4th and June 11th in The California Weekly, I considered the theory of the relations that should exist between those furnishing public utilities, and the municipality. I also showed how by eliminating the element of risk, and treating real investment fairly, Chicago has succeeded in boiling the water out of dropical corporations and putting intra-mural transportation outside the pale of politics. Peace reigns in Chicago, the peace of municipal self-respect and not the peace of surrender to greed and graft.

The people of San Francisco are facing a definite issue. Immediately before them is the forking of the roads. They must decide whether they will begin to own and operate their city or whether they will postpone the day of their awakening.

It is time that the city realized that the United Railroads are not operated in the public interest, but to pay, if possible, on watered securities, and to furnish the sinews of war to those who are debauching the municipal life, and defying right and justice.

Before this situation all theories of a unified system, of a monopoly of transportation, become of minor importance. San Francisco must not arm its worst enemy with more grants of power. There must be a struggle and the sooner it is begun the sooner it will be over.

The Geary street road is but an incident in the policy to be adopted. No public utility can rest on the rights already acquired, in a growing city. It must continually ask for more, and until all water is evaporated from its securities and until this arrogant corporation exhibits "an humble and a contrite heart," the city must clamp down on it, and hold it down.

The city cannot sell the Geary street franchise without

First, the practical certainty that it will become United Railroads property, and without Second, tying itself up to an outgrown system of licensed extortion, unless there is retained the right of purchase and operation.

This right of purchase and operation at some future time, would mean far greater cost when exercised than if exercised now.

Moreover there are many things that San Francisco wants to know, that will be fully and clearly demonstrated by the equipping and operation of this small system.

It is urged against the segregation of this road that it will not have transfer privileges. It now has none. The United Railroads have been trying to cut out transfer privileges, and have not been gracious toward the public in their Sutter street attitude.

It will not be long before, by one means or another, they will be forced in their own interest to exchange transfers with a municipal railway. Their stockholders will demand it as well as the traveling public.

It is urged that a city government is necessarily too corrupt and incompetent to handle such abstruse questions. If San Francisco people will compare their mayor and supervisors with the talent under indictment they will not long hesitate as to which are most likely to act in their interest.

Elected officials, it is said, are always politicians and cannot do business on business principles. And yet to elect judges you entrust the questions of liberty, property, ay, of life and death.

Elected officials are responsible for the public health, and the education of your children. But rather than trust them to run a few street cars and collect a few nickels, some of you would hand those functions over to men whose evident interest and proven disposition is to give you the minimum of service and the maximum of misgovernment.

As to success from a financial standpoint, there can be no possible doubt, in business management and a five-cent fare. A five-cent fare seems satisfactory to San Franciscans provided they get good service. Their road would be built to furnish good service and would pay from the start. There should be no difficulty whatever in finding capable and disinterested persons who would have abundant time out of court and out of jail, to man an efficient commission. There are engineers to be had who can be relied on to see that honest construction work is done.

Doing the task directly will give a clear knowledge of cost, and will substitute plain statistics for the Ananias records and the lost documents of the United Railroads.

Public policy at this juncture demands the municipalization of the Geary street road. There is no financial risk under decent management.

The people will see to it that the management is decent, and by no possibility can municipal management be as hostile to the public welfare as is that of the United Railroads.

Earthquake, fire, and plague are minor afflictions "and but for the moment," when compared with a public servant, arrogantly assuming the mastery of the city.

HECH-HECHY: THE LAW AND THE FACTS

Written for The California Weekly by MARSDEN MANSON, City Engineer of San Francisco.

So much that has been misleading and erroneous has been written and stated with regard to San Francisco's application and grant for the use of the Hetch Hetchy reservoir for a municipal water supply, that it is necessary to lay before the public generally a clear statement of the law and the facts.

By the Act of October 1, 1890 (26th Stat. at L. 651) there was established a reservation in California on the west slope of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, embracing about 1,500 square miles and subsequently known as the "Yosemite National Park." Section 2 of the Act contained the following provision:—

"That such reservation shall be under the exclusive control of the Secretary of the Interior, whose duty shall be, as soon as practicable, to make and publish such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary or proper for the care and management of the same; and he shall have jurisdiction for the preservation from injury of all timber, mineral deposits, natural curiosities, and wonders within said reservation, and their retention in their natural condition."

Rigid Regulation Modified.

During the years 1887-88, and '89 the United States Geological Survey, in its investigations of the resources of the United States, found that within this area vast water resources originated, which are capable of being used to the benefit of the lands of the San Joaquin valley which are deficient in natural rainfall for intensive farming; these resources could also be used for municipal and mining purposes. The Geological Survey therefore made examinations of the various reservoir sites capable of being utilized, and it was found that such, determined the general character of structures necessary and made approximate estimates of the capacities of these reservoirs, including Hetch Hetchy reservoir. (See 21st annual report U. S. Geological Survey, Part IV, Pages 456-3.)

Acting under this advice and realizing that these and all reservoir sites must ultimately be utilized, Congress saw fit to modify the very rigid and inhibitory provisions of the law of 1890, and, on February 15, 1901, (31st Stat. at L., Page 790) enacted the following law:—

"That the Secretary of the Interior be and he is hereby authorized and empowered, under general regulations to be fixed by him to permit the use of rights-of-way through the public lands, forests and other reservations of the United States and the Yosemite, Sequoia and General Grant National Parks, California, for electrical plants, poles and lines for the generation and distribution of electric power, and for telegraph and telephone purposes and for canals, ditches, pipes and pipe lines, flumes, tunnels or other water conduits, and for water plants, dams and reservoirs, used to promote irrigation, or water for domestic, agricultural, manufacturing or cutting of timber, or lumber, or the supplying of water for domestic, public or other uses, and to the extent of the ground occupied by such canals, ditches, flumes, tunnels, reservoirs, or other water conduits, or water plants, dams and reservoirs, or other works permitted herein are not to exceed fifty feet on each side of the channel limits thereof or not to exceed fifty feet on each side of the line of the dam, pipe line, pipe lines, electrical, telegraph and telephone lines and poles, by any other association or corporation of the United States, which is intended to be held to exercise the use permitted herein for any one or more of the purposes herein mentioned."

There then follow two provisos of no material interest to the question now being considered.)

"—And provided further that any permission given by the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this act may be revoked by him or his successors at his discretion, and shall not be held to confer any right or easement or interest in, to or over any public land, reservation, or park."

Six Elevenths of Hetch-Hetchy Owned.

It will be seen, therefore, that Congress, after an expenditure of more than ten years with the inhibitory law of October 1, 1890, above quoted, saw fit, after thorough examination and survey, by its own agents, of Hetch Hetchy reservoir and other sites, to modify materially the inhibitory provisions of the law of 1890 to making possible the use of the water resources arising in the various reservations, public lands, and parks named in the law. It will also be seen that this action was not taken without due consideration. Years of examination and study were devoted to the question by the trained officers of the Geological Survey, and more than a year after the report had been received Congress passed the second of the laws above quoted. This latter law especially provides for the granting of rights of way for reservoirs. The reservoirs were surveyed and pointed out by a scientific bureau of the government. Amongst these is the Hetch Hetchy reservoir. On the floor of this reservoir there are meadow lands of something like eleven hundred to twelve hundred acres in extent. The title to more than six elevenths of this area had passed from the government to private parties prior to the act of February 1, 1890. These patented lands San Francisco purchased and holds. San Francisco also holds the right to utilize the remainder of the reservoir space, under the decision of May 11, 1908, of the Hon. James Rudolph Garfield, Secretary of the Interior, acting under the law of February 15, 1901. This latter right San Francisco holds under a law of Congress specifically and distinctly passed for the purpose of pointing out to the public at large and making possible the utilization of reservoir spaces within the limits of the Yosemite as well as other parks, public lands and reservations named in the law cited.

No Protest Until San Francisco Applied.

It is to be noted that other meadow lands and other valleys have been filed upon by private individuals and by corporations within the limits of this reservation, but not one word of protest has been raised against these filings. Moreover no protest was raised when the law opening these reservations to filing was proposed. Only after six elevenths of the Hetch Hetchy reservoir are owned by San Francisco and the remaining five elevenths yet standing in the ownership of the government and opened by its own acts to acquisition and utilization and after San Francisco has been legally granted the use of this remainder, have protests been urged.

These protests come from two classes or sources; First, the Spring Valley Water company, holding a monopoly of water supply for the city of San Francisco under the crude and ill-advised laws of the early history of the State of California, aided by those who have secured water power rights of enormous value for the development of electricity and the supply of water; secondly, a group of sentimentalists who in one sided discussions amongst themselves have decided that to the people of the United States the Hetch Hetchy valley has been decided in perpetuity by Congress; and that any utilization thereof in accordance with the laws of Congress and in accordance with the right of the city of San Francisco to use its own holdings for the public purposes for which they can be used is a "desecration" of this valley.

What the Bills Provided.

Now the facts are: That only six elevenths of the floor of the Hetch Hetchy have any patents whatever or deeds in perpetuity passed by the people of the United States. These are held by San Francisco. San Francisco also holds the right under the laws of this country to flood the remainder and use this and her own holdings for the highest purposes for which they can be used. The bills of Congress were not to grant San Francisco the right to use the valley, for that right that city already holds. They were to effect an exchange of lands in order to return to the government lands to which it desires to recover title, and to render the desirable nature of the permit revocable granted. It is not, however, probable, even if no exchange be effected, that, after large expenditures have been made, any Secretary of the Interior would in his discretion feel justified in considering the revocation of these permits.

Jealous of Municipal Activity.

But suppose these sentimentalists, backed by corporations of great power, should succeed in blocking San Francisco in this water development; does any sane human being entertain the idea that at some near time in the future this reservoir will not be used, for the imperative needs of the human race? And possibly through the beneficent intervention of those "whom God in his wisdom" has bestowed the right to utilize all sources of natural wealth.

It is manifest to any student of the economics of water supply and of the development of electricity by water power that it is not intended by corporations who have appropriated or secured most of the sources of natural wealth, that a city like San Francisco shall break into the holy circle of knowledge of how much it costs to develop, transmit and utilize hydro-electric power, or to supply the homes of a great city with that element of existence, water. It is clear that the opposition to this monopoly is selfish and that its leading but misguided allies are the group of sentimentalists above referred to. Some few of these have actually seen the Hetch Hetchy Valley; have described the beauties of the flowers growing on the lands owned by San Francisco, have gone into ecstasies of delight over the curves and beautiful sinuosities of Tuolumne river, flowing between green banks owned by San Francisco, have uttered their protests against cutting down oak, pine and cedar trees growing upon lands owned by San Francisco, have intimated that peaks rising one-quarter to one-half a mile above the floor of the valley are to be devastated and ruined by flooding the reservoir two or three hundred feet deep, have published pictures of falls, of rapids, bluffs and magnificent scenery, Big Trees and precipices distant a score of miles or more from the Hetch Hetchy, and even beyond the limits of the Tuolumne watershed, which are to be "devastated" by the utilization of this reservoir. The World's Work of April, 1909, published eight illustrations of scenery in and around the basin of the Tuolumne, and in that of the Merced—some in the Yosemite Valley itself—only one of which will be in the least affected by the use of the lands owned by San Francisco for a water supply. The other seven are more than twenty miles distant, and six of them are not in the basin of Tuolumne river.

The May number of the World To-day publishes five pictures of similar features. The lower portion of the scenery in one only, namely, the Falls of the Hetch Hetchy, will be affected to a point some fifty feet below the bottom of the lower fall. This falls is above the highest proposed reservoir. The others are no more affected by this utilization of San Francisco's lands and holdings than will be Central Park in New York, or Hyde Park in London. Yet upon such articles as these publications are being formed, upon the most erroneous and unjust basis.

A Bit of Muir Description.

Mr. John Muir describes some of these "enlarged" features as follows:

"The most strikingly picturesque rock in the valley is a majestic pyramid 2,000 feet in height, which is called by the Indians 'Kolana.' It is the outmost of a group like the Cathedral Rocks of Yosemite and occupies the same relative position on the south wall. Facing Kolana on the north side of the valley there is a smaller, but being formed by the Yosemite Capitan, about 1,900 feet high, and over its brow flows a stream that makes the most beautiful fall I have ever seen. The Indian name for it is Tueculala. From the brow of the cliff it is free in the air for a thousand feet, then strikes on an earthquake ledge, the Yosemite broken up into a ragged network of cascades. It is in full bloom in June and usually vanishes towards the end of summer. The Yosemite Bridal Veil is the only fall I know with which it may be compared, but it excels it. The water that wonderful fall in air, swaying grace of motion and soothing repose. Looking across the valley in the spring, when the snow is melting fast, Tueculala is seen in all her glory burning in the white sun fire in every fiber, Approaching the brink of the rock her waters flow swiftly, and in their first arching leap into the air a little hurried eagerness appears; but this eagerness is speedily hushed in sublime repose, and their tranquil progress to the base of the cliff is like that of downy feathers in a still room. The various fabrics into which her waters are woven are brought to view with marvelous distinctness by the instreaming sunshine. They sit and float from form to form down the face of that grand gray Capitan rock, in so leisurely and unconfused a manner that one may examine their texture and patterns as one would a piece of embroidery held in the hand. Near the bottom the width of the falls is increased from about 25 feet to 100 feet, and is composed of yet finer tissue, fold over fold—air, water, and sunbeams woven into irised robes that spirits might wear.

"A little to the eastward, on the same side of the valley, thunders the great Wapama or Hetch Hetchy Fall. It is about 1,700 feet high and is so near Tueculala that both are in full view from the same point. Its location is similar to that of the Yosemite Fall, but its volume of water is much greater, and at times of high water may be heard at a distance of five or six miles or more. These twin falls are on branches of the same stream, but they could hardly be more unlike. Tueculala, in sunshine, chanting soft and low like a summer breeze, in the pine; Wapama, in gorge shadows, roaring, and booming like an avalanche. Tueculala whispers that the Almighty dwells in peace; Wapama is the thunder of his chariot wheels in power.

"There are no other large falls in the valley. Here and there small streams, seldom noticed, come dancing down from crag to crag with bird-like song, doing what they can in the grand general harmony. The river falls about twenty feet into a surging trout pool at the head of the valley; and on Rancheria creek, a large tributary that comes in from the north-east, there is a series of magnificent cascades, broad silver plumes like those between the Vernal and Nevada falls in Yosemite, half leaping, half sliding, down smooth, open folds of the rocks covered with crisp, clashing spray, into which the sunbeams pour with glorious effect. Others shoot edgewise, through a deep narrow gorge, chaining and surging beneath rainbows in endless variety of form and tone." (Century Magazine—August 1908; quoted on page 38 of the Hearings of the Committee on Public Lands, U. S. House Rep., December 16, 1908.)

It may be comforting to the admirers of verbal lingerie and frills to be assured that none of these "networks," "veils," "fibers," "downy feathers," "fabrics," "textures," "patterns," "embroideries," "tissues," "plumes," nor "irised robes" are going to be interfered with in the least, now nor at any time in the future, as the features and phenomena (these terms are intended to describe are far above the highest level of the proposed reservoir.

Other Sources Considered.

It is furthermore alleged that there are other sources from which San Francisco can draw an adequate water supply.

Let us for a moment forego the manifest truth, that the supply selected by San Francisco was not open in accordance with the government's own act and in harmony with the laws of Congress, and that the right to use her holdings for the highest purpose for which they can be used did not exist, and let us suppose that this magnificent supply had not been made available by Congress through the law of February, 1901. To what straits would San Francisco then be reduced?

First, it is recognized by all, that this city must ultimately go to the Sierra Nevada for an adequate water supply, and that no Coast Range or nearby supply can ultimately be relied upon for this all-important necessity of municipal and domestic existence. Under the munificent laws of Congress each and every one of these other Sierra sources, from and including Feather river on the north to Stanislaus river on the south, has been "appropriated" by corporations and individuals who hold it at exorbitant figures; so exorbitant that one, devoid of adequate reservoirs, complicated with prior users and rights, utilized by the state for power and light, and by land owners for irrigation, polluted by hotels, summer resorts, farms, cattle ranges and other human activities, was offered for the modest sum of $10,500,000, including works not definitely specified.

We will name over these various "possible sources."

First, there is Feather river on the north. Every adequate reservoir within this drainage basin of more than 3,500 square miles is held by corporations looking to the development of or actually engaged in the development of electric power. Within this watershed are mining operations, villages, towns and farms, which contaminate the water to such an extent that, if diverted at any reasonable point,

THAT is it precisely," he affirmed, as he took my arm again and led me for a walk about the grounds until I controlled my agitation. "I am now," he said, "as I shall be in glory. I am as I was, and yet not the same."

"No one would know me for Oliver Langworthy, yet I am he, only that I have put off corruption and put on incorruption. I stand before you the perfected type of the being I was born to become, had not the limitations and accidents, inherited and acquired deficiencies of nutrition and environment, combined to make me less than the evolutionary forces within me strove to make me. My terrestrial body lies there in the shrubbery, to all appearances dead, yet if an ear were placed to my chest a regular but modified beating of the heart would be detected. That would continue for a number of days, because the motions of the heart are prompted and preserved by nerve ganglia independent of the brain, but nutrition has ceased, except as stored-up vitality, of which I had little, scarcely more than enough to suffice from meal to meal or day to day, is drawn upon. If I were gone too long exhaustion would finally cause the heart to cease performing its functions and my body would become untenable."

"My present body, which you see, is a thought body. It was thought by God when he thought me, and is ever present with me, for no thought of God ever ceases to be. It envelops me as an atmosphere, but in this I do not differ from other beings except that, by prayer and culture of the mind and soul, I have acquired a certain degree of mastery over my common clay, attained by few, yet possible for all."

"My friend," he continued, "death is ever so simple and easy after one has died a few times. The axemen of the spirits of those who are released is a bewilderment of joy at the simplicity of the transformation that has taken place. Indeed, it is hard for them to believe that they are really dead."

"If you are quite calm now and reconciled," he said, bestowing upon me a look of assurance such as a father might bestow upon a terrified child, "we will go inside. Do not mind me greatly. Mingle with the others as occasion offers. I shall be at your side as times as need be. You may refer to me, if occasion requires, as Professor Oliver, of Chicago, whom you chanced to meet at the hotel table. This will not be doing violence to the truth, as I am an instructor in psychology with the special restriction that my pupils are also instructors in psychology, but pledged to secrecy, for regard my ministerial as my serious work in life, and wish nothing else to interfere with it."

"We had now passed through the marvelously beautiful outer portal of the Ponce de Leon and directly began to ascend the marble staircase leading to the main floor. I saw that of a certainty my companion was attracting attention enough. Every passer turned to look at him, and the women especially, craned their necks that they might keep him in view."

"We presently found our hosts for the evening, to whom I presented my companion, and soon the entire party repaired to the sumptuous dining hall, our group finding seats at a table in a delightful alcove, at once retired and yet commanding an excellent view of the great assembly hall. We sat at table for perhaps two hours, during which my companion ate as heartily as any other member of the party and talked much more entertainingly. He was vivacious, courteous, at times witty, and when he spoke seriously the went to the heart of the issue and laid before us the truth clearly and unmistakably. This he did without self-conscious timidity or arrogant assumption of superior knowledge. In fine, while he did not speak with that unquestioning authority to which Jesus taught his disciples, he talked as one wielding a loving mastery over his hearer, of which others were as cognizant as himself."

"I could not be oblivious to the many interested glances cast from other tables toward my visitor from the realm of shadow."

THE MYSTERIOUS EXPERIENCES OF A MATTER-OF-FACT MAN

(Being the Sixth Galoot Club Romance.)

By TOBIAS BLACK

"I should ejaculate!" interrupted the newspaper man. "A ghost sitting down to a swell dinner and putting away course after course like an ordinary human gourmand would be worth going to Florida to see. Your spook seems to be the real thing. I rather like him. Go on."

"As I was saying," continued the Judge, without regarding the undignified interruption. "I could not be oblivious of the attention my friend drew to himself from the lady and gentleman upon whom we had come (and away from whom we had run) in the garden that afternoon, and who sat at an adjacent table. It appeared that the lady could not keep her eyes off him, but, as for the subject of her scrutiny, he seemed to be altogether unimpressed by it."

"Dinner over, the guests wandered over the great Standard Oil hotel-palace, the most luxurious establishment on the continent, and perhaps in the world, admiring the beauty and excellence of its artistic appointments, and especially the splendid collection of paintings and statuary. There is really nothing too good for newspaper men, you know," added the Judge, in a tone suggestive of ulterior purpose, "when, as in this instance, they were being most royally entertained without cost to themselves."

"Oh, I can stand that all right," responded the newspaper man. "That free dinner was the best bit of advertising the owner of the Ponce ever invested in, and even you, yourself, four years after, are pushing it along."

"As we passed through the parlors and galleries," continued the Judge, "and stopped to look at some artistic creation, the Professor would often discourse of art, pointing out excellencies or limitations that others in our party had not been able to detect, and at such times we were quickly surrounded by a group of eager listeners, for, apart from what the Professor said, his voice had a resonance little short of ravishing. When he spoke everyone within range instinctively stopped to listen."

"It was upon one of these occasions that, in turning from a painting upon the beauties of which he had been discoursing, we came full upon the lady and gentleman already referred to, upon whom we had unexpectedly come in the garden that afternoon (how be it, without having attracted their attention), but when I turned to my friend I found that he had stepped into another apartment. I was besieged with questionings regarding him, and told the little that I felt at liberty to tell, that he was Professor Oliver, of Chicago, whom I chanced to meet at the Alcazar at the lunch hour, and that I found him a very fascinating and cultured gentleman."

"In moving toward other objects of interest I found myself at the side of the lady already referred to. She was handsome, though delicate, and I gathered that her husband was a wealthy manufacturer and that they were at St. Augustine on account of her health, for the husband appeared to be sufficiently robust."

"I feel that I have seen that gentleman elsewhere," she said, speaking of the Professor; "but almost as though it were in my dreams that I had seen him. He impresses me most strangely, yet I am sure that I have not met him at any time."

"I told her that, in my own case, it was quite common to see a face that I thought I had seen before, but had not."

"I am very sure though," she insisted, "that I have seen him elsewhere, and I do not think that he can have a double, for there is something about him so very extraordinary. He appears to be surcharged with life, and yet there is little about him to suggest the animal kingdom to which we all belong. He is spirituelle without being weak, which I regard as particularly rare."

"We had rejoined the company with whom she had been walking, and I sauntered through the apartments with them for the better part of an hour, but nowhere did we catch sight of the Professor. Finally the husband of the lady excused himself in order to repair to the smoking room, bidding us good night and admonishing his wife not to sit up for him when she had gone to their rooms."

"Hardly had he taken his departure when his wife drew me to a divan, that we might the more easily view the delicate frescoes on the ceilings, as well as rest a few moments, for she was weary with walking."

"Do you know," she said, "I have thought him out. I mean the Professor. There is that about him which reminds me of a dear friend of long ago, only the Professor is so much taller and straighter and more robust. Almost he might be a younger and more athletic brother-in-law—but here she glanced furtively about and then, with downcast eyes, whispered, "the Rev. Oliver Langworthy, formerly of Detroit."

"Yes," said I, "there is a resemblance, I must confess, now that you have called attention to it, yet no one would ever mistake the one for the other."

"You know him then? Oh, do tell me about him. How long is it since you have seen him? Have you heard him preach lately? Is he not almost a divine man?"

"I told her the little I felt at liberty to tell, and found in her a most attentive listener. Indeed, she seemed to be laboring under a strong emotion, which she strove continually to suppress, but seeing that I was not oblivious to the fact, glanced hurriedly from side to side, to assure herself that we were quite alone, and then half-whispered into my ear:

"I do not know why I should tell you, an entire stranger, but I feel strongly impressed to do so. It is only duty that Oliver Longworthy and I love more than we love each other. My husband is kind and tender and—so jealous of Oliver that his name is never mentioned in our house. I shall not see him again as long as I live, which may not be so very long, as I am far from strong, but I pray without ceasing that he may go where Oliver goes when we die, and that we may be together and love each other just as much as we wish to there, without doing anyone wrong. Now you know all. Why I have told you I do not know, but I am sure you will not find it necessary to tell anyone else, at least not until I am dead. I find that I am so wrought up over what we have been talking about, and have such strange thoughts, that I must go to my room and put myself again in God's keeping. I am so glad to have met you, and hope that we may meet again some night."

"I conducted her to the elevator and she passed out of my sight forever. She is now dead. The shock of the death of Oliver Longworthy killed her."

"Hardly had the elevator disappeared beyond the upper floor when I found the Professor at my side. 'If you have rested sufficiently,' he said, 'I have something in view that will interest you, and, taking my arm, we passed again into the garden.'

"That woman is a most beautiful and amiable character," I observed. "Oh, dear! As a lily among the thorns, so is my love among the daughters," answered the Professor, quickly adding, "Oh! my dove, thou art in the clefts of the rock, in the secret places of the stars; let me see thy countenance, let me hear thy voice, that I also may share thy countenance is comely." "And it is often that I do see her in this guise," he added, "but only when she is asleep."

"You take an unfair advantage of her," said I. "Why do you not admit her to share in your great mystery?"

(To Be Concluded.)

it would have to be filtered, conducted in closed conduits to San Francisco, and there pumped for distribution at elevations reaching San Francisco level to more than 700 feet above. Not one kilowatt of the power necessary for this pumping could be obtained except by the leave of some corporation, which has taken up and appropriated these rights, without protest from the hundreds of who protest against San Francisco doing exactly what these corporations have done for selfish ends, and for their own purposes under the laws of the same Congress.

The Yuba Is Private Property.

The new drainage basin south of Feather river is its tributary. Yuba river. Every reservoir, every fork of this river, is held by private corporations engaged in the supply of hydro-electric power, irrigation water, mining operations or other activities. In the entire basin of Yuba river, every one of its forks, every one of its reservoirs, every one of its closed conduits or individuals who have appropriated and are in whole or in part, utilizing its resources. It is nearly as remote as Feather river, and its waters from the upper portions, even if kept pure from contamination, would have to be transported through closed conduits over long distances through a closely inhabited, cultivated or grazed country. If permitted to flow along their natural channels to the lower reaches to be there diverted, stored waters would become contaminated by drainage from closely occupied regions. The present users of these waters would have to be compensated, should they be diverted to other purposes, and riparian rights would have to be satisfied. These considerations and the contamination of the waters by mining debris lead the engineers considering the various sources in 1906-1901 to abandon further consideration of Yuba river, as a source of supply for municipal purposes.

The next river, the American, drains some 1,800 square miles, but has no adequate storage areas within its basin. All of its low waters are fully utilized. Many of the rights are not fully utilized, nor adjusted, so that San Francisco, or any municipality utilizing these waters, would have to buy out, in many instances, several claimants. The physical conditions known to the engineers who advised San Francisco in the beginning of these water supply examinations, were such as to absolutely inhibit the use of this watershed as a possible source, and it was known that it was not necessary to make extended examinations of its manifestly inadequate possibilities.

Why Tahoe Has Head

Lake Tahoe, on the east side of the main crest of the Sierra Nevada mountains, has been proposed as a source. This source is impracticable for several reasons. First, it would require extensive tunneling through the Sierra Nevada mountains. Second, these waters are utilized by their flow down the Truckee river out upon the plains of Nevada for power, irrigation, and municipal supplies. In this development the United States government stands first in its "Truckee-Carson" project. Third, around the margins of this magnificent mountain basin, lakes have grown up dozens of resorts and hundreds of summer homes, the drainage from which must ultimately pollute to a certain extent, even the superbly pure waters of this grandest of mountain lakes. This source is therefore absolutely ruled out of practical consideration.

South of American river is the Mokelumne, with quite a number of small reservoir areas, all fully owned or utilized by corporations and none available, except at great cost.

Next south is the Stanislaus; adequate in area, with pure waters, subject to slight contamination, but owned for many years past, by corporations engaged in the development of hydro-electric power, and recently purchased from them by the United Railroads of San Francisco for the operation of their system.

Between these are one or two minor streams and lakes, Bear river and the Cosumnes, which are inadequate, both in volume, storage capacity, and possibility of utilization, and are moreover lower down on the Sierra and of very inferior quality, when compared with other Sierra streams.

It will be seen, therefore, that there does not exist on the west slope of the Sierra and north of the Tuolumne river, a single stream which could be utilized, as has been so glibly suggested. Moreover, if these waters could be utilized, there yet remains the fact that these very corporations are allied in such a way that San Francisco would have to purchase from one or the other the power necessary to raise these waters to sufficient elevation to supply all of the five upper levels if not the lower ones, into which the city is naturally subdivided.

Even the attorney of the Spring Valley Water company has pleaded that, if San Francisco could not get water sufficient from his company, she could get it from one of these, his allied brothers in "appropriations."

As Garfield Saw It.

But Secretary Garfield, after a statesmanlike study of the entire situation and having at his command the skilled and highly trained officers of the United States Geological Survey, and the water supply experts of the government, decided that "In considering the reinstated application of the city and county of San Francisco, I do not need to pass upon the claim that this is the only practicable and reasonable source of water supply for the city. It is sufficient that, after careful and competent study, the officials of the city insist that such is the case." By granting the application opportunity will be given for the city by obtaining the necessary two-thirds majority vote to demonstrate the practical question as to whether or not this is the water supply desired and needed by the residents of San Francisco."

When the people of San Francisco, under this broad and clear proposition, had an opportunity to express their views at the election of November 12, 1908, they decided by a majority of over six to one in favor of the supply, which the Geological Survey of the United States government had pointed out as desirable in 1890, which the laws of Congress had made available in 1901 and which her officials and officers had consequently selected and laid before them.

Where the People's Power Has Gone.

It has been alleged that San Francisco should be charged for the power developed by these stored waters. It is again significant that these urgings have not been made as regards power companies who have secured rights of far, far greater value at the bare cost of complying with the over-generous laws of Congress and of the several states. Any one who reads between the lines of the message of President Roosevelt, vetoing the bill granting to a private corporation power rights on James river in Missouri, will note that there are five corporations, practically controlled by five men who have appropriated rights worth five hundred millions of dollars, and not one whimper or one objection have we heard from the sentimentalists and other allies of the corporations which have appropriated these powers. Moreover, it is manifest to the student of economics and of the resources of our country, that the hydro-electric powers of the United States are greater in value than all the coal fields and all the oil fields of our country put together. These hydro-electric powers possess the additional advantage that when a million kilowatts of energy have been utilized they are there the next morning and the next, for future generations as long as gravity shall cause the waters to flow from the mountains to the sea. But whenever a hundred thousand tons of coal or a hundred thousand barrels of oil have gone into the economies of the human race they are gone forever, as elements of wealth or as resources to be utilized.

If these pleaders that San Francisco be made by the United States government to pay for the utilization of waters which belong not to the government, but to the State of California, will turn their attention to the broader and noble problem of conserving the resources of this country from corporate greed, they will have a broader and nobler field for the exercise of all their energies and of all their patriotism.

Also This People's Playground.

It has also been alleged that, in utilizing the water flowing from the basin of the Tuolumne river above Hetch Hetchy reservoir, the public must be shut out from the "people's playground." Let us study a moment the features of this "playground."

First, it constitutes 483 square miles. Through it there lies a single practicable road. Not one-tenth part of the area is accessible to any but the hardest mountaineer, and that only during the months of June, July, August and September. Nine-tenths of it, or more, are mountains of extreme ruggedness, through which in narrow and dangerous trails only the hardest of mountain climbers can pass. To speak of this as a "playground" is erroneous in the extreme. It is full of temples, placed by the hand of the Almighty in remote and inaccessible ridges and peaks rising to snow-bound heights of ten to thirteen thousand feet above sea level in order that only those devotees whose worship is pure shall ever reach their gates, shut out forever from the weak, gaping crowd, who have not the energy nor the soul to appreciate their grandeur. Inaccessible and severe, they frown upon the weakling who would attempt to scale their sacred precincts as a "playground." From these superb heights there flows, as the snows of winter melt, the purest water. During this period of melting, rain again cannot reach the higher levels. Only when the mountains are free of snow and the run off practically ceased can the devotee reach these regions. During this period camp waste and impurities are exposed to the glaring sun of the skies of California. Later any germs which may exist in these wastes are exposed to the frosts of early autumn. It is well known that harmful bacteria cannot exist under a few hours of sunshine and but few withstand a night of frost. The members of these mountain climbing clubs are the polluters which their brethren represent, they should be ruled out, not only of the basin of the Tuolumne, but out of any mountain region from which human homes are supplied with water. If during the few months of summer and early autumn, waters flowing therefrom shall be polluted, by the few tourists whose energies and devotion may carry them into these regions, what must be the degree of pollution to which lower and more accessible areas full of human activities are subjected?

There are thus three classes of objects—first, those who from selfish purposes subvert the laws of justice and of right and attempt to prevent San Francisco from acquiring and developing a source of water made available by the beneficent laws of our country. Second, those who from sentimental reasons magnify and distort to extreme degrees the actual effects of utilization of Hetch Hetchy reservoir for a few hundred feet above its floor. Third, those who from ignorance choose to assert that the exclusion of the public from the drainage area is necessary. The first of these classes seizes upon every whimsey of the other two to magnify and misrepresent the facts for their own avaricious ends.

San Francisco legitimately and equitably holds these rights to a superb water supply. Only through injunctive and misrepresentation on the part of others and through neglect on the part of her own citizens can she lose them.

GREAT MESSENGERS AND—MESSENGER BOYS.

Moriz Rosenthal, the great pianist, has this to say of the works of modern composers: "The orchestra is written for nowadays in preference to anything else, because it makes a small idea go the farthest." Composers of today have not sufficient thoughts to construct an effective piano piece. The piano is a merciless revealer of weak design. All modern composers strive to write something novel, whereas the great composers wrote what came to them irrespective of effect. The present education is responsible for the musical undred of today. The young are given the new before they know the old. We will not deny that there is a message in the new music; but there are two kinds of bearers: The great messengers and—messenger boys! Rosenthal will make an American tour next season under London Charlton's direction.

BETTER PROMISE FOR THE EUCALYPT.

Editor California Weekly—Sir In Mr. Peavy's final article on eucalypts, which deals with the rate of growth and the value of their product, it seems to me that in his desire to correct the impression conveyed by certain prospectuses issued by eucalyptus companies he has erred on the other side. As he does me the honor to quote me in support of some of his statements, and as it may be assumed that therefore I agree with all of them, I would be glad of an opportunity to correct that impression.

His table showing rate of growth seems to me especially misleading. It apparently rests on a solid basis of fact, the figures were obtained from actual measurements of 180,000 trees, representing practically every grove in the state. They therefore represent a true average of what had been accomplished in eucalyptus culture up to the time when they were taken, 1903. For want of better data, they might be considered as true for the plantations now being established or at any rate as furnishing a "mental corrective to those who are inclined to accept as authoritative the yield estimates presented by some of the eucalyptus companies." A moment's reflection, however, will show that they are quite valueless even for purposes of mental correction, for the present plantations are of an entirely different order from those the figures are based upon. Mr. Peavy himself says, "The business of planting eucalypts for the purpose of producing a commodity for the market is still in its infancy." That is, hitherto they have been planted not where they would grow best—not according to their requirements as laid down by Mr. Peavy in his second article—but wherever the planter needed trees for wind-breaks or on otherwise unproductive land for domestic fuel supplies. In consequence it is safe to say that most of these groves are in situations that would be entirely unsuitable for commercial plantations, and it is manifestly improper to use such figures as forecasting the results of commercial planting.

To assume that a fair average yield or even a mental corrective can be obtained in this way is to assume that the educational work accomplished by this office, by the Forest Service and by Mr. Peavy's own articles has been and is being wholly thrown away. This I am unwilling to believe, and in fact it is contradicted every day by dozens of inquiries received by this office. Bona fide planters are no longer planting by guess, but upon the best information they can get.

The man Mr. Peavy is after is evidently the unscrupulous promoter. Undoubtedly, as I said in the interview referred to, "certain promoters are apparently more concerned in obtaining the widow's mite than in propagating eucalyptus timber." The yield from their plantations will be as near to nothing as they can safely make it. On the other hand, there are persons in the business who realize that there is a profit both for the promoter and for the investor and who wish to do the right thing by both.

If the average investor is to share in the profits of the industry, which Mr. Peavy admits to be a sound one in spite of his discouraging figures, it must ordinarily be as a shareholder in some company. Only, he must first satisfy himself that the company is sound and that the officers have both the knowledge and the will to make the enterprise successful. Under these circumstances, $150 to $300 per acre is not an excessive price to pay for land since it represents not the initial cost but the prospective value of the land and crops.

This office has taken upon itself to correct as far as possible misstatements and false impressions given out regarding eucalyptus, and it seems to me that Mr. Peavy's final article is as worthy of attention in this respect as the prospectuses we both object to.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

What Constitutes Citizenship.

All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside.

No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.

No shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law, nor deny any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The foregoing constitutes Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. It was paraphrased the better to consider the several parts of it.

Citizenship is a thing upon which the world has set great store. It was a great thing to be a Roman citizen and during the French Revolution citizenship was deemed the highest honor that could be conferred or enjoyed. Citizenship implies an interest in the government, a right to protection and, in our case, to participation in the affairs of government. It is unfortunate, however, that our sense of the obligations of citizenship is not as lively as that of the benefits to be conferred and rights enjoyed under it.

It is a bit surprising that the Constitution of the United States had suffered so important a matter as what should constitute citizenship in the nation and the states to pass on undefined until the Civil War made such determination and definition imperative. The creation by emancipation of more than four millions of new citizens, not unlikely to be encroached upon, forced the hand of the nation to write in the organic law that in which citizenship should consist.

The first clause leaves a small opportunity for misconception. Not all persons born within the United States are subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. The children of diplomats from foreign nations are not. They are citizens of the nations from which their parents are commissioned. Until recently the children of our own native Indians were not citizens, and not all of them are now, though the tendency is to accord them citizenship, as well as to impose upon them the obligation of citizenship. They have been wards of the nation, not citizens. With these limitations all persons born in the United States are citizens of the United States and entitled to all the privileges and immunities of other citizens. This is true of Chinese children or of Japanese born in the United States, although their parents cannot become citizens by naturalization, being prohibited by statute from so doing.

The second clause above quoted embodies one of the results of the Civil War. It was certain that without this guaranty of rights discriminating laws would be enacted to the injury of the freedmen. There are few instances more strong than that of race antipathy. It is unreasoning, unkind, ungenerous and, sometimes, inhuman, but it exists and must always be reckoned with.

Besides, there is that within us which tempts us to assume superiority over those weaker than ourselves, a natural gravitation toward an aristocracy of some kind. Knowing this and foreseeing that these tendencies would manifest themselves on the part of the white people of the South against the blacks, the nation undertook to forestall the effect by incorporating this clause in the amendment. It has not been wholly successful, but it has helped to make the condition of the blacks more tolerable than would otherwise have been possible. They have been discriminated against more or less in the administration of the laws if not in the wording of the laws themselves.

The third clause had the same purposes in view, but it has had an effect that was never dreamed of by those who drafted it. It has given to artificial persons, persons of the state's own creation—that is, to corporations—all the rights, privileges and immunities granted by the constitution to living human beings. This clause has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States to deny to the states power for treating corporations differently from the manner in which individual persons are treated. Had this been understood at the time the amendment was drafted it would not have been so drafted and had it been so understood by the people when they voted on it, it may be doubted if it would have been adopted by three-fourths of the states. The extension of these privileges and immunities to corporations was a bit of judge-made law, made to oblige tremendous financial interests.

The writer of this series of lessons in citizenship has sought to emphasize the fact, not fully realized, that our government was not founded, pre-eminently, upon the rights of man—of humanity whether possessed of property or not—but upon property. The makers of the constitution were fearful of what the propertyless might undertake to do in a free government with acquired property. They were afraid that they might want to divide and, when there again became an inequality of condition, divide again, so they enthroned property in such a position of security as no other nation on earth has done. This final clause of Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment so established the rights of property that nothing short of a revolution will ever curtail those rights.

This becomes something of a source of anxiety when we see individual citizens accumulating, and freely disposing of, more wealth than kings ever owned as though they had themselves created it, when, in fact, it was mainly created by Almighty God as a common heritage for his children. The writer of this is no alarmist, nor is he a socialist or a malcontent of any sort, but he believes that the Man, and not the things that the man may possess himself of, deserves first consideration under constitution and laws. Sometime, somehow, the preeminence of humanity over property will have to be declared and made the cornerstone of this Republic. In the contrary direction lies aristocracy, inequality of opportunity, degradation of the proscribed class, anarchy and revolution, likely to follow as result of an incorporated plutocracy made possible by the Supreme Court's construction of the final clause of Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Poor Lo off the Copper.

The new cents to be coined at the Philadelphia mint will bear the head of Abraham Lincoln, and the inscription, "In God We Trust," will appear upon the coin. This marks a radical departure in American coinage. Heretofore the United States cent has borne only the head of an Indian.

Proofs of the new cent have been struck and submitted to President Taft by Victor D. Brenner, the New York sculptor and medalist, and he has been advised from Washington that the inscription, "In God We Trust," must appear. This change will necessitate a delay in the coinage, and new cents will not be in circulation until late in August.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unwieldy and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

Still a Wager of Battle.

The kernel of our judicial system came to us from the forests of Germany and the North Sea Low Countries, which countries, by the way, threw away their own judicial seed corn and took over Roman jurisprudence entire, much to the advantage of said countries. The origin of our system was in barbarism, and one of the barbarities of early days was the adjustment of disputes through trial by battle, it being superstitiously believed that the fates, the powers of darkness or divine interposition, would so nerve the arm of right as to make it triumphant. A judicial priest presided and the mob gathered to see the issue fought out.

We, in this country, have not gotten wholly away from the Wager of Battle idea. During the trial of Patrick Calhoun, and especially during the closing days, there was nothing short of a wager of battle, the destructive powers of language being used in lieu of clubs, broadswords, rapiers or shooting irons. Both the prosecution and the defense felt free to hurl at the opposing side anything and everything that came handy, from vegetable phraseology in an advanced state of decay to huge-voiced boulders hurled down from stormy heights of eloquence.

During the entire progress of the trial, the newspapers have chiefly chronicled the clashing between the attorneys. The rest of the proceedings were mainly regarded as immaterial if not irrelevant. The treatment of the jury justified the theory that it represented the commonality and that the commonality is essentially a mob and not composed of inquiring, reasoning seekers after truth. It seemingly occurred to no one to make a calm, dispassionate appeal to the understanding of that jury, in a conversational tone. It was essentially a contest of physical endurance; but we should remember that it was only ninety years ago that the British parliament formally abrogated Trial by Battle. We haven't come so very far since then. A trial of a criminal cause should be an inquiry and not a battle, or contest of any kind, and the Roman law so regarded it. To this end a trial judge must have great power. With us he has come to be merely an umpire. Is it not about time to rationalize and civilize our whole criminal procedure and behavior?

If Calhoun Had Been Coffey!

If Patrick Calhoun had been Michael Coffey and Coffey Calhoun, what a difference!

If Calhoun had been Coffey it would have required three days instead of three months in which to empanel a jury in his case; it would have taken less than a week to thresh the issue out; he would have been found guilty after thirty-five minutes of deliberation; and he would now be making jute bags for the state. The testimony of the boodle board, with such corroboration as was afforded, would have convinced twelve men beyond a reasonable doubt of the criminal culpability of Calhoun.

But if Coffey had been Calhoun it would have taken three months to secure a jury before whom his trial was to be had, more than two months more of trial, twenty-four hours for deliberation and the jurors would have stood ten to two against his conviction on the evidence of the boodle board corroborated though it was at every essential point.

If Calhoun had been Coffey and Coffey Calhoun, what a difference! But what was that difference? Money, the sheltering arms of a confederation of iniquities banded together to make justice an affair of poverty and to hold successful rascality immune to the laws of men, to make it a caste, an upper crust of purchased privilege, neither fearing God nor regarding man. The difference between Calhoun and Coffey is sufficient, if established in our institutions and maintained against assault, to encompass the destruction of the Great Republic and write "finis" at the end of what men had hoped would prove the most promising chapter of the world's history.

Oakland's New Departure.

The Oakland school system has undertaken a forward movement that, while it has been over-long delayed, should encourage every other city in California to do likewise. It has arranged to inaugurate a system of physical examination of pupils preparatory to their entering school to ascertain what, if any, handicaps such school children labor under and whether or not such deficiencies are remediable. At the head of this department they have placed one of the very best men for the place to be found in this state, Dr. N. K. Foster, secretary for six years or more of the State Board of Health. He feels a profound interest in the subject and will bring to bear upon the task a trained enthusiasm. Dr. Foster is the soul of sincerity and he has the moral courage to sustain him, come what may. It will be no perfunctory performance that he will go through. The handicapped child will not only be given a chance at physical equality of opportunity with its fellows, but it will have a friend at hand who will insist that neither stupid nor indifferent parents nor political pull, shall prevent its getting it. Good for Oakland. What city comes next?

Wherefore Immune?

The California Weekly wishes no man harm and it cherishes no grudge against Willard P. Calkins, but it should not be possible, in a civilized country, for any person to gather together half a million of other people's dollars and blow them down the wind as lightly as a child may toss soap bubbles into the air, and then retire within the sheltering arms of bankruptcy, never to be called to account through any criminal procedure. It would seem that there must have been culpable carelessness, if nothing worse, in the management of the Calkins Syndicate, and the notorious bad character of the periodicals that man conducted raises a strong presumption that there must have been something worse. The career of Willard P. Calkins invites scrutiny.

United Cities' Conference.

In presenting to the readers of The California Weekly the resolved results of a conference, held in Chicago nearly three and a half years ago, the Staff is conscious of having dug up some rather dry bones that will be viewed with small interest by the many, and yet, it is to be hoped, with much interest by the few. As pointed out many times in these columns, the problem of democratic government, still very much of a problem, is to be worked out in the cities, not alone the large cities, but the small ones also, and whatever helps the cities to be governed as they should be will help the state and nation to be governed as they should be. Viewed from that standpoint, the results of the United Cities' Conference, held in January, 1906, deserve to be preserved for careful reading and occasional reference. They will be found elsewhere in this issue.

The Poor Manufacturers.

The Los Angeles Express shies at the proposal to levy a tariff tax of 165 per cent. on the importation of woolen blankets when the facts show that 15 per cent. abundantly equalizes the difference in labor cost of production at home and abroad. The Express overlooks the item of "a reasonable profit to the American manufacturer" guaranteed by the Republican platform of last year. That is what the extra 150 per cent. was tacked on for. Would the unfeeling Express force the children of woolen manufacturers to go hungry?

Let no patriot be surprised or discouraged if the anticipated supreme court decision, on the direct primary law, sets the movement back where it started. Sincere friends of the direct nomination idea have predicted that it would require ten years to wrest from the powers that have dominated courts and legislatures in this state a satisfactory, workable and really direct nomination law. What with duplicity, cunning and a not unlikely technical interpretation of the law at the hands of the courts, it will be matter for congratulation if this prediction be not fulfilled.

WHAT ARE WE GOING TO DO ABOUT IT?

The California Weekly hesitates to predict revolution. It has been often predicted, and predicated, upon insufficient reason by vaporous personalities whose mouthings were unworthy of serious concern, but this much may be prudently said: The happiness of the American people can not be guaranteed under a system of jurisprudence that holds only the weak to accountability before the law and suffers predatory wealth to go unwhipped of justice and uncondemned by public sentiment, alike whether it buys public servants away from their official duty or surrenders to blackmailers who have misused public confidence in order to secure public office. Take either horn of the dilemma and the perpetuity of free institutions becomes impossible. In an issue betwixt justice without liberty and liberty without justice we can not foreknow what the decision will be, but this we do know: It can not be fortunate, and it is this issue that an incorporated plutocracy is forcing. Of all forms of government the plutocratic is the most abominable.

It is too plain to be questioned that, confronted by malefactors of great wealth, our system of criminal jurisprudence, from trial court to court of appeal, from the empanelling of a jury to the final finding of the court of last resort, breaks down under strain. Something must be done about it. What?

In the first place, we must emancipate our city, state and national governments, from corporate control and restore the undisputed supremacy of the whole people. Without this we have no freedom of people or institutions.

Second, our legal processes must be reformed and simplified, the ceremonial element largely eliminated and the soul of justice reincarnated in the procedure. In doing this we are not without example and leadership. British justice is the model for the world. Great Britain has gone through what we are going through, has solved the problem that we are trying to solve, and we have only to take her example, and adapt it to our uses, to make the path straight and the goal certain. To this end The California Weekly has arranged for a series of authoritative articles dealing with the administration of justice in Great Britain, that all may know what that country has done that we need to do. Inasmuch as all our institutions are British in origin, we suffer no humiliation in going to the same source for further guidance.

Our trial courts must be restored to them those common law powers, of which lawyer legislators have stripped them, without which a pulchre is only an umpire and a court an arena.

Then our bar must be purged of men who, having sworn, as officers of the court, to uphold justice and the law, make fortunes by debauching justice and making a travesty of the law.

The task is simple but not easy. Mother England will show us where we took the wrong trail and the way to get back to the right side of the road, but all the powers of the infernal regions will be brought to bear to prevent our getting back to first principles and taking a new start. There is not a villainy, vile or aggressive, associated, incorporated or justified, that will not fight the battles of our criminal jurisprudence like cornered wildcats. Things are now exactly as they would have been, except that present-day struggles for justice tend to create unfortunate situations for gentlemen who should be free to get what they want, however they go about getting it, without being embarrassed by low fellows like Joseph W. Folk and Francis J. Heney, who regard a public office as a public trust and are evidently without superior breeding. Yes, there is one more thing that the associated plutocracies desire—a well drilled military California has the opportunity to lead in this herculean task. The eyes of the nation are focussed upon this state and its chief city. A League of Justice has already been formed and its scope of operations may easily be made, first state and then national. Who, that can command a hearing, shall speak to the people that they may go forward?

OUR OBLIGATIONS TO MR. CALHOUN.

Mr. Patrick Calhoun has not lived in vain. He has performed a great, if not a meritorious, public service. He has demonstrated in the view of the whole world the imbecility of the American system of criminal jurisprudence as applied to trial courts. He has shown the impossibility of convicting a rich man of any crime he may choose to commit against the general public, even though the commission of that crime be not denied either by the accused himself or by any of his sympathizers or friends. Today justice lies prostrate, bedraggled, driveling, disgustingly imbecile, an incompetent whom no one not a pauper or a fool need fear. Whoever aids us to know the worst about us is far from being our greatest enemy. Hence these acknowledgments of obligation to Mr. Patrick Calhoun and the seven spirits who entered into the temple of justice with him and helped to render its last condition more foul than its first.

Mr. Calhoun has, first of all demonstrated the truth that our highly elaborated and intricate system of selecting a jury results, in crucial cases, in keeping every man off the jury panel who ought to be on and putting on the jury panel only those who ought to be off. He has shown how, in crucial cases, three months may be expended in sifting a few particles of chaff from a whole granary of good wheat that the wheat may be rejected and the chaff retained. Only imbecility could have made itself believe that the huddle supervisors, no matter how discreditable a lot they may be, could have persistently sworn to having received bribe money that they did not receive. For, have they not "sworn to their own hurt and charged not" the final test of truth telling?

Mr. Calhoun has shown that the principle of eliminating incompetence and capacity from the jury is extended also to the witnesses. By the application of this principle the very persons who do know the facts that must be established in order to establish justice are not only excused, but practically prohibited, from testifying. In order to be excused from telling the truth a witness has only to say, in effect, "If I were to tell the truth the truth would show that I, too, am a criminal," in order to go forth, not only free from testifying but free to claim absolution from taint of a criminality that he has himself confessed. This is not justice. It is foolishness. And not only may those who do know all the facts refuse to testify regarding them, but the jury is estopped from drawing such conclusions as any sane person must draw from their refusal to testify. This final absurdity we owe, not to the courts, but to legislator attorneys who make their livelihoods by keeping out of prison men whom the public good requires to be in prison.

Mr. Calhoun has also demonstrated the malign influence which a boughten and corrupted press may exert over the sentiment of a community, by and through the policy of persistent and consistent perversion of news and editorial expression. It is great.

He has also demonstrated the innate tendency of every unit of successful rascality to rally to the defense of any such unit that finds itself in the need of help. He has shown that there is a bond of union between malefactors of great wealth that will bear any strain put upon it up to the point where rascality ceases to be successful. This is the cause of Rascal Ruef's unfortunate predicament and why he has relatively few friends to defend or apologize for him. He hasn't made good at being bad. On the contrary, he made a mess of it and is not unlikely to be the only one of the whole rascally confraternity who will make jute bags on state account.

But there are some limitations to the public services of Mr. Calhoun. He has not demonstrated the quality of our courts of appeal. He has not made it absolutely certain that courts constituted as those courts are will, at every crucial test, follow the letter of the law to the neglect of its spirit; that they will invariably preserve the law in its symmetry and immaculateness while allowing justice to be hurled into the gutter to be rent to pieces and devoured by pariah dogs; that they will remember at the supreme instant what influence it was that put the judges thereof upon their respective benches and what influence there is that can take them off benches if they do not meet the expectations of their creators. These points are still in issue. Even the Schmitz, Ruef and Glass cases have not determined such issues beyond the shadow of a doubt. It is essential that they be so determined. There is therefore one more great public service which Mr. Calhoun may perform: He has the money and he has the men. All he needs is opportunity. Let him therefore have another trial in the hope that, next time, he may gain access to our courts of appeal and so complete a needed detail of demonstration.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE IN RETROSPECT.

The President's special message to Congress, recommending a 2-per cent tax upon the net incomes of corporations, and the submission to the states of a constitutional amendment authorizing the imposition of a national income tax, rather stunned us. We could not understand the intent and purpose of that message and said so. That it was strategic we felt convinced, and we have seen no reason for change of opinion as to that. But in what does that strategy consist?

William Howard Taft was designated as a proper person to be made President by Theodore Roosevelt, and it was through the Roosevelt influence that he became President. The expectation was that the Roosevelt policies would be essentially his policies and that the good work started by Roosevelt would be forwarded to consummation by Taft.

But the people have heard little from Taft since. He has played golf. Some have come to doubt him and many to entertain that discouraged feeling that takes the heart out of home. The Aldrich gang have sought to rivet the chains of extortion upon the wrists of the consuming multitude that favored individuals may go through the pockets of the people at their leisure. Taft has looked on, but he hasn't "let on" that he saw anything. All these months he has been as uncommunicative to the public as the Sphinx. Then came this special message that seemingly had little or nothing to do with the tariff.

The two things that President Taft has recommended that Congress do are the two things that predatory interests would be most certain to not wish to have done. The two per cent tax upon the net earnings of corporations would give the general government an interior view of every corporation doing business in the United States. It would involve such a prying into business affairs as no government on earth has undertaken and it would afford such an opportunity for uncovering corporate abuses as must furnish a foundation for supervision and control that would almost make the government a director of all corporations.

When, in 1894, an income tax was made a feature of the Wilson tariff bill, and the Supreme Court of the United States sustained it, it did look as though a united community had won a substantial victory over a united power-holding class but, upon a reconsideration of the issue, the Supreme Court proved its allegiance to the power-holding element and the income tax was pronounced unconstitutional. It is a tax that only the benevolent, righteous, country-folks, square-deal, rich and well-to-do will consent to pay, and its levying and collection involves a searching governmental inquiry into private, as well as corporate affairs, most distasteful to all persons and corporations that love darkness rather than light.

Now at the precise moment when the raising of these two issues must prove most embarrassing to Aldrich and his crowd of extortioners, the President sets off this bomb under the sofas upon which these persons have been peacefully lounging. It has dazed the gray wolves and dazed the nation. That bomb wasn't set off accidentally. It was done on purpose and the purpose of it was strategic. It virtually says to Aldrich and his combination: "You fellows make a tariff bill that will meet the expectations of the consuming millions of America or I will go to those millions with a double-barreled issue that will turn your constituency inside out." If this is not the explanation of that message, what is?

It may be remarked in conclusion that a tax upon the net incomes of all corporations, or only those doing an interstate business, would prove a perfectly just revenue producer. What is wanted is not more ways of taxing the same persons who are now bearing the brunt of the cost of government, but more ways for taxing those who now escape their just share of the common burden. A corporation tax affords such a way. The most valid, if not the most serious, objection to the imposition of such a tax is that the trend of state taxation is in that direction and the same form of taxation ought not to be resorted to by both state and nation.

METROPOLITAN SPIRIT LACKING.

The result of Tuesday's bond election in San Francisco was a just cause for mortification. It displayed a tendency as distinctly unamerican as unmetropolitan and shows that the huckster spirit that has characterized much of the journalism of this city in past years, has permeated the general voting constituency to an injurious degree. Any person who will vote for a playground or a park for his own district of the city, and against playgrounds and parks for other portions of the city, is unfit to exercise the right of suffrage. He is too small to be a voter, whether or not he be too young, too new to the country and the American atmosphere, too near to the border line of inadequate mentality or whatever may be his besetting limitation. He deserves to be roundly abused and made ashamed of himself, if he be capable of experiencing the sense of shame.

Nevertheless, these civic ineptables are voters and do vote and must be taken into account. They must be made fit to be a portion of the electorate of a great city or their city will not become great. It will be and remain an over-grown country village seen in its true character only when a circus parades the streets and all the people turn out to see the elephant. The progressive, American, metropolitan, patriotic, home-loving element in the life of San Francisco (and that there is such an element the election also shows) can now see what it has cut out for it in the way of public education in regard to public needs. The inert, unintelligent, precinct-bound, foggy constituency can and must be made to have a different spirit come over their dreams, their thoughts and their acts.

There were a few particulars in which right-minded men might honestly differ. The new civic center proposal was at least debatable. A less elaborate and costly detention home might subserve all essential needs if supplemented by an intelligent probation and placing-out system; but as to the parks and playgrounds—their failure to carry was the result of an obtuseness as little to the credit of the morals of those who voted against them as to their mentality.

The superlative need of San Francisco is a community of interest, a metropolitan spirit. The need is to get together. The solidarity of the city has not been consummated. San Francisco is little better bound together into one homogeneous whole than the east bay cities are. There is as little in common between the Western Addition, the Mission and the Potrero, in San Francisco, as between Oakland, Berkeley and Alameda. A getting together for the interests of a common humanity is a prime necessity.

Tuesday's election was a manifestation of the same narrow, huckster spirit that prevented the widening of certain streets, except on condition that the other fellow's street be the one widened. In all respects wherein men may earn praise for courage and capacity for helping themselves the Men of San Francisco have made good, but when it comes to making good for the common good their exaggerated individualism makes them almost anti-social beings. Their passion for public service is on a parity with their passion for transcendentalism in philosophy, literature and art, not overmastering.

A Pacific Appointment.

The selection of Frank A. Leach, now director of the Mint, to be president of the People's Water Company, that supplies the East Bay cities, is worthy of consideration. Mr. Leach is essentially a man of peace. His instincts are not predatory. Had the People's Water Company wanted an executive to practice extortion upon the public at all the meters and faucets in the system, Mr. Leach would not have been the man. As they did want Mr. Leach the inference is unmistakable that the People's Water Company wants peace and contentment, justice and fair dealing. If public service corporations generally were similarly disposed as little would be heard of municipal ownership as of forced-

The Deeper Significance : : : of Living : : :

"To those who have no resource within themselves for living well and happily every age is burdensome; but to those who seek all good things from themselves nothing can appear evil while the necessity of nature entails, in which class particularly is old age, which all men wish to attain, yet complain of when they have attained it."

So wrote Cicero, a half-century before the birth of Christ. And he wrote truly. The dependent life is not a good life to live, no matter what the form of dependence, and the life that is not good to live becomes in old age gall and wormwood for bitterness.

People struggle, save, and scrimp all their productive days that they may make pecuniary provision for tiding them through the few years when they shall have little or no capacity to earn; but how many take thought for laying up store of interest to keep them mentally alert when, physically, the spring has gone out of their joints, the elasticity out of their steps and the aches of age lay hold of them?

It is not good to have too much done for us. There are men who, with a suspender button off, are helpless. Some one must as certainly come to their rescue as though they were about to fall into the sea in the act of solving ice. The love of woman has so spoiled many a man as to make his second childhood as helpless as his first. His bath must be prepared for him, his shaving water heated, the shirt he is to put on laid out and his wife must escort him to the door, whiskbroom in hand, to see that no vagrant threads cling to his clothing. When such a man grows old he becomes a patient in the care of some one as certainly as though sent to a hospital.

There are hundreds of old men and women in hospitals and in the insane asylums, not merely because they have grown dependently and irascibly old. There is no other place fit to receive them. With their children or grandchildren they are intolerable, a burden too great for flesh and blood to endure, and if so they are hustled off to an institution where the care of human porcupines is reduced to an occupation.

It will be noted above that Cicero speaks hopefully of those who seek all good things "from" not "for" themselves. The difference is world-wide and never so apparent as in age. The person who has all his life sought all good things "for" himself will find himself bereft in age of all that can make old age tolerable. The person who has sought all good things all his life "from" himself will have a reservoir to draw upon that will not fail him while he retains his faculties, and if he has used his faculties he will retain them. We lose, as we grow old, only those things that we did not much use when we grew old. The person who has sought up his family and fitted them for life may have had his chance to reach out and gather to herself an array of interests beyond her daily round of doing, but, the crop matured and marketed, she owes it to herself to widen and broaden her capacities for enjoyment against the day when she becomes a maternal has-been.

The man who founds a family and acquires a competency may, if he have only mediocre abilities, have to devote himself pretty steadily to his business, leaving relatively little time for broadening his interior development, and he would not, in age, be an intellectual pauper. He must somehow prepare himself with resources within himself so that when business is laid aside there will be something left. Many a man dies with the harness on merely because, when the interior development was nothing left. It is not a virtue so to die.

"Nothing can appear evil which the necessity of nature entails," and a rightly lived life will yield an old age that has its compensations for all its denials. Cicero saw this 2,000 years ago, for he spoke much of the obligation that men have to the young, and the obligation that men have to the old. The assassins in the employ of Antony cut off his head too early to give him much of a taste of old

Nitrogen as a Fertilizer.

Ten years have passed since Sir William Crookes, the noted scientist, pointed out that a general famine could not be far distant for the world unless some method of fertilizing and rejuvenating the soil, and restoring the nitrogen agricultural processes take from it, could be discovered. With this conclusion men of learning generally agreed, and so Professor Bernthsen's recent demonstration of a method of taking the nitrogen from the atmosphere for that purpose, which was made before the Central Technical College, of London, was of great significance. In the process this demonstrated nitrogen taken from the air is mixed with various elements and converted into such nitrates of sodium, potassium or calcium as farmers may use for fertilizing purposes, electricity being the transforming agent. Water power may be used for energy in effecting this transformation, and it is claimed that there is no question that fertilizing nitrates thus may be produced in commercial quantity. Those who are best qualified to judge say it is a discovery that is big with possibilities for the betterment of humanity.

Identification by Veins of the Hand.

It is not impossible that the Bertillon system of identification by means of the print of the skin on fingers and thumbs may be succeeded by a method proposed by Professor Tomassio, an Italian. The Bertillon method long was considered pretty nearly perfect, but it has been discovered that criminals can, and do, circumvent it without great pain either by using a razor on the finger tips or by burning them, the process so altering the markings that identification no longer is possible. Under Professor Tomassio's method the hand of the person whose future identification may be desired is held downward for some time, or some way the flow of blood is restrained, and after the veins have become swollen they are photographed. It is claimed that no two persons have identical venous markings on the backs of the hands, and, while this assertion perhaps has not been fully demonstrated, it is not improbably true. Of course, if it is, the Tomassio system would be the perfection of identification, in that in no conceivable way could the record one bears on one's hands be altered.

King Edward as a Horseman.

King Edward of England so long ago established a reputation as a "dead game sport" that nobody need be greatly surprised by any of the features which still serve to maintain that reputation, even though he is drawing near to his seventies. Nevertheless, it is rather startling to learn that his winnings on the turf in about twenty years have amounted to more than $700,000, a very comfortable addition even to a monarch's income, although, of course, it is far from being clear gain. For a long time the odds of fortune ran heavily against King (then Prince) Edward, but in 1889 it finally turned in his favor, and since then there has been but one year (1901) in which he has made no winning. His heaviest winnings thus far were made in 1900, when they amounted to nearly $150,000. However, it is considered quite likely that he will exceed the record of 1900 this year, as he already has won about $75,000 and his chances for the remainder of the season are considered particularly good.

Population of Chinese Cities.

Middle aged people will readily recall the time when they were taught that Pekin, China, had the largest population of any city in the world. Later and more reliable information, however, does not justify this former teaching, and it is believed that the first official Chinese census, now being taken, will not only shatter this old theory of Pekin's population, but will also materially reduce former estimates of China's multiplied millions. Careful preliminary estimates place the number of Pekin's inhabitants at less than a million and possibly as low as a half million. It appears that either of two cities, Siangtan and Signan, not improbably exceed Pekin in population, with about a million inhabitants each. Other cities, any one of which may surpass Pekin in this respect, are Canton, with an estimated population of 900,000; Tientsin, with 800,000; Chungking, with 705,000; Shanghai, with 651,000, and Foochow, with 624,000. The old geographies had it that the population of the Chinese empire numbered at least 500,000,000. It still sounds enough, but it is becoming evident that the census will reduce the number by from 20 to 35 per cent. The old estimates were another instance of guessing at the unguessably immense, and men rarely err on the side of under-estimating in such cases.

George III and Our Forefathers.

A collection of letters written by George III of England and John Robinson, his secretary of the treasury from 1770 to 1782, was recently sold at auction at Sotheby's in London. Some scraps of the stubborn old monarch's correspondence give a most interesting, not to say entertaining, view of his mental attitude toward our rebelling ancestors. For example, he wrote the following to Robinson under date of March 5, 1777: "I am sorry to find that any one adopts the idea of there being any reason in Sir Howe's application (sic) for 20,000 additional troops. I know the thing is impracticable, and if he and his brother will act with a little less leanness (which I really think is cruelty, as it keeps up the contest) the next campaign will bring the Americans in temper to accept such terms as may enable the wisdom of the country to keep them in order, for we must never come into any such arrangement as may patch for a year or two and then bring on new broils. The regaining of their affections is an idle idea. It must be the convincing them that it is their interest to submit." That passage years and their events brought wisdom to the old fellow is indicated by the following under date of October 31, 1779: "As to our granting independence I hope the hour will never arrive that this country can be so fallen in sentiment as to admit of it. At least, I will never put my hand to a measure that cannot fail of reducing this island to its own narrow limits." Far from a wise man was George III, and the history of a century and a third demonstrates that it was a good thing for this country and for the world that he was not.

Sixty-two Cents a Week and Up.

The British parliamentary committee which has been investigating labor conditions in England has discovered some facts which will no doubt cause its honorable members to stand aghast, particularly when pay under the "sweating" system is considered. Such facts as these, for instance: The average wage of women workers for sweatshops is not much more than $1.75 a week. In order to make this average fortunate workers who receive as high as $3.75 a week, and in some instances more, are included, but some of these victims of the sweatshops earn only 62 cents a week; say, 10 cents a day. How these latter unfortunates live God knows, but the rest of us cannot guess. Nor, the committee found, is it short hours of labor that account for starvation wages. On the contrary, the women work many hours in the day, many of them receiving no more than a cent to a cent and a half for each hour's labor. This is the condition that the parliamentary committee found. What it will do about it remains to be seen. The question it presents must be answered in some way, for when human beings receive less than the wage that enables them to live there is danger in delay.

WORTH KNOWING.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "grat" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a plan of honesty, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

THE WAR SONG OF TERENCE MULVANEY.

(Written for The California Weekly.)

Old Ireland was Ireland
When England was a pup;
Old Ireland'll be Ireland
When England's all dried up.
And if you British tars,
Don't like me Irish song,
Why, here's an Irish fist and feet
If ye're feeling good and strong.
For Irishmen are Irishmen,
And Englishmen aren't much
But a warmed-up jaw of floating trash
Of French and Jew and Dutch,
And if ye've ever needed a man,
A man to plan or scrap,
Why, then ye've sent for an Irishman,
Or ye wouldn't be on the map.

SWINBURNE ON AMERICAN POETS.

Some interesting letters from Algernon Charles Swinburne to Edmund Clarence Stedman, now in the possession of the latter's granddaughter, were recently printed in the Times. They contain some comments on American poetry that are valuable as criticisms from one of the most melodious of all English poets. One says:

"Your rebuke on the subject of American poetry is doubtless as well deserved as it is kindly and gently expressed. Yet I must say that while I appreciate, I hope, the respective excellence of Mr. Bryant's 'Thanatopsis,' and Mr. Lowell's 'Commemoration Ode,' I cannot say that either of them leaves in my ear the echo of a single note of song. It is excellent and good speech, but if given us as song it is first and last duty to us to sing."

"The one is not august meditation and the other is a noble expression of deep and grave patriotic feeling on a supreme national occasion. But the thing more necessary, though it may be less noble than these, is the pulse, the fire, the passion of music, the quality of a singer, not of a solitary philosopher or patriotic orator."

"Now, when Whitman is not speaking but prose he sings, and when he sings at all he sings well. Mr. Longfellow has a pretty little pipe of his own, but surely it is very thin and ready. Again, whatever may be Mr. Emerson's merits, to talk of his poetry seems to me to be like talking of the scholarship of a child who has not yet learned its letters."

"Even Browning's verse always goes to a recognizable tune. I say not to a good one. But in the name of all happies, what is the tune of Emerson's? Now it is a poor thing to have nothing but melody and be unable to rise above it into harmony. But one or other, the less if not the greater, you must have. Imagine a man full of great thoughts and emotions resolved to express them in a painting who has absolutely no power upon form or color. Wainwright, the murderer, who never had thought or emotion above those of a pig or butcher, will be a better man for us than he."

In another letter Swinburne says:

"I read your former letter very carefully and have since reread a good deal of Emerson's first volume of poems, therein mentioned, which certainly contains noble verses and passages well worth remembering. I hope no personal feeling or consideration will ever prevent or impair my recognition of any man's higher qualities."

"In Whittier power, pathos, righteousness (to use a great old word) that should not be left to the publishers) of noble emotion, would be more enjoyable and admirable if he were not so deplorably ready to put up with the first word, good or bad, that comes to hand and to run on long after he is out of breath."

"Mr. Lowell's verse, so great out of the Bigelow costume, I never could bring myself to care for at all. You know my theory, that nothing which can as well be said in prose ought ever to be said in verse."

AN APPRECIATED CORRECTION.

The Editor, The California Weekly:

In your issue of June 4th, you gave space to the poem "The Next That Dies." You ascribed it correctly to Bartholomew Dowling, but are incorrect in calling him an officer of the English army in India. It is unfortunate, but an example of the lack of honor given the poet in his own country, that Bartholomew Dowling, the old-time editor of the Monitor, who did his best work, and died in our city, should not receive due credit from his fellow craftsmen. Stedman, in his Victorian Anthology, places the authorship correctly. I enclose a copy from a manuscript of Dowling, which may interest you. Possibly this poem may have appeared in the late issues in the Monitor, but I have no access to old files of the paper.

Very truly yours,

J. K. MOFFITT.

THE DEATH SONG OF THE VIKING.

By Bartholomew Dowling.

[There is a Scandinavian legend that Siegfried the Viking, feeling himself at the point of death, caused himself to be conveyed on board his ship, the vessel was then set on fire, and in this manner he drifted out to sea alone and finished his career.]

My race is run, my errand done, the pulse of life beats low.

My heart is chill, and the conquering will has lost its fiery glow.

Launch once again on the Northern Main, my battleship of old,

I would die on the deck, 'mid storm and wreck, as befits a Viking hold.

I know no fears, but the mist of years that has gathered round my track

For a moment clears, and my youth's compeers again to my side come back;

And the tall ships reel, o'er their iron keels, as we sweep down on the foe,

Like a giant's form, amid the storm, where the mighty tempests blow.

Again I gaze on the leaping blaze o'er a conquered city rise,

As in those days, when the skald's wild lays, sang the dance of our rich compies.

When our ships went forth from the stormy north with the Scandinavian bands.

Who backward bore, to the Baltic shore, the spoil of the southern lands.

But my race is run, my errand done, so hear me to my ship,

Place my battle braid in this dying hand and sing the winnow to my lip.

Then loose each sail to the rising gale and lash the helm a-lee,

Alone—alone on my drifting throne, I would view my realm, the Sea.

My realm and grave, the Northern Wave, where the tempest's voice shall sing

My death song loud, where flame shall shroud the Ocean's Warrior King;

Whilst proudly wait, at Valhalla's gate, to hero-welcome me,

For my race is run, my errand done, receive thy Chief, oh, Sea!

PUCCINI ON FUTURE MUSIC.

Puccini, who is now in London, has been interviewed on the music of the future, says the Sun, of New York. He pins his faith to melody.

"In the operas of twenty years hence," he says, "melody will reign supreme, as it has always done—and melody is essentially Italian. You can almost say that it was born in our country."

"I know and appreciate fully the efforts of the composers of the so-called new school. I am interested in Richard Strauss's work, and I admire Debussy's 'Pelléas and Mélisande' for its intense originality, but atmosphere, weird combinations of sound and endless recitatives are not everything in music."

"Perhaps many of Wagner's great works will cease to please, though I feel that the 'Meistersinger' and 'Parsifal' are gems that are not likely to be discarded. At any rate melody will always hold its own."

"Music must be popular, it must appeal to the masses. It will have nothing to do with intricate problems of musical mathematics, with mixtures of noisy and uncanny sounds, which by their weird complexity are bound to bore the most enduring music lover. Music must appeal to the heart; move, thrill, elevate it; and it must be simple and direct enough in its beauty to be understood by all."

FRANK NORRIS' "THIRD CIRCLE."

San Francisco life before the earthquake of 1906, with its terrible conditions in the Chinese quarter, and the countless incidents that made thinking men and women thrill with excitement and horror, form the subject of the late Frank Norris' "Third Circle," to be published shortly by John Lane company. The book contains an introduction by Will Irwin, Mr. Norris' intimate friend and associate on the San Francisco Wave. In this introduction Mr. Irwin tells how he and Mr. Gelett Burgess stole into the Wave office by night, after the paper had died a natural death, and took away one of the old files containing the work of Mr. Norris. Mr. Irwin shows how eminently fitted, both by natural talent and newspaper training, Mr. Norris was to write of the life depicted in the "Third Circle."

RIISING VALUE OF THE "ANGELUS."

Millet's "Angelus" was originally painted for an American and the price was to be $300. The American thought better of his bargain and refused the picture. Millet then sold it to M. Papelec for $200; a little later it became the property of M. Paul Tesse, who sold it to M. Gavet for $300. Durand-Ruel acquired it next for $2,400. M. J. Wilson bought it for $7,600. At the Wilson sale in 1881 Georges Petit, the dealer, ventured $32,000 on it. Eight years later, in 1889, at the Secrean sale a group of collectors got an option on it for $110,600, but as the state could not see its way to finding any of the purchase money the "Angelus" departed to America, whence it returned, thanks to M. Chateaubert, at a cost to him of $150,000.

PROSPICE.

By Robert Browning.

[Written after Elizabeth Barrett Browning's death, when old age, sorrow approaching end, and the memory of his supreme sorrow weighed heavily upon Robert Browning.]

Fear death?—to feel the fog in my throat,
The mist in my face,

When the snows begin and the blasts denote
I am nearing the place,

The power of the night, the press of the storm,
The post of the foe;

Where he stands, the Arch Fear in a visible form,
Yet the strong man must go:

For the journey is done and the summit at-

And the barriers fall,
Though a battle's to fight ere the gerdon be gained,

The reward of it all.
I was ever a fighter, so—one fight more,

The best and the last!
I would hate that death handaged my eyes,

And forbore,
And bade me creep past.

No! Let me taste the whole of it, fare like my peers,
The heroes of old,

Bear the brunt, in a minute pay glad life's arrears
Of pain, darkness, and cold.

For sudden the worst turns the best to the brow,
The black minute's at end,

And the elements' rage, the fiend-voices that rave,
Shall dwindle, shall blend,

Shall change, shall become first a peace out of pain,
Then a light, then thy breast,

O thou soul of my soul! I shall clasp thee again,
And with God be at rest!

MAKING LOCAL POLITICS LOCAL

A PRACTICAL WAY TO DIVORCE CITY AND NATIONAL ISSUES.

On January 11th and 12th, 1906, a meeting was held at Chicago, under the name of the United Cities Conference, at which delegates were present from the good government organizations of Baltimore, Buffalo, Chicago, Cincinnati, Denver, Detroit, Grand Rapids, Indianapolis, Kansas City, Louisville, Milwaukee, Minneapolis, New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, and Yale University. Every member of the conference was a seasoned fighter against corrupt municipal politicians and against grasping public service corporations. As one delegate has phrased it, "There wasn't a man there who hadn't either been slugged or sued for libel by the grafters."

This conference was called together at the instance of the Municipal Voters' League of Chicago to consider the question of "the extent to which municipal elections should be separated from national party politics and the control of the national political parties, and the best means by which such separation as may be deemed advisable can be brought about." After a full discussion, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted; and they are here printed as a peculiarly valuable guide to the good government forces in our California cities:

The Resolutions.

Whereas, The vast growth of American cities has brought with it a series of problems peculiar to congested population, and most of which have no possible connection with the general policies of the nation; and

Whereas, These problems, moral, social and economic, can only be solved by the intelligent, unhampered, direct attention of the communities interested; and

Whereas, Prior to the accomplishment of the great tasks set before the cities there is need that all unnecessary obstacles be removed and all steps be taken that may lead to simplification of elections;

Now, therefore, We, the delegates representing militant non-partisan organizations working for the improvement of city government in America by practical participation in municipal politics, assembled in conference at Chicago, January 11 and 12, 1906, in the name of the United Cities of America, declare the following:

We hold that the lines of cleavage in municipal politics have no relation to the lines of cleavage in national politics.

We hold that the intrusion of national politics in municipal government brings with it issues absolutely foreign to the proper functions and reasonable aspirations of the national parties, and others which are alien to the interests of the municipalities, thereby tending to degrade the national parties and seriously injure city government.

We further hold that more efficient means should be provided whereby the will of the majority of the people deliberately formulated and expressed should control municipal politics.

We further hold that there is urgent need of fixing direct responsibility of municipal officials to the people and of reducing to the lowest practicable number the city offices filled by election.

We further hold that the merit system of appointment has demonstrated, wherever honestly applied, that it tends to result in the election and retention in office of a higher grade of men than are obtained by other means; that it opens the public service as an honorable career, free from the distractions of politics, and that it tends to relieve the citizens from the possibility of tyranny by officeholders.

Holding the propositions advanced to be self-evident in theory and amply demonstrated in practice, we, therefore, now urge in the interest of better municipal conditions:

First—That cities should be granted the largest possible measure of home rule, subject only to such general statutory safeguards and restrictions as may be necessary to protect the general interests of the state as distinguished from the local interests of the municipality.

Second—That the party column on the ballot should be abolished; that the names of candidates for a single office should be printed on the ballot under the designation of that office, and that it should be made impossible to vote a straight party ticket by a single mark or cross.

Third—That municipal nominations and elections should be completely separated from state and national nominations and elections and should occur at different times, and that nominations for all municipal offices be made by petition or by an efficient method of direct primaries.

Fourth—That the number of elective municipal officers should be reduced as far as practicable, always preserving the right to elect members of the municipal legislative body or city council.

Fifth—That the merit principle should be applied to all departments of city administration under practical and efficient civil service laws.

In conclusion, this conference, realizing the vital importance of the successful solution of the municipal problems now confronting us, earnestly hopes that consideration and discussion of them may continue, and to that end urges the formation of more organizations devoted to local issues which shall co-operate in all practical ways to secure the enactment of laws embodying the principles outlined.

Resolved, That this conference do, and it hereby does, heartily endorse the proposal of the Yale City Government Club to encourage the establishment of similar clubs in other colleges and universities, to the end that knowledge of and interest in municipal civics may be increased by such action.

MR. PEAVY REPLIES.

Editor The California Weekly:

From Mr. Lull's letter in your issue of June 18 it appears that he thinks I did not make myself clear on all points in my final article on "Eucalypts in California."

Just a word concerning the figures to which the State Forester objects. They were as my final article states, taken from Circular 2, published by the State. The data for the figures in this circular were collected by Forest Service men and were compiled by those in the service best qualified for the work. The results are unquestionably the most reliable to be had at the present time. The figures include many situations, representing the best as well as the poorest sites. From this data I calculated averages for diameter and height, growth, and yield per acre, covering a series of years from 6 to 20.

Obviously a commercial plantation, established and maintained under correct conditions of soil, moisture and temperature, would produce results in excess of these average figures. This is the particular matter Mr. Lull fears I did not make sufficiently plain and I am very glad indeed that he has further emphasized it.

The whole matter could thus be disposed of if it were true that all the commercial companies had established their plantations where ideal conditions of soil, moisture, and temperature exist or could be maintained. Unfortunately, some have not been so established and it is very sure that results not far above the average figures quoted by me will follow.

If, in this brief series of articles on the Eucalypts in California information has been placed in the possession of the prospective planter or investor which will enable him to exercise proper discrimination before reaching a decision, their purpose has been accomplished. The more these matters are publicly discussed the more likely it is that the people will take pains to become fully informed concerning not only site requirement for planting, but the representations, personnel and responsibility of Eucalyptus companies as well. The Forest Service will, as in the past, continue to correct as far as possible misstatements and false impressions regarding the Eucalypts and will gladly welcome any further assistance from the State Forester to that end.

Very truly yours,

GEO. W. PEAVY,
United States Forest Service.

The Real Sunshine.

The kind of sunshine, brother, that will make the world more bright
Is not the shine that glimmers o'er a world that's robed in light.

It is not the beams that glimmer 'gainst the sky's cerulean scroll,
But it is, and is forever, just the sunshine of the soul.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Proof of the Man.

Praise for the splendid winner, salves of cheers for him!
But what of the fellow who lagged behind, yet strove with a purpose grim?
Laurels to crown the victor, blossoms his way to strew;
But what of the runner who did his best, yet lost with the goal in view?
Shall the earnest-hearted effort count not in the world's acclaim?
Is there never a prize for him who lost, yet steadfastly played the game?
Why, here is the law God-given for all of His earthly clan.
To win may be solely the proof of chance; to strive is proof of the Man.

"The last shall be first" it was written—but not in the praise of men;
The stone rejected the corner shall be—but God will have spoken then.
We know not that we may be winners of trophies applauded by man,
But one thing we know, and we know it well:
We may do the best that we can;
Ay, distanced by all about us, and hopelessly counted out,
We still may press on and forward, fearing no
final rout,
For this has been truth, my brother, since ever
God's reign began:
To win may be solely the proof of chance; to strive is proof of the Man.

Thoughtful Man on Automobiles.

"I am looking forward with palpitating hope," said the Thoughtful Man, "to the time when aeroplanes, like aeroplaning and dirigibles will be dirigitating across the skissed heavens."

"Why do you hope for that time?" I inquired.
"Because," he replied, "I'd rather be killed without forewarning by a bag of ballast dropped on my head than to be scared to death by an automobile that doesn't touch me, and I trust that when aeroplanes come in automobiles—at least, the kind that are run by idiots—will go out. 'Tis my prayerful trust that the speed idiots will shift their operations to the sky."

"You want to cross a street in the city, and after a look up and down for street-cars, trucks, express wagons, busses, hacks, private vehicles and a few million other things that make life in the city one grand, sweet song, you conclude it is safe to butt through. You are proceeding blithely enough, when, out of the corner of your eye, you perceive an automobile bearing down on you. It is the merest glimpse you have, but to you it seems that the chug-wagon is as big as a locomotive and is traveling about 300 miles an hour."

"What do you do under these circumstances? You know, for we all do the same thing. You jump straight up in the air and begin to sidestep and claw for safety. If you are a woman you also scream, but, regardless of sex, you jump and claw. After this exhibition you devote some time to bitter recognition of the fact that you have made a fool of yourself, for a second anguished glance reveals the fact that the automobile is all but standing still and that at no time have you been in danger. Right behind you is a woman who is smiling, and you wish she didn't look so happy, and beside you are several men whom you would like to slaughter, for they, too, are smiling. You haster to get away, and you blush whenever you recall what a public display you have made of yourself."

"But your humiliation is unnecessary. There is not a man or woman of us all who has not made a similar spectacle of himself, or herself, at some time or other. The fact is that we all involuntarily expect to be run down by an automobile some day, and we stand ready to jump and claw whenever we have a fraction of an opportunity. This is why I shall welcome the aeroplanes. I should sooner be dropped on than to be scared to death when it is entirely unnecessary. Don't you think so?"

"Think what?" said I.

The Opinions of Rufus.

"Twan't the pig that rushed first to the trough that got the most to eat; 'twas the one that stayed the longest and hardest.
They's more'n one man in prison for crime, when his pa'n'ma, as the ones most to blame, orto be there in his place."

This world is full of people that are goin' to be good just es soon es they have looked after a few matters of the other kind that are pressin' fer immojit attention.

I'm so honest that if I should pick up a million dollars on the sidewalk I'd hate to advertise the fact—fer fear I'd tempt somebody else to put in a dishonest claim for it.

Even if John D. Rockefeller does go to heaven es straight es he calculates I shoudn't wonder if he'd be considible disappointed. I understand that the gold streets are nailed down middlin' solid.

Oh, my brethern an' sisters, how much happier an' better off this world would be if they want'n't any 'cept the kind we don't care
'bout practicin'.

I ain't praisin' Napoleon, but I notice he fit the fellers that git up wars prove their cause

Es long as I b'lieve we can afford to take our chances on bein' just, I ain't goin' to object to women votin' if they want to. At the same time, I ain't lookin' fer the garden of Eden to be opened again to fallen man on the day they first cast their ballots.

'Vit must have a razor-edge, but the idee that it also should be used to cut throats, which is ruther prevalent out here, proves nothin' but the folly an' cruelty of the people that hold it.

A Heart to Heart Talk.

"It is for the people of San Francisco to decide whether criminals shall control the office of district attorney and the administration of their law be dragged through the mire of corruption."—From Patrick Calhoun's proclamation.

No doubt, dear Patrick, you are right:

With them it lies

The Right to aid, the Wrong to blight.

Though your just dice

You yearn for Justice dealt in chunks,

Or much like that—

But meantime how about those plunks?

Who paid them, Pat?

'Tis shameful 'bout this Heney's style,

And starve he should!

If Spreckels, child of sinful guile,

But let him wail;

But I've heard somewhere, somehow,

Though you forget,

A bribe was paid—two hundred thou—

Who paid it, pet?

This wicked prosecuting gang,

Lest Justice die,

Pay for her life—they all should hang

As Haman high.

But 'bout those little bribing acts

Which some folk pain,

Since you're cognizant of the facts,

Why not explain?

Your hated Spreckels took the stand,

And Phelan, too,

And freely bared each scheme they'd planned—

Then why not you?

"Mire of corruption" we should wack—

You're good at that—

But how about that golden stack?

Oh, talk up, Pat.

The Evidence Against Him.

"Do I understand you to claim that he is not an intelligent man?"

"Oh, no, I wouldn't say that exactly, but he was accepted as a juror in an important trial."

A Talk With Epaminondas.

You now, my Epaminondas, have secured your diploma, and it is your fond desire to build a monument to yourself in the journalistic field, as you expressed it. I know that this is the case, for but last week you asked me if I knew of any managing-editorships that were vacant on metropolitan newspapers. It is your present conviction that the "journalistic field" is your oyster, and far be it from me to suggest that the oyster may not open to your masterful knife.

Nevertheless, if I were in your place, dear boy, I should not tie my faith too closely to that managing-editorship, for sometimes even a diploma will not attain that. As I have observed the game, it is far more likely to secure you a position as cub reporter, and the cub reporter is the one who is sent out when no other reporter can be found. He "makes good" if it is in him to do so, but I greatly fear that the diploma doesn't count in the operation.

And now, Epaminondas, to the cruelest blow of all. I believe there is not a place in life where it counts for much. It is, indeed, presumed to indicate that you have a certain amount of book-lore, but men of experience have met so many educated fools that they are likely to consider the diploma poor evidence of even that sort of lore. On the whole, Epaminondas, it is up to you to prove your own worth; the diploma doesn't do it.

Put away the dear diploma.

You won't need it any more.

For it's up to you to hustle

For the place for you in store.

By the Seashore.

My little one who plays upon the sand,
Building herself creations wierd as wee,
Shrills out to me: "Tum twick, my papa, and
The booful fins 'at I have made here see."
Her work is naught; the straggling shapes attest.

The tiny, awkward hands yet lack all art,
But, just because she did her baby best,
I straightaway say, "'Tis very fine, sweetheart."

Sometimes when she has toiled with pygmy zeal
Through quite an hour a structure queer to build

A breaker comes, the walls and turrets reel,
And far adown the beach her house is spilled.

Then grief doth storm and hold the baby
heart;
The eyes of blue with tears are all ashine,
And then is mine the fond consoler's art:

"We need not cry; we'll build one far more fine."

All comforted, to baby work she goes—
Ah, I have built upon this earthly strand
The structures frail the tide of years o'erflows.

I meant so well, but, oh, they would not stand.
Then, as my baby turns in grief to me,
I, too, would turn to One who heedeth where

My castles fall, would hear Him whisper me:
"Still build. There 'waits thy hand a structure fair."

Still Looking For Evidence.

Sojourner in Town—Is she a beautiful girl?
Native—Well, I should say so! She received the prize in a beauty contest.

"Yes, so I heard, but I have a special reason for wishing to know whether or not she is a beautiful girl."

Be All You Can.

"If you cannot on the ocean sail among the twisted
With the fellow in the rowboat you may happily compete.

If your lot seems rather humble, buckle in and show your grit;

If you cannot be the whole thing, be a little bit of it.

THE OTHER VIEW.

(From the San Bernardino Sun.)

That a jury of honest and level-headed San Franciscans would convict Patrick Calhoun of the crime of bribery, out of the case that has been developed by the five months' trial of the president of the United Railroads, we have not at any time believed. But in view of the amount of dust kicked up by a portion of the San Francisco press, and the unexampled lengths to which the prosecution went to establish its case, that the result should have been so near an acquittal, was not to be expected.

We take it to mean this: that the jury did not believe in convicting Calhoun of bribery, when he was simply held up. It is useless to argue the fact that the United Railroads paid $200,000 for the franchise that was voted them. There is little question about it. But they paid it under compulsion, paid it for something which, under the circumstances, the company ought to have had for nothing and which was to be of as great and immediate advantage to the city as to the company. For San Francisco could not have been rebuilt in three years without street cars, and the granting of the trolley franchise made it both possible and certain.

There is no reasonable doubt but that the United Railroads asked for the franchise in order to rehabilitate their own property, as well as the city. There is no doubt but that Ruef and Schmitz and their grafting board of supervisors saw a chance to make a killing, for the two former were shrewd enough to recognize the necessities of the franchise, both to the street car company and to the city.

There is no doubt but that they demanded $200,000 as the price of the concession, and there is no doubt but that the money was paid by Calhoun or his representatives, on the theory that the end justified the means.

That may not furnish the basis for any fine distinction in morals or ethics, but it justified a jury in refusing to convict Patrick Calhoun, who, to save the property of the company he served, and to make possible the rebuilding of the wrecked and stricken city, submitted to perhaps the most colossal example of municipal blackmail that American cities have furnished.

This being the undoubted and almost unquestioned truth, why the prosecution should have bent such tremendous energies to convict Calhoun as the star "higher up," when the crew of swashbuckling supervisors were enjoying their illgotten spoils and free air as well, has been a puzzle to fair minded people of California.

As for side lights and incidentals, Heney entered the case with the reputation of being a fearless and successful prosecutor of wrong doing in high places. It ends with him in the attitude of a strutting popinjay, parading his own personality as the main issue of the case, and placing upon his own brow a self-woven halo, whose might is amply attested by the result.

[We give space in our columns to the foregoing as being quite the frankest and most typical expression of the apologists' view of the Calhoun case that has appeared in print. It expresses what thousands feel and have not been able so well to put in print; but it is as false and injurious a view to take of the issue as it could have been made had it been penned by the Father of Lies himself in an atmosphere hotter than that of San Bernardino.]

The only compulsion there was about paying the $200,000 to Ruef was that Calhoun might not have been able to get what he wanted—a thing that was worth not less than $10,000,000 to his enterprise—without paying it, so he paid it, although it is by no means sure that he could not have got it without paying for it. It is generally believed that, had he gone to the people with the truth, the franchise would have been voted him and Ruef might have been hanged to a lamp post without costing Calhoun a dollar.

It would have been as easy, and as cheap, to rehabilitate the cable system as it was to establish a trolley system and San Francisco would have been rebuilt just the same. The rehabilitation of other cable roads has proven this to be true.

Whoever submits to municipal or other form of blackmail is a coward and only less culpable than one who levies blackmail and, so long as blackmail is submitted to, it will be employed.

The hold-ups had a first chance to join in punishing the hold-ups and not a man of them would lend a hand. It was not until the hold-ups had refused to "come through" that the hold-ups were entrapped and forced to make a clean breast of the whole miserable business. Immunity to them was an indispensable prerequisite to the attainment of this end.

Mr. Heney's want of success in convicting a member of the most colossal band of financial pirates that ever got together to loot a city and subjugate a commonwealth, of course, reduces him to a "popinjay parading his own personality as a main issue of the case." It follows, too, as all of Calhoun's apologists assert, that "Heney is no lawyer," but it may be noted as a mitigating circumstance that Mr. Calhoun has surrounded himself with seven of the most cunning lawyers his millions could command to withstand this novice at the bar.

The view of the case taken by the San Bernardino Sun has a certain plausibility. An argument in defense of the most subtle and dangerous rascality can be based on that

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Being Non-Political Governor Gillett should receive praise when he has earned it as honestly as he has earned it in the appointment of a successor to Dr. N. K. Foster as secretary of the state board of health. The secretary of that board is a great deal more than secretary; he is, in executive officer, travels to all parts of the state to enforce the board's orders, and does practically all of its work of every kind. That is to say, Doctor Foster has been and done all of this; before his time the state board of health was more a name than a reality. Well, Doctor Foster resigned to accept a position which he liked better, and Governor Gillett had the chance to appoint his successor. Instead of looking around for a political doctor, by whose appointment some election debt could be cancelled, the Governor asked the members of the board who would be the most efficient man to take up Foster's work, and they said Doctor Snow of Stanford University, whereupon it was announced that he would be appointed. This was an appointment made on merit, without political significance, as the saying is, and yet it was as good politics as the Governor ever did.

Constitutional John Another recent appointment by the Governor has attracted less attention than it deserved. By act of the late legislature the state commission on revenue and taxation, which heretofore has consisted of five members, was reduced to a single-headed commission, and John B. Curtin, Democratic State Senator from Tuolumne county, has been appointed the commissioner. It was the proper thing to do, because not only had Curtin served four years in the old commission, but he had proved himself the ablest all-around member and the most zealous advocate of the plan of taxation which the commission has recommended. In the legislature, where he has served many years, he is known as "Constitutional John," from his fondness for disputation concerning constitutional law, and he is the one Democrat whom Republican Senators accept as being almost as good as themselves. He is one of the men of power who have shaped legislation in California in recent years.

Ryan Has Resigned When it was announced, But Not Retired a short time since, that E. Black Ryan, who has been the Southern Pacific's tax agent for forty years or so, had resigned, it was further announced that Jere T. Burke, one of the company's active political men, had been appointed to succeed him. Latest information from the Flood building is that Ryan is still on the job; in other words, he has resigned but not retired. Being tax agent for a corporation so vast as the Southern Pacific, an engrossing occupation of much detail, and the idea that Jere Burke or any other busy man could take it on as one more duty to be performed is not seriously considered by those who know. When Ryan's real successor is appointed there will be not mere a shake-up, but a regular overturn, in the department, and it will be reorganized on lines more business-like and less political. It has come to pass that every big corporation which has property scattered through one state, or many states, must have its tax agent; in fact, it has become a regular profession and is legitimate enough if legitimately pursued.

Was the Whole Thing: The tax agent's department of a big railroad company when organized on modern lines—say, for example, the tax department of the Santa Fe railroad—is conducted very systematically and keeps the company informed all the time of what is being done by a multitude of state, county, city and district taxing authorities. But Black Ryan has for forty years been about all there was of the Southern Pacific's tax department, and it has really not been organized at all. There has been less need of system, because the general political influence of the corporation has been great enough to hold down state boards of equalization and county and city assessors. Ryan, though an able man, has never been an organizer; he has worked by rule of thumb and has depended on his mother wit, of which he has a great deal. But no amount of this quality will make up for systematic accounting, and in consequence the Southern Pacific, when it came down to questions of detail, has frequently been unable to say where it was at in matters of taxation. This is something which is not generally known, and the statement may be met with incredulity, but it is true, nevertheless. Another thing which is of considerable importance to the corporation just now is that Ryan has been the whole thing and has trained up no assistant who can be his successor; therefore, whoever may be named to succeed him will start under serious disadvantages.

A Fair Assessment Personally, E. Blackford Ryan (to give him his correct name) is a humorous, choleric and yet essentially good natured old fellow who has a way of gaining the liking of everybody who comes to know him well. Of course he regards anything like a fair assessment of the company's property as being a great outrage, and when it occurs he swears like the army in flanders. And then he can cool off and become very diplomatic and persuasive. He had an easy time of it during the many years when Southern Pacific political pull was irresistible—when, for illustration, the State Board of Equalization for thirteen or sixteen years assessed the Central Pacific railroad for just $13,000,000, ignoring increased mileage and the growth of business. But there was a great change when the State Board of Equalization adopted a method of ascertaining values which had been suggested by the Commission on Revenue and Taxation—the method of taking 4 per cent. of the gross earnings as the measure of the tax to be collected. That was practically automatic, and railroad taxes have since then been increasing as traffic grew, while politics have had less chance. Since then, too, there has brooded over the soul of Black Ryan a black melancholy, only occasionally illuminated by flashes of profanity and humor.

Is San Francisco Paying Her Poll Tax? The News, a Los Angeles daily paper, publishes the surprising information that in San Francisco it is not seriously expected that anyone, except Chinese and Japanese, will pay poll taxes. In Los Angeles, on the contrary, every man is expected to pay poll tax, and most of them are required to do so. These statements are backed up with a story of the way in which Thomas T. Williams, when managing editor of a San Francisco newspaper, met a demand for taxes from the employes by the writer's reply: "There are no Chinamen employed on the Post." It is sufficient reply to the southern journalist to say that whatever he may have done in the past, Assessor Dodge is really collecting poll taxes this year, and few will escape paying. The spirit of local journalism must have changed, too, for only the other day the Call printed an editorial admonishing everybody to pay his poll taxes. Incidentally, last year there were collected in San Francisco about $35,000 poll taxes, instead of only $13,000, as the News alleged.

What Will the Supreme Court Do to the Primary? Political activity in San Francisco has practically come to a standstill until next week, pending the decision by the Supreme Court in response to a case to test the constitutionality of the direct primary law. This decision is expected before Sunday, and persistent rumors are to the effect that the court will knock out the interpretation of the local election commission permitting nominations on more than one ticket. Another rumor, equally strong, declares that the court intends to throw out the whole law. No one really knows, of course, what the court will do, but these rumors have made it impossible to consider seriously the idea of any man accepting a nomination from the Municipal League of Independent Republican Clubs, for example, when the court may undo the League's work utterly by throwing the choice of candidates back into the convention.

Is There a "Bug" in the Primary Law? Friends of the direct primary idea have all along feared that Grove L. Johnson, Eddie Wolfe, and Leroy Wright had carefully secreted a "bug" in the measure when it was passed for the express purpose of permitting the courts to kill the law if it promised to have any efficacy.

Good Government League Growing The Good Government League is to be one of the best-organized elements in the coming campaign. Its membership is rapidly increasing, its prestige is growing, and it is being organized into a compact fighting machine that promises to be one of the decisive factors in the election. By virtue of having kept out of affiliation with any other organization and by not putting up a ticket, waiting to pass upon the candidates of the other parties, it has retained a strategic position of great strength.

"Burying the Hatchet" At a meeting of the Building Trades Council some nights ago, Michael Casey referred in a speech to his reconciliation with his old enemy, P. H. McCarthy (for the purposes of the present campaign, at least), saying: "Me and McCarty's have buried the hatchet friver—I hope." Later in the evening "P. H." spoke. "As my friend, Casey, has said, we have buried the hatchet, deep." A plasterer in the audience inquired, in disconcerting tones, "An' how deep, McCarty, did you and Casey bury the hatchet—in each other?"

foundation, but whoever so sounds such an argument writes himself down either as a smatterer who cannot see beneath the most superficial scumming, as being in sympathy with successful rascality and a toady to the predatory interests or as a boughten apologist for exposed villainy, in which class rank many as able papers as the San Bernardino Sun.—The Staff.]

WHAT A WOMAN CAN DO

THE INSPIRING EXAMPLE OF MRS. ANNE M. CUSHING.

"Not alone, but a friend."

Mrs. Anne M. Cushing has waged a many-year long campaign to make effective that principle of dispensing charity. In doing so, she has become a most admirable example of the power for good that rests in a woman who, without the ballot and without any organized plan of action, persistently uses the everyday resources of persuasion by personal interview or by correspondence to influence men in authority to better conditions. She has favored woman suffrage, but her active work has been chiefly directed toward helping to solve the problems of dependent childhood.

Mrs. Cushing was born in Ireland, but came to New York City in the early '50s, and in 1853 showed her mettle by coming to California by way of Cape Horn, accompanied only by a sister. Since that time she has lived continuously in California, and was for over twenty-five years a resident of Oakland.

Her first public service was to raise a family—two sons and a daughter.

When the children were grown, Mrs. Cushing employed her time in furthering her chosen work. She was the pioneer of the playgrounds movement in California, at a time when playgrounds were unknown and were ridiculed when mentioned. To her persistent advocacy of their establishment is due much of the progress that has recently taken shape in Oakland in a far-reaching plan to issue bonds for a chain of public grounds for children all through the city. She aroused much interest in the subject in Palo Alto, where she lived for a time after the San Francisco fire, bringing the idea to public attention by bringing the secretary of the National Playground Association to the town to discuss it publicly.

After the national conference of charities and corrections was held in San Francisco, in 1889, Mrs. Cushing agitated the passage of a bill by the state legislature to create a state board of charities and corrections. Her method of attack was here the same she always used: she wrote letters to legislators, to the governor, to politicians, to charitable organizations; she saw personally as many people of influence she could, and by argument and persuasion organized sentiment to bring about the needed reform. The bill, largely as a result of her efforts, was passed in 1903.

Her greatest interest has been the care of orphans and abandoned children. Recognizing the fallacy of the method of raising orphans in public institutions, where they develop mechanically and miss the inspiration and love of a home, Mrs. Cushing has used every means at her command to abolish orphan asylums and to substitute the finding of homes for the children. She has advocated that the legislature stop the demoralizing practice of giving state funds to orphan asylums ($100 a year for each full orphan and $75 for each half-orphan), pointing out that 75 per cent. of the inmates of these institutions have one parent living, who should see that the children are placed in proper homes to be raised as human beings instead of as semi-prisoners.

It is impossible to say specifically what her influence has been in this regard. The law has not yet been changed, but no one can doubt that her hundreds of interviews and letters, with their personal touch of persuasion, have made an impression that sooner or later will affect the laws and help bring about their reform. Fourteen years elapsed between the inception of the idea of a board of charities and corrections and the creation of the board—but the thing was done at last.

In the same way, Mrs. Cushing advocated the passage of the juvenile court law, and of the laws admitting both juvenile and adult offenders to probation. Since these laws have been in operation she has devoted much time to their practical operation, interesting judges in cases that she believed could properly be handled by probation officers.

Three things have characterized her work: an amazing range of information upon all subjects related to philanthropic and remedial legislation; a sound judgment that has kept her from permitting her instinctive sympathy for the victims of injustice to become confused by sentimentality; and a persistency in fighting for a reform in which she believes that knows no limit of patience and work nor any admission of defeat.

And, withal, she has not sought, nor suffered, any notoriety. She has kept her womanliness, with all its appeal of quiet, earnest sincerity. She has done nothing that any other woman could not do after she has reared her children and is free to devote her time to being useful to humanity in another field than the home. She has simply worked toward her ends with more energy, consistency and persistency than most women do; hence she has accomplished more.

All her methods have been the methods of a true woman: persuasion, appeal to the best instincts of men. "Of men"—that is an important point. She has never belonged to a woman's club. She has looked to men, who have the power and who do things, and through them she has achieved results of far-reaching importance. Her work is thus an example and an inspiration to that larger share of womenkind whose ambition is to serve humanity but who shrink from notoriety or from the charge of masculinity. She has shown what can be done without fear of either. So, while her name does not appropriately belong in The California Weekly's gallery of "Men Who Do Things," it does deserve place in the not less important list of "Women Who Influence with Men Who Do Things Has Gotten Things Done."

—A strange thing about LEHNHARDT'S CANDIES

Did you ever notice that when you get a box of Lehnhardt's candies there are never any pieces left?
Some candy you buy always seems to stick around for days. Do you know why no one wants it? It's because it's "profit candy"—it's the poor pieces that make profit for some candy makers.
It's the absence of the poor pieces that makes profit for Lehnhardt.

A NEW ERA IN STATE BUILDING

By E. FRENCH STROTHER.

The purpose of this article is to give the readers of The California Weekly a comprehensive idea in connection of the great lines along which the development of California is progressing. California used to be "The Land of Gold," and now it is "The Land of Sunshine." It is still a huge unexplored space. What is it now? What are its main tendencies shaping its future? What will it be in 25 years hence?

On the observation platform at the rear of the Salt Lake Route's limited train were three men—a little old fellow with sunburned skin and eyes squinted almost shut, an eastern tourist, and an observer who doesn't matter. The train was in the desert, where the eye lost itself across the dazzling spaces into the palpitating air. The tourist spoke:

"Well, sir, that fellow hit it right when he called this 'The Land That God Forgot.' Lord! What a barren waste!"

The little bronzed man grunted.

"Humph! Tenderfoot. I judge."

The insult went home, and the tourist winced. The little man swung on his stool and faced him:

"Young man, I suppose if you were pitched off this train right here that you'd be dead in three days. But let me tell you; if you throw me off here, naked, I'd have a suit of clothes in three days and be making money to boot. Same with anybody else that knows the desert 'barren waste.' Kot! it's a pot of treasure. Look out there. What do you see? A desert. Look out there. What do I see? Indications of borax, that has made men millionaires right around here; that supplies the essential element of the enamel that is used in manufacturing all the bath-tubs and wash stands in the country. I see tungsten, that is an essential element of armor plate. I see huge deposits of gypsum, that is one of the best fertilizers there is. I see salt deposits, gold, silver, copper, rubies, diamonds, yes, sir, diamonds. And away off yonder I see a place where the government is going to put in a dam and a reservoir and turn this richest soil on earth into a garden of 200,000 acres. 'Barren waste.' Bah! Go get a pair of eyes."

The desert, in short, is coming into its own. The Federal government, spurred by the success of the Imperial Valley, has gone further up the Colorado river and is at work reclaiming nearly a quarter million acres in the desert about midway between lines drawn east and west through Needles and Yuma. And the mineral riches of this region that was even recently believed to be a hopeless waste of God's efforts and man's opportunity, are contributing to the wealth of men and the needs of the industries.

Reclamation by Wholesale Methods.

But the deeply significant part of the utilization of the desert is the new method of reclaiming it. When Fresno, for example, first undertook to water the dry land, the job had to be done by individual farmers, far from the financial resources to back such a great enterprise. At Tulare, the pioneers had to fight for water, against cattlemen whose pastures their diversion dams would ruin. They had to fight out the law of riparian water rights, and adjust the claim of planter miners. They had to solve the problem of organized community interest in a common necessity—one man's claim to his share against another man's claim that he was being cheated.

The new method has changed all this. Today, the Federal government supplies expert engineers to make the survey; the government gets adjudicated the questions of ownership of the water before the work begins; the government lends its credit to finance the whole undertaking at once; the government parcels out the water evenly; and the government collects each man's pro rata of the cost in instalments to reimburse itself. Where it took years to get the work done it now takes months; where endless litigation grew out of every ditch there is now certainty of rights, and peace. The result is an enormous saving of time, of waste motion, and of money; and the land is being reclaimed upon a stupendous scale.

Another kind of reclamation is under way—the reclamation of lands in the Sacramento valley that are subject to overflow in seasons of abundant rainfall. As this subject has been explained at length on this page in previous issues of The California Weekly it need not be discussed now, but it is important to note that this movement is well under way, that the Federal government will here also aid in the development of the state, and that this reclamation will add to the permanent assets of California a body of land similar to and as fertile as the valley of the Nile.

The New Idea in "Promotion."

This land must be peopled. This has always been, and still is, the chief problem of California. If only the people were here they might be trusted to solve the other problems. How shall we get them to come? Here is another change in methods. We used to try to attract them by advertising "The Land of Flowers," "The Land of Sunshine," "Sea Bathing in January," and the like. Read the literature that the chambers of commerce issue today. Little about flowers and sunshine and climate; lots about the net profit per acre per year in growing sweet potatoes in Tullock. Few glittering generalities; many careful balance sheets of cost of land, cost of raising a crop, character of soil, cost of marketing, value of crop, net returns per acre in money. In other words, we are now advertising California as a business proposition to attract farmers who want to make money, instead of advertising it as a sentimental proposition or as a pleasure ground in which to drop money. The result is a change in the volume of immigration and especially in the kind of immigrants, the latter being most noticeable in Southern California, where the tourists used to be (and are not now) the principal crop.

The Adaptability of Soils.

Presuming the land to be reclaimed and peopled, the problem of what to raise on it looms up. The last generation said, "Kot," and old Doctor Glenn nearly realized his ambition one year to put the better part of Glam county into it, and Clovis Cole had ten thousand acres at a time in wheat. Wheat dwindled, and everyone said "fruit." Oranges for Southern California, grapes for the San Joaquin valley, prunes for Santa Clara, and apples for Pajaro.

That stage is passing. The significant development is the study of soil adaptability and the consequent diversification of crops. Oranges, we find, will grow as well, and ripen six weeks earlier, at Porterville and Mt. Campbell, on the eastern edge of the central San Joaquin valley as in Riverside. Berries are sweeter and ripen earlier in Fresno than they will further south on the coast. Southern California learns that beans are as profitable as oranges. Everybody learns the profit of alfalfa and dairy herds. The land is cultivated more rationally and more nearly to its full capacity for profit. There are more attractions to the eastward who may be afraid he can't raise oranges but knows beans like a book.

Transportation by Electric Power.

Presuming the land to be reclaimed, peopled, and productive, the transportation problem is still a problem. But it is on the eve of solution. In the Sierra Nevada are water powers capable of developing electrical energy sufficient to run all the trains in California. It is not guesswork to say that these power sites have all been surveyed, that enough of them are filed upon by the transportation companies to meet all their needs, and that before many years, through trains from Los Angeles to San Francisco will be run, over a route already surveyed, propelled by electrical power generated in the Sierra. The state will be networked with feeding lines radiating from the trunk line steam roads and trunk line trolley, to bring in the freights and passengers from the country on either side.

Another important addition to the transportation facilities of the state is the new Western Pacific road. Few people seem to realize that the tracks of this last link in a new transcontinental system are already down, with construction trains operating over them, from the Oakland water-front to the high Sierra Nevada.

Fuel and Manufactures.

The last great problem of the material development of California is the fuel problem. The lack of fuel has vastly retarded the development of manufactures in this state. That problem has well-nigh been solved by the increased production of crude petroleum. This year California will raise the states of the union in the bulk of petroleum produced, and new resources of oil production are daily being discovered by the extension of the developed fields. With the invention of engines to use crude oil as fuel, and with the perfection of processes such as the making of steel with oil instead of coke as fuel, this fact means that California is upon the eve of a vast expansion of its manufactures. This is not a visionary "booster" dream; it is an industrial certainty that is being discounted before the event by men of millions who are investing their money upon their vision of the certainty of its realization.

A New Era of Gold.

Another significant development is the rise of the gold production of California. When the placers played out gold mining was believed to be dead. But if you ride to-day on the Yosemite valley railroad from Merced up the gorge of the Merced river, you will see that above the old deserted placer washings are shafts that pierce the mountain sides, reaching after the hidden veins of quartz. The processes of reducing low grade ores as poor as $5 to the ton in gold have sent new life into Merced canyon, into the once deserted Mariposa camp, and into dozens of other parts of the Sierra, so that the production of gold has risen steadily since 1887 and is now well along toward its high mark of placer days.

Space forbids further participation of the new broad tendencies in state development. But if this skeleton outline of some of the most striking changes that mark the path of a new era in state building gives the reader a wider outlook upon the forces that are making for the growth and enrichment of California, it will have served its purpose.

A NEAR VIEW OF SARDOU.

In a forthcoming book, "The Bancrofts: Recollections of Sixty Years," Sir Squire Bancroft, an actor and manager famous in England, describes the late Victorien Sardou, whom he visited at Marly-le-Roi in September, 1878. His description, as paraphrased by the New York Sun's reviewer, is as follows:

"A small, nervous, lean and wiry man, shabbily dressed, wearing an old smoking cap, his throat enveloped in a white silk muffler. His head in those days struck Bancroft as a mixture of familiar points in pictures of Napoleon, Voltaire and a typical Jesuit father, while his smile was almost as telling as Henry Irving's. He talked with nervous speed, and then with a charming manner would check himself politely for his visitor's foreign ear. He deeply regretted knowing no English, but said that his children, to whom he pointed as they played under the shade of the big trees, were learning that language. Bancroft says that 'even in a single visit it was easy to feel that he had read and studied much. He was lively, rather a mania for building and reconstructing. He was a hard worker, a great reader, and loved to be surrounded by beautiful things.' The visitor found that, like the great majority of his countrymen, the French dramatist had never left his native land."

THE GRAFT CASES.

The race to attain such even-handed and impartial justice for Patrick Calhoun, charged with bribery, as would be meted out to a moneyless man, has been run—although the run was made at a snail's pace—and justice is as far from attainment as ever. Francis J. Heney concluded his address to the jury in the forenoon of last Saturday, Judge Lawlor's charge was delivered, and the jury retired just before noon of that day. About noon of the next day it returned, and reported itself hopelessly divided, whereupon it was dismissed.

The jury's fifth and final ballot stood ten for acquittal and two for conviction, Binner and Hildebrecht being the two jurors who stood for conviction throughout the voting.

On the first ballot McGuire and Anthes also favored conviction, but McGuire dropped out after the first ballot, and Anthes after the second. The jurors who throughout the balloting were convinced that Calhoun was innocent were Dixon, Suydam, Blender, Cashman, Gillespie, Symington, Granville and Mackroth.

In a published statement Mr. Calhoun expressed gratification with the result, but not overwhelming gratification. That this gratification was somewhat tempered by a wish that matters were other than they are may be inferred from the fact that he is bitterly opposing the prosecution's desire to try him again immediately on the indictment charging him with offering a bribe to former-Supervisor John J. Fury. Judge Lawlor has set this case for next Monday, but it will not go to trial then if the ingenuity of the lawyers for the defense can prevent it.

In attempting to secure this postponement enough has been done to make it clear that the main attack of the defense will be based upon the alleged fact that Judge Lawlor is prejudiced, although the defense-declared unfitness of Francis J. Heney to prosecute also, it is understood, will be made an issue. Mr. Heney has established a nation-wide reputation as a prosecutor, but the defense is convinced that he has done so by false pretenses. A gist of affidavits to establish these allegations will be ground out in Judge Lawlor's mill next Monday, and after that—but the only way one may know what will come after that will be to await the event.

The actions brought to prevent the payment of salaries of Assistant District Attorney Harrison and of Detective Burns and his assistants have been dismissed by Judge Sturtevant.

SOME CALIFORNIA STORIES.

"Dana of the New York Sun."

Many years ago Charles A. Dana of New York visited San Francisco and was interviewed at his hotel by a well-known newspaper man named Sutherland. The great man was cynical and supercilious and refused to say the complimentary things about California which are always expected of a visitor. "I suppose you will go out to the Cliff House to take a look at the Pacific ocean," said the interviewer, after other attempts to awaken the enthusiasm of the celebrity had failed. "No, I don't care to see the Pacific ocean," was the indifferent reply. This gave Sutherland his opportunity, and he was prompt to improve it. "Well, don't you think, Mr. Dana," he said, "that the Pacific ocean might want to see you?"

"Grove L.'s" Wit.

A session of the legislature does not usually pass without producing a few jet d'esprit worthy of reporting, but the late session was singularly devoid of such enlivening incidents. One of the few good things is credited to Grove L. Johnson, chairman of the judiciary committee of the Assembly. When the session was well advanced the local option bill came up for consideration in the committee, and Irwin Johnson, a member from Kern county, became too vociferous to suit the other Johnson. "The gentleman from Kern," he said, "has slumbered along here like a god, till somebody threw a brick through his saloon window, when he suddenly waked up!"

The Sunny Southland Songsters.

Another funny incident occurred in the Senate while Henry M. Willis of San Bernardino was making a speech on the meadow lark bill. Willis is nothing if not rhetorical, and, as his speech in defense of the California songster approached its climax, he exclaimed, "Mr. President, I was reared in a country home in the sunny southland, where every morning I was wakened by the sweet songs of the meadow larks and the sounds of the blossoming orange boughs brushing the window panes!" Thereupon arose Lewis, the bawky Senator from San Joaquin county, who said drawlingly, "Mis'ter President, I'd like to ask whether at the time the Sen-ator speaks of he was considered a pretty-bright-h-o-o-y?"

(Concluded.)

BECAUSE her hold upon life is at best slight, and if she were to know what you know she would pass away directly, and there are duties for her yet to do. Besides, she has not the vital strength to undergo what one must in order to master the potentialities of the putting on and putting off our fleshly vesture. It requires a physical battery of no small power to sustain me as I am now for several days at a time and still retain the body in a habitable condition for the home-coming. It was I who prompted her to confide her secret to you. As she is a protestant, she must sometimes tell her secret to another than to God, or her heart would break. Can you conceive of a heavier cross for one of her organism than to live as wife to one who, despite his selfish love and putting off our fleshly vesture, admires her for her founded chiefly upon admiration for her beauty of face and form, and his blundering attempts to be kind, is repulsive to her? She is my complement."

"Do you mean affinity?" I asked.

"Affinity denotes that which is disagreeable," he replied, "it does not express the true idea. Soul is as sexless as light. Sex is a mere incident of the flesh, yet human souls are not single, but dual. As in biology we find that life of a new creature begins with a bisecting of the primal germ and multiplying indefinitely by that process, so God thinks the souls of beings into life by pairs, each the complement of the other, that they may go on multiplying and replenishing the earth with life. But, because of countless interfering agencies born of imperfect conditions of physical life, social environments and conventions (a meddlesome and ambitious matchmaker in this instance) these dual beings often fail of union in this earth life, yet they cannot become perfected beings separately."

"If misalliances are made here, and divorces and remarriages are morally not possible, how are such errors to be rectified?" I asked.

"Eternity will furnish time enough and the universe is sufficiently extensive to furnish opportunity," he replied, sweeping his hand across the heavens. "You have doubtless noticed that the Bible nowhere speaks of an angel appearing in the form of a woman, but always in the form of a man. The perfected male physique is much more beautiful than that of the perfected female. The office of maternity requires departure from the image of the maker that entail sacrifices much to be regretted. If the facts seem otherwise in human eyes, if Venus de Milo seems more beautiful than Apollo Belvedere, it is because of suggestion born of the flesh and marks a human limitation from the ideal. Once out of this world we shall all of us, male and female, possess the form of the perfected male."

"Nor is that all that I have discovered in my exploration along the borderland betwixt earth and heaven," the Professor went on to say. "Christ came to us embodied in complete humanhood. He had within him the dual natures of man and woman. That is why he is at once the ideal of man and woman. The loftiest concept of a woman is to be like Christ, who was a man in form. And the loftiest concept of a man is to be like Christ, who, nevertheless, was as sexless as the angels. He was not a stranger to any true philosophy of life and had sympathy for those whom sex led astray, but not even the Evil One sought to tempt him in that relation, for Satan knew that it was not his nature to be more than a man. He was Man. He was the twin made one flesh, one rounded full-orbed soul."

"You saw me eating heartily at the table, but nothing like digestion goes on in this body. That which is consumed is assimilated directly or, more properly, it returns to essential elements, as this body will presently and instantaneously. Christ could at all times leave his fleshly body, as I have left mine, and go whither he willed. In this manner, I, like our Savior, fasted forty days in the wilderness, that he escaped from the tomb, himself rolling away the stone and taking his fleshly body and burying it that it might undergo corruption, that he appeared on the way to Emmaus, in the mountain of Galilee, to the eleven when they sat at meat and was finally seen to ascend into heaven.

(Being the Sixth Galoot Club Romance.)

By TOBIAS BLACK

"As for myself," he continued, "I am greatly restricted. I am only a novice in the world of spirit, feeling my way along from discovery to discovery, from power to power, for I am not in the spirit world, but only on the border, as the seat of my power is still the intensely active brain in that body lying as if dead under the vines. If that heart should cease to beat and the brain substance should cease to act I should instantly go into the realm of spirit, to return no more. As it is, I wander among the unseen things of this world, becoming momentarily into contact with mysteries I cannot solve, yet learning many things that were mysterious beyond the power of imagination to explain, so long as I was strictly confined within the fleshly walls under the vines."

"I promised to show you something of how I obtain the inner knowledge of human life and the state of the human heart, that has so interested you. If you can trust me completely I can take you through St. Augustine as you never went through another city in your life. Can you do so?"

"I assured him that he had my fullest confidence and that I would trust myself unreservedly to his charge. 'Very well, then,' he said. 'Now take my hand and do not strive to let go for an instant.' I did as I was bidden."

"Up to this moment, gentlemen, I know that I was myself, that I was fully conscious every instant, and in my own proper mind and person; but, now comes the deeper mystery, mysterious beyond comprehension, even to myself, and I hesitate to tell you what followed, and yet my narrative will be in no wise complete without what subsequently transpired."

"For love of Moses, Judge," broke in the newspaperman. "If you are going to take another twist on it I'll be a raving maniac. I am checker-block already."

"Your mental solvency may have to be inquired into later on, Judge," declared Banker Appleby, "but drafts will still be honored without protest."

"I will thank you, gentlemen, to refrain from remarks, invitations, or otherwise," observed the Principal of the High School, with quiet earnestness. "As for myself, the Judge's narrative is nothing less than a revelation."

"It is with great reluctance," resumed the Judge, "that I put my credibility to this test, even among those with whom I have been on terms of intimacy for a century of a century, but having gone so far I may as well proceed to the denouement."

"We had now reached a settee under the shadow of a low-hanging magnolia, intensely dark, and had been sitting a moment or two when, without my being conscious of a change of position, we were in the midst of the city. It was past midnight and, but for the ball at the Alcazar and a few place of revelry, the people were asleep. We passed through the walls of houses, as though they were films of mist. Hand in hand, we went without apparent effort from house to house of rich and poor, white and black, and saw how they lived. Where there were groups talking we heard what they said, but no one paid the smallest attention to us, or to what we were doing or saying, though we did take the precaution to speak in undertones, when in the apartments of the sleeping, or, at any rate, I did."

"But this is not all we saw, for I am now about to recount the most extraordinary experiences of that memorable and marvelous night. When we came upon people sitting quietly thinking, or lying in their beds dreaming, their bodies became transparent to us, and we saw through them, as through pellucid waters. We saw the pulsations of the heart, the coursings of the blood through the arteries, the suffusions of the crimson fluid through the capillaries and the cellular tissues of the lungs and its flowings throughout the venous circulation."

"We saw the processes of digestion and nutrition, the waste particles of the cellular structure taken down and carried away and replaced by living particles from out the crimson stream, saw the activities going forward in the cerebral centers and, more marvelous yet, when my companion took from his breast pocket what seemed to be a reading glass with large magnifying power, I beheld iridescent, fluid particles speeding with infinite rapidity from cerebral and other organs, along myriad nerve fibers, inducing surpassing activities at their termini. They kept the body glowing with a fluorescent radiance and the whole system teeming with life. 'Ultra violet rays,' was the only explanation of the phenomena of visibility offered by my guide, adding that against these rays nothing is opaque."

"Occasionally the Professor whispered pleasant suggestion into the ears of the sleeping, or those sitting in a state of semi-consciousness, and instantly the subject responded with smiles and a lighting up of the countenance that proclaimed intelligent cerebration or, if disagreeable suggestions were whispered, there followed frownings or mutterings and looks as of thunder clouds upon the brow."

"Taking me to the roof of the hotel, where a network of telegraph wires passed overhead within easy reach, the Professor bade me look at them through the glass, and, behold! fitting along those wires in infinite succession were the same iridescent, fluid particles that I had seen in the brains and bodies of the sleeping."

"Are we batteries, then?" I asked. 'Precisely so,' the Professor replied, 'but as the battery is not the creator, but only the generator of electric fluid, so the fluid you have seen is not life, as many believe, but the agent of life. The universe is charged with it. No man, living or dead, hath seen life. Life is God. No man hath seen God at any time, nor will ever see him, yet the humblest may know him and walk with him. It is a vast mystery which I am told the angels of heaven have not solved.'"

"We went through portions of the city where the law is broken, and viewed the lives lived by the unfaithful. Thence back to the Ponce de Leon, and, through sequestered apartments, where I found many others, the gentleman from Detroit engaged in a game at cards with large stakes involved. From there we went to the apartments of his wife, whom we found sleeping lightly with traces of tears and a troubled countenance. Bending over her, the Professor whispered the one word, 'Genoa,' and immediately her face was wreathed in smiles and, clapping her hands like a pleased child, she spoke aloud and said: 'I thought you would come to me. You have come in many times before, and always I am so much stronger and happier afterward. You must be he, you must be he; but, dear, dear, I can not understand it all.'"

"In another instant we were back at the settee, under the magnolia and the Professor was shaking me by the arm and shoulder, saying, 'Wake up. We must hasten. Something extraordinary is taking place.'"

"Half running, half walking, he dragged me through by-paths and short-cuts to the Alcazar, which we reached just in time to see two officers, carrying a board on a stretcher into the half-lighted veranda, followed by two or three curious persons and a physician, who was about to administer to the seemingly dead body a hypodermic potion of great potency."

The most salient impression of Rider Haggard that the New York reporters received upon his last visit to the United States was that he was able to cross his legs double; i. e., after crossing his knees, to further slip his feet behind his cord of Achilles. fainted and requires none of your remedies," the Professor forcefully thrust the by-standers out into the darkness. I then saw that it was his own proper body that they had upon the stretcher. During the moment of confusion succeeding his imperative onslaught I saw the Professor throw himself upon the body, as if to breathe the breath of life into its nostrils, and instantly, as it were, melted into the body like a passing shadow and disappear from view. Immediately Rev. Oliver Langworthy rose from the stretcher, rubbed his eyes, yawned and said: "I think I must have fainted." Thanking the bewildered bystanders for their kindly assistance, and assuring them that he was completely himself again, he greeted me, took by the arm and led me into the open air. "That was decidedly the closest call I ever had," he said, as we made our way to the front entrance. "Had that physician tampered with me the most serious consequences must have resulted."

"We saw, glancing at the clock, that there was yet opportunity for two hours' rest before his train was to start, and so he bade me good night and good-bye, pressing my hand and saying at parting: 'You must come and see me when you next visit Chicago. Our experiences of this night will bear talking over at a subsequent time.' He stepped into the elevator and disappeared from my view forever. Though we corresponded regularly until his unfortunate demise, I have seen him since only as Genoa saw him—in my dreams. "The manner of the death of Oliver Langworthy," continued the Judge, "must be sufficiently obvious to you who have listened to this narrative, provided, of course, that you accord me that degree of credibility I have been accustomed to enjoy at your hands. While absent from his physical body at a greater distance and for a longer period of time than ever before, perhaps, through lack of nutrition or some other purely natural cause, the mechanism broke down and death resulted. I entertain the hope that the police department of Chicago will confess itself baffled and let the mystery drop with that, but if suspicion of foul play should seem to rest upon any one I shall deem it my duty to lay the whole extraordinary experience before the chief of police of that city, as I have laid it before you gentlemen here tonight, but how to do it in such a way as to convince him of that degree of reality of which I am myself so conscious is a matter which gives me the profoundest concern."

"That knocks me clear off the perch," declared the newspaper man to the Doctor a few minutes later when the belated members of the Galoot Club had separated at the foot of the stairs.

"As for myself," interrupted the Principal of the High School, "knowing as we all do the Judge to be the soul of honor and the most matter-of-fact of men I must, as I said a while ago, regard this narrative in the light of a revelation."

"His wife tells me," said the Doctor, "that the Judge can dream a three volume novel in the course of an after-dinner nap and that the habit of telling his dreams grows on him as he gets older. I tell him that he eats too much and exercises too little. Good night gentlemen."

"You don't mean to tell me," exclaimed the Professor, "that the Judge has been entertaining us with one of his dreams?"

"Search me," was the reply. "I have told you the little I know about it. Good night gentlemen."

"Good night Doctor."

But it was not until the town clock struck midnight that the Professor and the Editor ceased to discuss the possibilities, probabilities and disabilities of the "Mysterious Experiences of a Matter-of-Fact Man."

Representation in the House.

Representatives shall be appointed among the several states according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each state, excluding Indians not taxed.

But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a state, or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such state, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such state.

So reads section 2 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. It is important as a source of friction between the North and the South and as confirming the oft-repeated declaration throughout these lessons in citizenship that it is not the written constitution that constitutes our government, but rather the constitution that exists in the minds, hearts and customs of the American people. This constitutional provision has been violated every day since it was adopted, and with especial effrontery during the last ten or twelve years, and the American people seem well content with it until it shall be made a dead letter until the end of time.

It will be remembered that the ratio of representation in the lower house of Congress was a vexed problem at the time of making the constitution on account of the black men held in slavery. Northern men generally insisted that, inasmuch as they were held as property, they were no more entitled to representation in government than the horses and mules which were also held as property. Men of the South responded that, although property, the negroes were none the less human beings and entitled to some care and protection through power of government and, if they could not be allowed to represent themselves in government, their masters should be allowed representation on their behalf. As it was impossible for either side to convince the other a compromise was entered into that had no basis of reason to sustain it, but did have a basis of necessity, and necessity is sometimes a very perfect justification. Therefore representation for the slaves was allowed on the basis of allowing each slave to be rated as three-fifths of a free person, and that stood until the Civil War freed the slaves.

It was easily foreseen that the liberation and enfranchisement of the slaves would not be looked upon with satisfaction by the white people of the South, and it was anticipated that they would be seeking out some means whereby they could limit the participation of the freed man in the affairs of government. To restrain them from doing this, as far as possible, this section was inserted in the Fourteenth Amendment. It has not produced the anticipated result. It has not prevented the exclusion of negroes by tens of thousands from participation in the franchise and it has not reduced the representation of any state in the lower house in Congress.

There are two pronounced types of mind: that of the legalist and that of the practicalist. The legalist finds in the disregard of this constitutional provision abundant cause for offense. His sense of justice is outraged every time he thinks of it. The practicalist counts the probable cost of undertaking to enforce that section and declares that the attempt would cost a hundred times more than its enforcement would profit the country.

For, deep down in the inner consciousness of the nation—the real constitution of the nation—it is recognized that the black man who was freed from slavery was wholly unfit to be given the right of suffrage, unfit to be made a full citizen, and that it was a mistake to confer full citizenship upon him the way it was done when it was done.

It is recognized, too, that the South has an enormous and troublesome race problem on its hands and the North is willing to trust the South to work that problem out so long as it remains fairly evident that an effort is being made to work it out in good faith

When the North loses faith in the ultimate good intentions of the South toward the black man, merely because he is black, then an effort to penalize the South by reducing its representation in the House of Representatives, to correspond to the reduction of the representation of the black man in the voting constituency, will be more popular than it has been so far.

While what is known as the "grandfather clause" in the constitutions of many southern states has saved from disfranchisement many white men no more fit to vote than the most unfit of colored men, yet those clauses in time will work out their own inequality and prevent the voting of white persons whose illiteracy is as serious as that of black men likewise prohibited from voting. Per contra, these limiting amendments to state constitutions do permit negroes who are fit to vote the privilege of voting. So it seems likely that, despite the contentions of the legalists, the second section to the Fourteenth Amendment will continue to be the dead letter it has been ever since the horror of carpetbag government created a revulsion of northern feeling on behalf of the rebellious states.

Yet it is true that it requires only a fraction of the number of votes to elect a congressman from a southern state that it does to elect one from a northern state where there are no restrictions upon suffrage.

And, too, it should not be overlooked that a curtailment of the suffrage on the ground of illiteracy or other unfitness, except criminality, would reduce the representation of a state in the House of Representatives. The effect of the section in consideration is to penalize any effort to raise the standards of citizenship. California itself would be a sufferer if this section were strictly applied, for it has a qualification requiring voters to be able to read the constitution when printed in the English language and to write one's name, and some states have a small property qualification.

The idea is gaining ground that those only should vote who are fit to vote and to penalize efforts to restrict the suffrage to those fit to discharge the duties of citizenship, as this section would do, would be to retard human progress rather than to establish human rights. All things considered, therefore, this action would seem to be better dead than alive. Its only office so far has been now and again to reopen old wounds, the permanent healing of which is vitally important to our national unity and welfare.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds.

It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

A First Lesson in British Justice.

Persons interested in the reformation of our criminal procedure should not fail of carefully reading our article upon "England's Better Criminal Procedure," to be found elsewhere in this paper. It lays the foundation for a most interesting and enlightening series.

The first difference noted between the administration of British and American justice is that in England no court has the power to declare an act of Parliament unconstitutional. This difference is fundamental and not to be overcome, but it is not a difference that makes seriously for delay or uncertainty in administering justice in criminal cases.

A marked difference, as will be noted, between the practice in England and in this country, is that in England an indictment is not invalidated by a technical inaccuracy in the wording, and if such an inaccuracy be discovered it is then and there corrected. In our graft cases weeks have been expended in wrangling over the sufficiency of indictments whereas, in England, if an error or uncertainty were found, it would be corrected then and there. This is just good, British sense. It is American sense, too, but not legal sense.

It will be remembered that an effort was made to induce the last legislature to modify the procedure regarding grand juries, but without success. The issue must be taken to the people so that, by the time the next legislature meets, public sentiment will demand that such procedure be reformed. The English system points the way very clearly. The American laity has seen it as clearly all along. It only remains to force the common sense way upon erudition to work that remedy.

The Bradbury Reversal.

The case of the People vs. Bradbury has become celebrated, not because Bradbury, as poor an old millionaire as ever gained dollars at the expense of all in life that is worth while, has been convicted and finally sentenced to prison, but because of the decision of the First District Court of Appeals to the effect that, inasmuch as a bank cannot be "told" anything, Bradbury was not guilty when he swore that he had not "told" a bank not to lend money to a debtor of his, when he had told the executive officer of the bank that very thing. This decision made the nation laugh so heartily that our own Supreme Court saw the humor of it and reversed the decision of the court below. Thrice lately has our Supreme Court scored: It granted a rehearing in the Glass case, vindicated the direct primary law, and has now decided that a bank can be "told." Good for the Supreme Court.

The Fourth.

Those who want a perfectly sane Fourth of July celebration have forgotten their childhood, have forgotten how they scrimped their pennies for weeks and weeks, and counted the days, too, that they might turn themselves loose for an insanity of joy on that day. To watch others discharge fireworks is akin to watching others eating ice cream on a hot day, not soul-satisfying to a boy. Watch the children, guard them, be ready to bind up their wounds with first aid to the injured, but let your children have their childhood as you had yours, including what appears to one with gray hairs, stiffened joints and a bad memory, a perfectly insane and senseless Fourth of July celebration. There was a time when it did not seem so even to them.

How Simple the Remedy.

If Mr. Calhoun, being innocent of wrong doing, desired to reinstate himself in the confidence of the people, and to free his reputation from a tarnish and a taint that will not otherwise come off while memory lasts, how much simpler would it be for him to take the witness stand and tell plainly whether or not he paid, ordered paid, or consented to the payment to Abe Ruef of $200,000, or any other sum, to be employed in securing a trolley franchise—how much more simple would this remedy be than that of trying the grand jury for bias, the public prosecutor for illegal tenure of his office, the trial judge for prejudice and the public in general for imbecility? If actions speak louder than words how like a trumpet blast blown from the walls of heaven does this man's taking all the by-ways that ingenuity can invent, instead of the plain, open highway to justice, proclaim his guilt! In nothing else but the law would any person be permitted to take so circuitous a route to a perfectly definite goal and not have his sanity inquired into. Our laws are simple and effective enough where one falsely accused wants justice, but where the purpose is to defeat justice the tracings of an earthquake as recorded by a seismograph, are a straight-edge by comparison.

Exit Slot Machines.

In the direction of moral reform San Francisco has never done a better thing than to abolish the slot machines. It is a thing that will be copied until those devices of iniquity are driven out of the state. They are the best kindergartens of the gambling spirit ever devised and, as such, every one of them maintained places one or more persons in moral jeopardy. Having the law the next thing is to have that law enforced. This is a duty San Franciscans owe to themselves and to humanity. The law will not enforce itself for more than the ensuing two weeks. After that eternal vigilance of police and citizenry will be requisite for its enforcement. Stand by the ordinance and see to it that others stand by it, too.

That Tariff Commission.

It is not improbable that the pending tariff bill may provide for a permanent tariff commission, as a sop to the President and the people rather than as an arm of government to be employed with serious purpose. It is too much to expect that a schedule almost wholly the result of logrolling will be permitted to be jeopardized in any one of its parts by the mere ascertainment of the truth that more protection has been accorded than was needed. In one way only can such a commission be made worth its keep and that is by giving publicity to the information it gathers. If that information is reserved for tariff committees only it will be boxed up and stored or carted to the crematory as fast as it is gathered. Nevertheless, the commission plan is the right one for making tariff schedules. Germany has demonstrated this. Its existing tariff, as certainly if not as excessively protective as our own, is the product of five years of labor by a staff of thirty-two specialists reinforced by the entire treasury department of the empire with the co-operation of 2,000 trade specialists scattered through the empire and the added efforts of the entire German consular service. Moreover this entire force, or the greater part of it, is steadily engaged in keeping tab upon changing conditions in production and distribution of German products and the commerce of the world. The establishment of a tariff commission of any sort will be a step in advance, but we must not be surprised, or unduly pained, if senatorial Bourbonism does not permit that step to assume the proportions of a stride.

Still Guessing.

The press of the East is still guessing at the purpose of the President's recent message to Congress, concerning the corporation tax issue. Some papers affect to believe that the President has fallen under the baneful influence of Aldrich and his band of brigands. Others hold that a bargain has been made with senatorial hold-up men that will insure the enactment of drastic corporation control legislation at the regular session, as a recompense for allowing an upward revision of the tariff to be made. Believing, as The California Weekly does, in the earnest independence and sagacity of William Howard Taft it declines to hold to any opinion in relation to the matter inconsistent with such belief. It believes that the President, and not Aldrich, is doing whatever is being done, that it is a strategic move and that the future will prove its sagacity and significance.

THE PRIMARY LAW DECISION.

The decision of the Supreme Court, sustaining the direct primary law, will give satisfaction throughout the state. There has been a feeling of apprehensiveness regarding that law difficult to shake off. It was known that many who had a hand in enacting it were not sincerely in favor of such a law, and that political powers behind them could not look upon it with satisfaction, except they knew that there were "bugs" in it. Nor was it certain in what atmosphere the Supreme Court might find itself sitting when it came to consider the law. That atmosphere appears to have been salubrious, for which let the gods be praised.

This is not saying that the law itself is perfect. It is not. The district system of expressing popular preference for senatorial candidates is bad and must give place to a state-wide expression of party opinion, but it is tremendously important to have the principle of an advisory vote as to the election of a United States Senator affirmed by the highest court in our state. It may yet have to be affirmed by the highest court in the United States, but it appears to be pretty well established, the more especially since Senator Chamberlain of Oregon was allowed to take his seat in the Senate without questioning his right to that seat.

In affirming the principle that a primary is a party, and not a general, election another important step was taken, and yet right, justice, sound sense and immemorial custom are with Judge Angellotti in his dissenting opinion, to the effect that parties should have the privilege of nominating a member of some other party as their candidate if they desire so to do. It may be that the legislature had the power to so curtail a free expression of popular will (and it certainly does have it now that the Supreme Court has confirmed that power), but it is a power that should not have been exercised or confirmed. The fight for a full and free expression of party opinion should be taken to the next legislature. Fusion is generally a bad thing, but the right to fuse is a good thing and Men of California should demand the fullest and freest exercise of that right. Judge Angellotti was right, and the court was wrong, save that Judge Angellotti mistakenly held this to be a "very minor and unsubstantial part," which it is not. No invasion of suffrage rights is ever "minor and unsubstantial."

It is indispensable that in voting at a primary election, voters keep on their own side of the party fence, but it often happens that the transcendent issues are not party issues at all. It is so in San Francisco now. The transcendent issue before the people—the pivot upon which the election will inevitably turn, is: "Shall the graft prosecutions go on or shall they be dropped?" Mr. Heney represents the desire to go on with them. Whether he is a Republican, a Democrat, or what, he does not figure in that issue and the voters of any party should be free to put his name on their ticket if they wish the graft prosecutions to go on. The same is equally true with his opponent. This decision deprives free men of making free choice of party candidates and to that extent it is bad in policy whatever it may be in law.

We are not warranted in looking upon our direct primary law, judicially sanctioned though it is, as a finished product. It may or may not be "the best direct primary law on the statute books in any state in the union," but it is not as good a law as it must finally be made, and it is not as good a law as it should have been made by the legislature that enacted it. It should have provided for a non-partisan judiciary, which it refused to do. The prohibition of a candidate, defeated at a primary election, being otherwise nominated for the same office at the same election, constitutes another invasion of the franchise in the interests of machine politics. It is customary to abide by the results of a convention and it seldom happens that one who fails to so abide, and makes his appeal to the people, secures an election; but the writer of this has in mind a candidate for Congress who made such an appeal, after having been "jobbed" in his convention, with the result that he was elected by a clear majority over all candidates of all parties in the field against him, including the "regular" nominee of his own party.

The right of appeal to the whole people is fundamental and it is disappointing that the Supreme Court did not affirm that right instead of sidestepping the issue. It will be as possible to "job" a worthy candidate in a primary as in a convention and the right of appeal to the whole people may become important.

While the decision of the Supreme Court will be received with satisfaction the spirit of that decision is the spirit of the practical politician rather than that of the citizen who holds country above party and a free suffrage as more important than party success. But this is also true of the law itself. As it finally passed the legislature, not as it entered it, was the handiwork of politicians, not of statesmen.

THE RIGHT TO MAKE A MISTAKE.

The right to make a tactical error is inherent in every political or other organization among men. The Good Government League has made one. Let the fact be admitted with a due and proper humility but not in sackcloth or ashes.

The Good Government League stands for popular government. In common with other organizations, cliques, coteries and persons it recognizes that the direct primary affords, within itself, inadequate means of bringing before the public candidates to be voted for for nomination for public office. Other organizations, cliques, coteries and persons have undertaken, by methods which seemed to them good, to bring forward candidates for the consideration of the people on primary election day. These methods did not commend themselves to the Good Government League. Accordingly, at great expense and labor, this league undertook to obtain from the people such a direct expression of popular sentiment as would make possible the selection of an acceptable primary ticket or otherwise prevent a sowing of primary election votes so broadcast as to do no one good.

The committee in charge urged voters to sign their names to their ballots openly, but did not insist upon it, and then added this clause: "But if for any personal or business reasons you do not desire to give your names it will not be necessary to sign the ballot."

The circular did not go on to state why it would not be necessary to sign the ballot, that steps had been taken to identify the ballot whether signed or not (by placing under the stamp of the return card the voter's number on the precinct register and the first letter of his surname) thus leaving the anonymous voter under the impression that his identity was effectually concealed. There was just a taint of bad faith in the employment of this device and for this reason, and none other, it was a mistake to employ it, doubtless the result of some one overzealous person's eagerness to get at the facts.

But what of it? Here is an organization of sincere, public-spirited persons, not one of whom is actuated by self-seeking motives. They are working only for the public good through an organization that has accomplished great good for the public, and shall a single error, made by a single committee taking care of a single department of the work of that organization, negative all the good efforts of the Good Government League?

Whose sense of honor is it that has been most seriously outraged by this mishap? That of a newspaper the prostitution of whose editorial columns to the requirements of predatory interests is notorious and whose news columns may be cut on the bias to suit any interest at so much per line? Other persons whose plans are likely to be "queered" by a full and frank expression of public sentiment? These are they whose indignation knows no bounds. The rest of us are merely sorry.

Suffer not this untoward event, of itself not crucially consequential, to deter the Good Government League from pressing forward. It has done good work in the past. It can do good work in the future. There is good work for it to do. If its active members learn from this incident that not the smallest departure from the most perfect good faith toward the public can be tolerated the lesson will be worth the price. But the moral indignation of the Chronicle is jocose.

AN INCOME TAX AND THE STATES.

We know without being told that the interests which Nelson W. Aldrich represents in the inner chamber of the United States Senate do not want an income tax and that Aldrich cannot, in good faith, be favoring the submission to the states of a constitutional amendment legalizing such a tax.

There are now forty-six states in the Union. Three-fourths of forty-six is to all intents thirty-five, the number of states necessary to vote affirmatively in order to carry the amendment. Twelve states voting against the amendment can defeat it. What states can be counted on so to vote? Manifestly the states controlled by the predatory interests and the states in which investment interests dominate.

Throughout the West and South the investment idea does not much obtain nor does it on the Pacific Coast. The investment states form a little group by themselves and they are up in the northeast corner of the Union. Maine is not so much an investment state, but it is under the political domination of men who represent the "interests." New Hampshire is dominated and would be against the income tax. Vermont is conservative to a degree and essentially an investment state. Rhode Island is Mr. Aldrich's pocket borough and Connecticut is purchasable. Delaware is another pocket borough and, in a crucial contest, New Jersey could be controlled by capitalism. Florida is a winter resort for Standard Oil and may be counted on accordingly. The people of Pennsylvania would want the income tax, but that state has not had a representative legislature in more than fifty years and would be against it. West Virginia is in the same predicament. If Idaho, Utah and Montana were to have straight legislatures, incapable of being influenced against the common weal, the inhabitants thereof would be dumbfounded. This would give the opponents of the measure one state more than needed in order to defeat an income tax amendment and still leave a fighting chance in New York and Massachusetts, where the investment interests are powerful. The people of these states are, however, still able to dispute the supremacy of monetary interests.

Since the unfortunate five-to-four decision against the income tax idea in 1895, Justices Peckham, McKenna, Day, Moody and Holmes have taken places on the supreme bench. Providence will probably enable the President to fill one or two more places on that bench during his term of office and two of the four who were on the bench when that decision was rendered stood for the legality of the tax. Inasmuch as the establishment of its illegality in the Pollock case required the overturning of precedents long established the chances for legalizing an income tax seem to be better with the United States Supreme Court than with the states of the Union.

Was It Nothing to Them?

On Thursday of last week the Men of San Francisco had presented to them for their approval or rejection an issue that touched every home in the city, every man who rides to and from his business or work, every child that rides to and from school, nearly every woman who goes shopping or calling.

And yet only one voter in three took the trouble to express a preference one way or the other. It is this inertia of the voting constituency that hangs like a dead body chained to a living about the life of a free government. Unless it can somehow be overcome, unless men can somehow be made to perform their civic duties as in continental Europe, with their arms, men do perform their military duties, free government will be written down a failure and will pass from the stage of action. That consummation is as inevitable as that the arm that is not used will, by and by, become incapable of use.

Compulsory voting is coming. It has got to come. The salvation of free institutions depends upon it. It is as essential as that the privilege of volunteering for military duty be supplemented with the power to employ conscription if volunteering does not fill the ranks. If men must vote they will take the trouble to find out how to vote. If they will not vote then let them be disfranchised once and for all and suffer some other form of government to take the place of a democracy that the inertia of a people has prevented making good.

A Celebrated False Alarm.

Collier's has taken a fall out of the Supreme Court of California because of its decision abrogating the state constitution in the noted Fresno rate case. That case was, in its inception, prosecution, and termination a false alarm. Its principal effect was to show how little an obnoxious constitutional provision stands in the way when "between friends," as Big Tim Sullivan, of New York, expressed it. The forcing of that issue upon the Supreme Court of California, with its attendant humiliation to the state, was gratuitous. The constitutional inhibition upon railroads raising rates, when once they had been reduced to meet competition, was specifically made provisional, the proviso being that such increase of rates must not be made, "without the consent of the governmental authority in which shall be vested the power to regulate fares and freights." That governmental authority" is the State Railroad Commission, which has never at any time proven disobedient to the requirements of the Southern Pacific Company, and if that company wanted to restore the former rate between San Francisco and Fresno it would only have been necessary for it to make the needful request. In doing so, it would not have been made to cool its heels in the anteroom of the commission's office awaiting a favorable opportunity to be heard. The courts of California should have been spared that jam.

Get Together, Gentlemen.

The felicitations in which the organized villainies of San Francisco are just now indulging can hardly fall short of being ecstatic. Things are coming their way in great shape. The forces of municipal decay are in each other's periwigs scratching like Satan in a gravel pit. Whoever has watched Mr. Herrin's political career knows that his strategy consists invariably in dividing the opposition and then making common cause with one of the divisions against the other. Is this wily antagonist of free government at the bottom of the existing reform state of mind? And if so how did he get there? In which camp is he operating? The situation appears made to his hand whether he made it or not. The weakness of Scotland was never in the want of brave and hardy men able to do and to dare, but in the Scottish chiefs stopping to fight each other in the face of their English enemy. Have the political leaders of the cohorts of civic righteousness in San Francisco an excess of Scotch blood in their veins? It begins to look like it. Get together, gentlemen. Civic decency does not so pervade San Francisco that it can venture to confront the powers of rapacity self-divided and raging in an internecine conflict.

Amend the Way of Amending.

Twenty-seven states have memorialized Congress to take steps to have the national constitution so amended as to permit United States Senators to be elected by direct vote of the people. Four more states can make action on the subject constitutionally obligatory upon Congress. If such a proposed amendment could be submitted to a direct vote of the people it would carry in a hurry, but the Constitution of the United States involves no means for having any proposed amendment submitted to a direct vote. It needs to be so amended as to make its amendment possible in no other way. Had this been done not one southern state would have seceded from the Union. As the procedure now stands two-thirds of the members of both houses may join in submitting amendments to the state, or two-thirds of the states may unite in demanding that Congress cause such amendments to be submitted but, in either case, the legislatures, or state conventions (in three-fourths of the states) must ratify the proposed amendment or it will fall of adoption. This is representative government, the form of government that the makers of the constitution had faith in while they had little or no faith in direct legislation in any form. The experience of a century and a quarter, nearly, has shown us that the chief characteristic of representative government is its failure to represent public sentiment, save in exceptional cases where public sentiment is goaded to near the point of revolution. Even then it will be "euchred" if, by gaining time, government-by-corporation can gain the courage to "euchre" it. While on the subject of constitutional amendment why not amend the method of amending the constitution? In no other particular is our immortal document so faulty as in that it may be twisted, bent, doctored, cut short or pulled to great length, but can scarcely be amended without a civil war.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

In pleading with Death that the life of Alcestis may be spared Euripides makes Phocbus Apollo hold out the inducement that, "if she die old she will be sumptuously entombed," to which Death replies, "Thou layest down the law, Phocbus, in favor of the rich." Phocbus responds with surprise, "Why, how sayest thou this?" to which Death replies that, "Those who have means would purchase to die old."

Death, at least, has been fairly impartial between the poor and the rich. At any rate the rich have not been able "to purchase to die old." Where poverty has been discriminated against, in paying the final debt of nature, it has been more on account of ignorance and stupidity than of poverty and, except ignorance and stupidity be kept rich by entailment of estates, the twain are generally steeped in poverty.

If the rich die old it is generally through having lived as though they had not been rich, and if the poor die young, except of ignorance, it is frequently because they have sought to live as though they had been rich. They have indulged their appetites and passions to the fullest measure and, in excess, have laid the foundations of disorder.

If, indeed, we could "purchase to die old" it would not be the rich alone who would strive to drive a sharp bargain for added years. If death would condescend to dicker with us we would most of us give all we have and our note for the balance. In fact we would give anything except the one thing that Death exacts as a condition precedent to dying old. That one thing is a prudent, well ordered life.

Our orphanages are seldom model places, and yet the poorest of them will put to shame, on a mortality percentage basis, the richest suburbs of the richest cities, the select homes of those so rich that they can afford nurses, care takers, physicians, without limit. These orphanages are mainly indebted to their poverty for the low mortality among their charges, plainness of diet, regularity of eating, sleeping and playing, everything going with clock-like precision with nobody pampered or spoiled. Institutional life is proverbially healthful and yet institutional life is mainly a life of poverty and dependence. Where it is longevity does not lengthen under it.

It is only when we come to the founding hospital that institutional life is unhealthy. There poverty slays with the greed of a Moloch, but even then it is more the result of stupidity than of poverty. If, as Death declared to Apollo, "When the young die I earn the greater glory," what glory must he gather from those hospitals where unwelcome infants are taken in and done for!

What the writer is trying to get at is the truth that men may seldom "purchase to die old." Age is a thing to be earned if it is to be had and the poorest hardly need envy the richest his possession. But at what cost can it be earned? The cost of abstaining from that which is evil, a charge heavy enough to bear, with the added charge of doing affirmatively the things needful, not for eternal but for temporal life.

It is related of one of the "Royal Family" who once lived on "Nob Hill" in San Francisco, that he sent to consult his physician as to the state of his health, and demanded to know what to do or take, to gain length of days. His physician told him that he demanded to know how much such length could be reasonably expected to be given if he obeyed the rather drastic instructions to the letter. "About two years," was the reply. "The game is not worth the candle," he affirmed and so he lived as he had lived until he presently died of excess in living. Though several times a millionaire he would not "purchase to die old" at the price. Had his checkbook been able to liquidate the obligation he would have outlived Methuselah. Even the checkbook has its limitations.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Converting Iron Into Steel.

If the recently discovered process of converting iron into steel will do such wonderful things as Martin S. Kalmon, who controls the process, claims for it, the world is standing on the verge of a revolution in its steel and iron industry. Kalmon is soon to give a demonstration of his process in London. In the meantime, while he claims is that by treating iron with certain chemicals, at the same time subjecting it to heat, he immediately converts it into steel nearly four times as hard as the best now in use. In his demonstration, he says, he will take a heavy iron chain, give it a coating of steel as thin as an eggshell at one end, a coating a half-inch thick at the other, and convert the center of the chain to solid steel. He will take an iron razor blade and speedily make of it the finest steel. The best steel now is tempered to 63 points; Kalmon asserts that by his process it can be tempered to 243 points. His method, he claims, will do away with great furnaces and much of the other paraphernalia of steel manufacture. The fact that some of the greatest steel manufacturers, including Vickers & Son and Maxin, are said to be negotiating for rights to the process appears to indicate that Kalmon's claims may be substantial.

The Confederate Constitution.

After many vicissitudes and much wandering the original engrossed "permanent Constitution of the Confederate States of America" now is on exhibition in the United States congressional library. The constitution was adopted by the Confederate congress, March 11, 1861, at Montgomery, Alabama, and was signed by representatives of that state, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Mississippi and Texas. It was taken to Richmond when that city was selected as the capitol of the Confederacy, and remained there until the close of the war, when, with other governmental papers, it was removed. It next appeared at Chester, S. C., where it was seized by one of a band of marauders, but was rescued from him by F. G. DeFontaine. Mr. DeFontaine retained it in his possession till 1883, when it passed into the keeping of Mrs. G. W. J. DeRenne, whose son, W. J. DeRenne, of Savannah, now owns it. Mr. DeRenne retains its ownership, but has lent it to the librarian of congress.

Reducing the Death Rate at Panama.

Never, perhaps, has the benefit derived from the adoption of wise sanitary methods been more strikingly demonstrated than at Panama. Long years ago, when the French were vainly endeavoring to construct the great canal, the isthmus became known as a black hole of malaria and resulting death for all whose color was lighter than that of chocolate. It retained this invidious distinction up to the time when the federal government began operations there, but it maintains it no longer. The difference between then and now is due solely to correct sanitary treatment. Our government recognized the fact that the spread of malaria is due to the female mosquito, and proceeded to obliterate it, with abundant success. Let comparative malarial and death rates indicate the effectiveness of this action. In 1906 the malarial rate was 831 to the thousand; in 1908, two years later, it was 282 to the thousand. During the same time the malarial death rate dropped from 7.45 to 1.34 to the thousand. The general death rate dropped from 65.41 to the thousand in 1905 to 24.88 to the thousand in 1908. Among government employees the reduction has been from 41.37 in 1906 to 13.01 in 1908, or more than two-thirds. The death rate among American men in 1908 was 7.69 to the thousand, and among American women and children it was 9.72 to the thousand, which is not in excess of the death rate in the United States. So much for the annihilation of mosquitoes. It seems a little thing, but it has scored big in results.

Lovely Woman and the Staphylococcus.

The poet has remarked that lovely woman sometimes stoops to folly, and reports from London indicate that she is engaged in performing the old stooping act at the present time. So true is this that when you see a fair Londoner with a choice complexion you cannot be sure whether it is complexion or mixed staphylococci and acne bacilli that fascinates you to stare at. Having made this trifling announcement, it becomes our immediate duty, in order to allay unnecessary excitement and alarm, to explain that staphylococci and acne bacilli are disease germs, which the feminine woosers of beauty have injected beneath their skins, as they have discovered that the bacilli give them a "perfectly lovely complexion." The ordinary dose thus injected consists of about 125,000,000 staphylococci and 5,000,000 acne bacilli. It thus will be seen that it would require fully a week of daily treatments to provide a billion bugs to hold mass conventions and pink tea throughout the frail but busy system of the complexion-hunter. What will be the subsequent effect, after the complexion has worn off, remains to be seen, for the fad still is young. We are painfully aware that there is a fishy sound to this story, but its essential facts are given on the authority of the London correspondent of the New York Sun, and perhaps those who have watched lovely woman and her complexion the most will doubt the least.

English Most Spoken Language.

A century ago French was the most extensively spoken of all European languages. It is so no longer, being surpassed in this respect by three other languages. This fact has not just been recognized, but it was a Frenchman of note who most recently called attention to it. It was at the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Alliance Francaise, in Paris. M. Loubet presided, and M. Deschanel delivered the principal address. It was in the course of this address that he regretfully commented on the fact that the French language had declined from the first to the last place in the use of the world's peoples in but 100 years. He also gave the numbers of persons speaking the principal languages as follows: English is spoken by 116,000,000, Russian by 85,000,000, German by 80,000,000, and French by 58,000,000. That is to say, there are two persons who speak English to each one who speaks French. Just by way, however, of reducing any tendency to swelled chest on the part of those who speak English, it may be well to call attention to the fact that they still number but about 7 per cent. of mankind; 93 per cent. yet would fail to understand our grammarless tongue.

Baths for Spanish School Children.

The wheel of progress, in its forward revolution, shows signs of reaching and disturbing dreaming Spain. For example, the public-school children of Bilbao are to have baths provided for them, to prevent consumption, however, was not attained without bitter struggle on the part of such fine old Spanish grandees as do not believe in baths. It was a young woman teacher who stirred up the trouble, saying that she felt baths would be good for children and that she was convinced that many of those in the public schools went to their graves without knowing the feeling of one. She preached this insidious and revolutionary doctrine so long and so eloquently that at last she prevailed on a socialist member of the municipal council to introduce an ordinance in accordance with its terms. Then the war was on, and the socialist member was denounced as waving aloft (by such an ordinance) the red rag of anarchical revolution. Vice-Burgomaster Esguezabal, a particularly fine old Spanish grandee, was especially happy in his opposition. "Never in my life," he solemnly declared, "have I taken a bath, and I am sure that the majority of this honorable board are in the same happy position." His declaration was disputed by some of the honorable members, but he valiantly held to it. And the ordinance finally was passed! Never again suggest that the wheel of progress is not moving right along.

Some British Statistics.

The London board of trade has just issued a Blue Book which contains most interesting statistics relating to Great Britain. Here are some of them: In 1851 the total population of England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland was, in round numbers, 30,000,000. In 1908 it had increased to 44,539,593, or nearly 50 per cent. Now note the distribution of this increase: In England it amounted to 98 per cent., in Wales to 87 per cent., in Scotland to 67 per cent.; while in Ireland—poor old Ireland—there was a decrease of 33 per cent. If these comparative figures would not serve as a text for a sermon on the past government of Ireland, it is because they suffice in themselves for the entire sermon. When the inhabitants of a country desert it, they do so either because its soil is barren or because it is badly governed—and the soil of Ireland is rich. In 1851 approximately 50 per cent. of the population of England and Wales resided in the cities; fifty years later, in 1901, 77 per cent. of the population was urban, and the "rush to the cities" still is increasing. That the conditions surrounding child life there have been greatly improved is indicated by the death rate per thousand in 1857 and again in 1907. In the former year the death rate among children up to five years of age was 67.8, in 1907 it was 40.9. From 5 to 10 years it was 7.8 in 1857, 3.4 in 1907; from 10 to 15 it was 4.7 in the former year, 2.0 in the latter. A child's chance for life nearly doubled during the half-century.

WORTH KNOWING.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "grat" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES.

A NEW BOOK BY JAMES LANE ALLEN.

Writing in Pittsburg Gazette-Times, George Seibel discusses the announcement that a new novel by James Allen is forthcoming. He says:

"The most important literary announcement for some time has just been made—that a new novel by James Lane Allen is to be published next month. It is important not only because all of Mr. Allen's work is of a quality commanding the highest respect, but also because of Mr. Allen's personal qualities. He is not only one of our artists of the first rank, but also the true aristocrat of American letters. Mr. Allen has no press agents. We never hear what fountain pen he uses, what breakfast food he eats, what color he prefers in neckties, nor how he expects to be a novelist instead of a truck driver. He is never interviewed upon the subjects of race suicide, the boll weevil or the duty on paper pulp. He has never run for governor nor denounced the Standard Oil company. He buys no palazzos in Italy and never circumnavigated the globe in a towboat. You do not hear that he is spending the summer at Oshkosh, working on a new masterpiece. James Lane Allen was in Pittsburg for a week, a year or two ago, and no one knew it. His name on the hotel register was signed simply 'J. L. Allen,' and those who saw it little suspected that a great novelist, perhaps the greatest of living novelists in America, was in the city. He exhibits the same dignified reserve everywhere. He doesn't talk shop, doesn't have his picture taken in seventeen different poses, doesn't roar and shake his mane at convocations of women's clubs. He is content to let his work speak for him.

"And it speaks in no uncertain tones. 'A Kentucky Cardinal and Aftermath' are already classics; their rich humor and pathos and poetry enshrine them securely among the books that will live. 'Flute and Violin' contains some of the best short stories ever written. 'The Choir Invisible' is one of the noblest of books. 'The Mettle of the Pasture' is one of the most dramatic. 'The Reign of Law' and 'Summer in Arcady' are full of truth and tenderness. And these, with the exception of a volume on 'The Blue Grass Region of Kentucky,' represent all the writings of Mr. Allen. He does not produce a new novel or two every year. It is, in fact, six years since 'The Mettle of the Pasture' was published. During that time, by way of comparison, we have had nine books from David Graham Phillips, eight from Robert W. Chambers and twelve from Jack London. 'When Mr. Allen's new book is published, we will know that six years of mature thought, of loving literary labor, of lofty artistic purpose have gone into its making. And we know it will be worth while.

A PERSIAN LITTERATEUR.

By Arthur Inkersley.

A most interesting visitor of the past week at Del Monte was Mirza Ali Kuli Khan, the Imperial Persian consul at Washington, D. C. This distinguished young man, who speaks English almost wholly without accent and has a far wider acquaintance with its best literature and thought than the vast majority of English speaking people. Under the patronage of Mrs. Francis J. Carolan, Mrs. Phoebe Hearst and other ladies, Mirza Ali Kuli recently gave a course of lectures on Persian literature, which failed to attract many listeners on account of the paucity of persons capable of appreciating them rather than because of their lack of interest.

Mirza Ali Kuli came down to Del Monte on a house-hunting expedition and looked at various furnished residences in Pacific Grove, Monterey Heights and Carmel-by-the-Sea. He was much pleased with Carmel, admiring its splendid beach and grand view of the ocean greatly. It is probable that he will select Monterey or Pacific Grove, however, on account of its greater accessibility.

The consul married a Bostonian lady and has one child. He is a brilliant, enthusiastic conversationalist and may be described as a lover rather than an admirer of Americans, their ways, manners and institutions. While at Del Monte he met an Englishman whose nephew, formerly a major in the British army, has been an official in Persia for several years and has written one of the best and most accurate English books on that country, with the people and language of which he is thoroughly conversant. Mirza Ali Kuli is familiar with the name of Major Sykes, and promises himself the pleasure of reading his books and those of Major Sykes' sister (who has also written on Persia) at an early opportunity.

MARKING THE SANTA FE TRAIL.

A source of much inspiration in American literature is the Santa Fe trail, and it is, therefore, of more than passing interest to note that there has just been completed a system of markers to perpetuate the knowledge of its true course in the old adventurous days. The following account, from the Chicago Record-Herald, of the erection of the last monument marking the trail is of deep interest to the lover of American letters.

The last of the 100 monuments and markers along the old Santa Fe trail from Kansas City, Mo., to Trinidad, Colo., was recently unveiled at Trinidad. The descendants of Kit Carson, a name that will always be associated with this once great highway of the plains, assisted in unveiling the latter monument. Granite markers are now placed at intervals of not less than five miles along the historic trail, through the states of Kansas and Colorado, and all that remains to finish the work is similar action on the part of the state of Missouri and the territory of New Mexico. Within a few years the marking of the trail will have been completed from its beginning at Independence, Mo., to its end at the historic plaza at Santa Fe.

The Kansas branch of the Daughters of the American Revolution began the movement to mark the old trail several years ago. The legislature appropriated $1,000 for the purpose, but as this was not sufficient to buy the monuments at the quarry in Oklahoma it was suggested that a penny collection be taken up in all the schools of Kansas on January 29, 1906—the state's anniversary. This collection amounted to about $500.

The enterprise was received in every county with interest and enthusiasm, and generally the boards of county commissioners and citizens along the 500 miles of the old trail through Kansas assumed the expense of setting the monuments, thus making the money at hand furnish eighty-nine markers between the Missouri border and the Colorado line. In addition to these there are at different points on the trail six special markers paid for by individual chapters of Daughters or other local interests, making a total of ninety-five markers from the east to the west line of the state.

The unveiling of the markers at Trinidad and El Moro, N. M., was an occasion of more than ordinary interest. Both unveilings were made in one day, El Moro being five miles from Trinidad. The unveiling of the Trinidad monument, which stands near the Santa Fe railroad station, where all travelers to the Pacific Coast may view it, was a notable affair owing to the fact that it took place at the edge of Kit Carson park, a tract of land given to the city by Mayor Taylor, who was one of Kit Carson's nearest intimate friends in his days. The descendants of Carson who attended the unveiling were Kit Carson, Jr., Charles Carson and a daughter of Thomas Woods (granddaughter of the scout), all living near La Junta, Colo., and Mrs. Terquina Allen of Raton, N. M., a daughter of the trail maker.

Carson's home was at Taos, N. M., and he supervised the work of nearly 100 trappers, all of whom were expert shots and intrepid Indian fighters. The trapping season lasted from early fall till late spring. After their furs were disposed of Carson and his men would organize into detachments and "hire out" as guards on the Santa Fe trail, which was then the only highway of commerce and travel to the Southwest.

A "CENSUS OF CAXTON."

Seymour De Ricci has at last published his eagerly awaited "Census of Caxton," which will now supersede Blade's long book, which has been the guide of the collector for fifty years. There is a careful index of all the past and present owners of Caxtons, as complete as it could possibly be made. The British Museum now contains 122 examples, from seventy-six different works, which leaves only thirty-five known books unrepresented. J. F. Morgan has the largest private collection, which includes those he bought recently from Lord Amherst. He now has sixty-four.

HUGO—VOLTAIRE—ROUSSEAU.

It seems more than probable that the body of Victor Hugo will be raised from the crypt of the Pantheon at Paris and placed under the dome, together with the dust of Voltaire and Rousseau, now also in the crypt. This will allow the Rodin statue of Hugo, now nearly completed, to be placed over the sarcophagus, as well as that of Voltaire, which Segoffin did, and the one of Rousseau that Bartholme is at work upon, to be grouped near. This will make the Pantheon still more impressive, and drive still deeper home the inscription over its door, "Aux grands hommes la Patrie Reconnaissante."

OZYMANDIAS.

By Percy Bysshe Shelley.

I met a traveler from an antique land
Who said: Two vast and trunkless legs of stone
Stand in the desert. Near them, on the sand, Half sunk, a shattered visage lies, whose frown
And wrinkled lip, and sneer of cold command,
Tell that its sculptor well those passions read
Which yet survive, stamped on these lifeless things,

The hand that mocked them, and the heart that fed.

And on the pedestal these words appear:
"My name is Ozymandias, king of kings:
Look on my works, ye Mighty, and despair!"
Nothing beside remains. Round the decay
Of that colossal wreck, boundless and bare,
The lone and level sands stretch far away.

Supreme Strife.

The day after a traveling company of theatrical stars had played "Hedda Gabler" in Sacramento, two leading physicians met on the street in the capital city, and after each had ascertained that the other had been present at the performance, the elder of the two asked the other what he thought of it. "Oh, fine! beautiful!" was the reply. "It was almost as good as an autopsy!"

Old College Days.

"Do you remember the night when we put a cow in the Greek professor's room?" "Yes. And when we lamplighted the bust of Aeneas?" "Sure. And the cold winter evening we turned the bell upside down and filled it with water?" "Ah, those were great days! How's your boy going along? Do you think the students of to-day are as studious and progressive as we used to be?" Then the gray-haired gentlemen began to discuss the moral influence of modern college life.—Philadelphia Ledger.

CITIES AND THINGS

I.

By WILLIAM KENT.

[The following is the first half of an address delivered before the City Club of Los Angeles on May 22nd by Mr. William Kent, of San Francisco, whose twenty five years of active participation in the political regeneration and civic uplift of Chicago lends extra significance to his thoughtful analysis of the problems of the cities, "the hope of democracy." The remainder of the address will appear next week.—The Editor.]

In spite of the cracker box philosophy of the Country Cross Roads, in spite of the squeaking pipes of bucolic poets from Virgil down, in spite of the tragedy that often dogs the steps of the city-fearing rustic, the cities grow at the expense of the country and the country is ever striving for urban privileges.

However vigorously we may condemn the cities as destructive of individual and national life, the cities keep on growing. We may praise the gentle arts of husking corn and milking cows with frosted fingers, but men prefer to collect carriages and women to sell as well as to buy dry goods.

For the time being, the trend toward the cities is an irresistible tide, therefore instead of cursing the cities we had better study them, and instead of neglecting them, we had better aid in developing them, as the highest and most necessary social service that we can perform in our day and generation.

Our American cities have given more reason for the contempt in which they have been held than have the older cities of older nations. They have been worse than cities have been wont to be when held to comparison with average civic morals. They have furnished more evil and less good to their inhabitants because they have been more neglected and less understood than the cities of Europe.

City the Real National Entity.

But if we look back through history we find that the city was usually the real national entity; that it was the most coherent and most powerful community in human society; that its dignity was recognized; and that it was the inspiration of a large part of the patriotism of the world.

Physically and economically speaking, the city is the closest knit political entity. Its problems of health and public service are vital and no less vital are its social problems. Economically speaking, no one can deny that the mere aggregation of human beings creates a vast labor saving device. For where ten men or a thousand men or ten thousand men are needed for a given task, the waste of time in collecting them from a sparsely settled neighborhood is a real economic waste. The department store, as a distributing medium, has proven the economy of dealing with vast numbers of people. Great banking systems, newspapers and many other necessary adjuncts of present day civilization, are only made possible by such concentration. Factories demand a centralized working force as an element of cheap production, and were it not for waste and for an unjust and inadequate system of distribution of product, the city would be more obviously than it now is, a source of great economic beneficence not only to its own dwellers, but to the world at large.

Centre of Social Opportunity.

Considering the human side, we realize that man is a social animal, and can only reach his best development in close contact with his fellows. The more man can know of other men under rational and decent conditions, the more respect he will have for humanity and the more kindly will be his outlook upon the world, and accordingly, the more pleasant will be his life. In this sense the city is the highest social opportunity. There are many reasons why people migrate to the cities, that are better reasons than the "moth and candle" analogy of the bucolic bards. Before taking up the present day problems of American cities, it would be well for us to go into the realms of theory and to consider what a city is and what are its functions.

As a political entity, first of all, it is necessary that the city should furnish to its citizens law and order so that they may go and come about their respective businesses free from danger or molestation by others. This carries with it the necessity of grasping the idea of co-operation and of realizing the old principle of the old common law "that a man may not use his property to the injury of another," a dictum more sweeping and radical than almost any propounded by the most orthodox apostles of socialism, a principle permitting unlimited restraint exercised in the public interest.

Next after this demand for law and for order comes that for healthful conditions of life. Next to provide for the education and enlightenment of its people.

Supplying Education and Enlightenment.

Under this head of education and enlightenment comes, as a necessary part, the furnishing of parks and playgrounds for both old and young—for recreation and education are next of kin—and the development as a social need, of an opportunity to appreciate the arts. It is now being recognized that the people of a community are, furthermore, of right entitled to correct information concerning their affairs. This function of furnishing information has heretofore been left to the newspapers, oftentimes to the betrayal of public interests, and the destruction of the truth. If private initiative cannot correct this abuse, there is no doubt but that newspaper publication will before long be considered a municipal function, and published truth one of the highest necessities. It is doubtful if the boodling board of San Francisco supervisors under the management of Messrs. Ruef and Schmitz, as editors-in-chief, could have provided a more untruthful and malevolent organ of public opinion than has been furnished by some of the privately owned daily and weekly publications of San Francisco. It may also be said that under municipal operation of the printing press the publications reflecting the morals of the city government would change their attitude with the reformation of that city government, whereas the manners and morals of most of the San Francisco press aforesaid, have continually grown worse, although the city government has become respectable.

The economic needs that a city should supply as affecting the public health, are, first, water and second, drainage. Running along with these, of equal importance, is the necessity for adequate ground space for decent housing, which housing demands abundance of light and air. Further needs which should be supplied by the city are transportation and artificial light.

Responsibility for Public Utilities.

Comparatively few people in our country have started their reasoning at the right point and therefore few realize that the city is responsible to its people for an adequate and cheap supply of these necessities. Many are rather disposed to believe that the city has no legitimate functions at all, and that those things which it has furnished to its people, it shall continue to furnish to them to the end of the chapter, and to the exclusion of all else. But it is no more a legitimate function of an American city to furnish police jobs, slums, contagious diseases, boodling officials, bribing promoters, malicious newspapers, unearned fortunes, dirt, lawlessness and a "four hundred," than it is the function of a setter dog to support an abundant crop of woodticks.

Penalty of Haphazard Growth.

The growth of American cities has been haphazard and accidental. The development of these cities has been lopsided and anti-social. One of the greatest actresses of our time was wont to allude to her son as "her little accident." If this were a joke it was one of the most cheaply cynical jokes recorded in history. If all growing human beings were considered and treated as accidents the race would have a worse future ahead of it than is now promised. It is exactly this "accident" theory of cities that is to blame for most of the cities' troubles.

We find that the first requisite, that of obtaining law and order in our cities, has usually been given over to a political police system, aided and abetted in many cases by police courts of the lowest type. We that are more privileged ask of the average man that he should respect the law, and the average man, coming in contact with this police system and little else in the way of law, obtains an idea that law is not justice and finds it hard to yield respect to what is not respectable. In certain sections of our country this contempt for law seems justified as regards more ambitious courts, but the city has suffered worst of all.

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Mabel's to Be the Goddess.

Mabel's to be the Goddess soon, an' pa an' ma an' me
Is filled with patriotic pride that's beautiful to see.
An' pa remarked this afternoon: "At no expense I'll kick.
I mean that Mabel's style shall make the 'riginal Goddess sick;"
An' so our souls is filled with zeal, our house is filled with sticks.
Of dumsy things that goddesses must wear upon their backs,
And also on the rest of them Says pa: "Why, dern expense!
We'll make the 'riginal Goddess look erbout like thirty cents."

Mabel's to be the Goddess soon The Pison Valley Post
Has rounded up a herd of votes, an' pa he bought the most,
The object bein', as the Post was good enough to say.

To prove which was "the sweetest girl in all our fair bokay,"
A year's subscription to this sheet, all Pison Valley's boast,
Is credited a million votes. Be patriots," said the Post.

So pa got out an' hustled some, an' so did Jabez Earll,
Who calls on Mabel every night, an' she's the "sweetest girl."

Mabel's to be the Goddess soon I reckon she will show
The folks that Girl of '76, though neat, is now de trop,
For Jabez Earll he hustled round, an' pa was hard to beat.
An' both their waches is in pawn to prove that Mabel's sweet.
A billion an' ten million votes they gathered in their pound,
An' stricken would-be goddesses was gaspin' all around;
An' pa an' ma an' me is proud, with patriotic zeal awhirl,
For Mabel will be Goddess 'cause she is the "sweetest girl."

The Opinions of Rufus.

Oh, how I have yearned an' yearned to be "held up," so that I, too, could make a million dollars an' be a honored citizen.
I object to definin' a hobo as a man that won't work. We orto be more careful of the feelin's of the sons of deceased pa that saved money.

If some people that claims heaven is their home is right, I don't feel as many objections to livin' in the other place as I did.

God made Justice as a guide fer men; then man made Law as a snare fer her feet. Under these circumstances I ain't goin' to lose confidence in the poor old girl even if she does git considerably tangled up sometimes.

If women would consider how few engagements has been announced this spring an' summer I reckon they'd think twice fore they put on their new hats agaln.

It pleases me to announce that the doctors' operation on Jabe Spooner was highly successful an' gratifyin'. Yes, poor Jabe's dead.

I know lots o' fellows that argue like this: Takin' it fer granted for the moment that my first proposition is right, it generally follows that my second proposition is sound, my third proposition is logically based on the second, which clearly justifies the fourth, an' the fourth mathematically demonstrates the first. After that, it's proved.

Theys' another class, that allers proves they're right by offerin' to bet on it, an' if you don't take their bet you're no logician an' you're dead wrong.

Squeeze the Almighty Dollar out o' some men's souls, an' I'd be willin' to speculate suthin' you couldn't find what's left with a microscope.

An Actor in Many Roles.

I have had my share in advancing the work of the Almighty of earth, and I have been in places where the Father of Evil himself might hesitate to follow me.

I have brought the sunshine of gladness to eyes that had wept, and I have added somewhat to the scorching flame of man-made hell.

The parson's wife has been glad to receive me, and yet I have been welcomed in the halls of a shame unutterable.

I have ministered to the wants and pleasure of innocent childhood, and have served as the agent of the lust of earth's doubly-damned.

I have assisted in the uplifting of man, and have aided in fastening the chains of degradation upon him.

I am—what think you that I am?
I am the dollar which you purchase, shall hold in your hand before this week is over, with no thought of whence I have come and what I have done, or where I shall go and what I shall do.

Yet, when you pause to think of it, is there anything useful in man's social economy which is more wonderful than I?

Sixty-two Cents a Week!

A British parliamentary committee found women workers for sweatshops, in London, who received but sixty-two cents a week for long hours of daily labor. This was the smallest wage the committee discovered, but the average payment of such workers hardly exceeded $1.75 a week.

Sixty-two cents a week, my lords!

Pray, have you given thought
To these, who are least of the nation's wards,
For less than a pittance bought?
Rotting, not living, the while you nod,
Starving by slow degrees;
Children no less of the one just God—
What will you do with these?

Millions for Dreadnaughts to sweep the seas,
Since war is a patriot's crime!

Ay, but, my lords, what think you of these
Who sink in your mire of slime?
The Derby is run, and the Derby is won,
As madly your pleasure you seek,
But what of the women of lives undone,
Sixty-two cents a week?

These are your sisters, most potent lords,
Your sisters of pallid cheek,
Bound to this life by the fragile cords
Of sixty-two cents a week!

Sixty-two cents! 'Twere a lunch for you,
If bound by economy's submers.
These are the ones of the submerged crew—
What will you do to bless?

In the great High Court that is held above,
Where the Judge of us all we meet,
I have heard somewhere that a deed of love
Counts more than a Dreadnaught fleet.
Then, mighty my lords, what answer, I pray,
When the Judge who is just shall speak:
'What did ye for these of the tear-wet way
And sixty-two cents a week?'

You Can—

Put up the motto, "God Bless Our Home," but you will have to do more than that if there is any noticeable effect;

Cry over spilled milk, but you will weep quite a while before you will recall anybody who recovered milk in that way;

Draw aside your skirts when you meet a sinner, but if all people did the same his skirts would brush you;

Wear an elegant hat on your head, but it will not change the quality of the stuff under it.

Notice This, Willie.

Put away the nimble nickels
That you once placed in the slot.
In no hole can fools now drop them,
Just to win a house and lot.

The Thoughtful Man on Heney.

"If we do not look out," said the Thoughtful Man, "if we do not greatly beware, the bright sun of our Western civilization will set in the black night of Heney. Blind is he who does not see the signs of our impending doom, if we don't shy off from the evil machinations of Heney. Oh, my country, my loved and contributing country, 'twas a dark day for you when you butted up against Heney!"

"You noticed, did you not, that the misled and misguided people now are talking of running the malicious Heney for district attorney. The woe of it! The shame of it! They might better run me. To be sure, I am not a lawyer, but I could be relied upon to do less injury than he to my friends if they had to consent to be held up for thousands in order to make millions. And neither is Heney a lawyer. Have you not heard it? Listen to that low moan from the Oregon penitentiary: "Heney is no lawyer," is its everlasting plaint. Hark to that bitter wail from the San Francisco jail, repeating over and over that Heney is no lawyer. There is not one of his persecuted victims, whether in penitentiary, in jail, or out on bail but painfully apprehending what the next trial may do to him, who is not willing to make his affidavit that Heney is no lawyer."

"Shall the testimony of these men be disregarded? Shall we maintain our fallible judgment against theirs, when there is not a stone cell or a warped bail bond which does not mutely give evidence that they know what they are talking about? Forbid it, Almighty Dollar! Shall we not heed the testimony of the seven gifted lawyers who have just devoted their high ability to demonstrating that Heney is no lawyer? Any one of them might have demonstrated it just as well, but it was deemed a patriotic duty to demonstrate it hard, and so the seven of them were retained. Shall we set our lay judgment against that of their trained legal minds? Oh, come off! The thought wears me."

"Sir, the great, misguided people must be led aright." They must discard Heney, and revive his victims who droop in the Oregon bastille. They must reject Heney, and let the sunlight of hope shine once more in the San Francisco jail. They must turn Heney down, and receive the glad and grateful thanks of those who are out on bail but would sooner be out otherwise. Let the battle rage, and let its battery be, "No bas Heney!" Darn him, he interferes with business. It is getting so that it is unpleasant to be either briber or bribed in this city now. Will you mention my views?"

"I will," said I.

("Cities and Things"—Concluded.)

When we consider the next item, that the cities should furnish healthful surroundings, we find that sewer systems and drainage have usually been at first neglected in planning, and later let out as political spoils, or left to the selfish initiative of shortsighted and greedy land owners. The task of cleaning the stables is before almost every one of our cities. If we grant that by tax levies and bond issues these troubles may be corrected, what shall we say of the kindred problems of congested housing and inadequate light and air?

Cause of Congested Centres.

There is a vicious circle here which works ceaselessly against the poor. The aggregation of population increases the values of land in private ownership. The poor must have abiding places. They can either pay transportation charges, waste much time in travel and live far from their work, on cheaper land, or they can occupy less and less space in the city's center. The wealth created by their coming together and by their enhanced efficiency is the direct cause of their deprivation of the necessities of healthful life. Thus, the more they crowd the more rents must advance and the less space they can have.

We are so unused to considering the question of crowding in this broad and half-settled country of ours that we seldom sit down calmly to consider the injustice that comes from the speculative valuation of privately owned land. If a subdivision is being laid out for wealthy people, all sorts of restrictions are enforced as to what proportion of the lot shall be occupied by the building, and probably a common park is established. But in the construction of tenements and especially in the development of tenement house property out of residences once occupied by the well-to-do, the demands of rent are insistent. But inasmuch as average people can afford to pay but little rent per capita or per family, they must therefore be herded close to give interest returns on high-quoted values. Thus the haphazard growth of our cities is responsible for the lack of breathing space.

Duty to Provide Air and Space.

Our cities are very proud of establishing great acreages of parks on their outskirts. This is a fine idea and with the growth of the cities will prove to be even more serviceable than at present, for the cities in their growth will surround these parks and instead of being objects of excursions into the country they will be close at hand to many city dwellers. These great parks are being established in the outskirts of cities and not close to the centers, for the very obvious reason that land values are there comparatively low. But our greatest cities have realized that these large parks, necessitating transportation expense to reach them, are not enough. Playgrounds and breathing spots must be established in all congested neighborhoods. Chicago, with its collapse of real estate values, has been peculiarly fortunate in being able to provide many such spaces. And Chicago people look forward to the time when children will not be criticized for playing upon the streets, because, having better places to play, they will not be on the streets.

It is recognized among all students of human nature, that the only cure for social evils lies in the creation of social opportunities. It would, perhaps, be fairer to human nature to say that suppression of wholesome opportunities is the cause of most of the evils of society.

Members of the state board of equalization have spent a portion of their time this year riding around in automobiles, looking at country properties. In a little hamlet in San Diego county the party drew up in front of the office of the local justice of the peace, while that official, a venerable countryman of the chin-whisker type, stood upon the steps. Just at that moment one of the tires of the automobile exploded with a loud report. "Wall, I hope you fellows hit what you shot at," said the chin-whisker jurist. A moment later he added: "By gosh, that's the first time I ever heard one of them things blow up."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Jack Stafford for Secretary of State. It is on the cards that if Charles F. Curry definitely enters the race for governor of California (it is unthinkable that he should be elected) Jack Stafford, professional sergeant-at-arms of the assembly, is to be entered in the race for secretary of state. In fact he is already doing that job. He would rather have it than be the sergeant-at-arms again. It affords more of the same kind of stuff that Jack likes so well and fats up on so quickly. But what is to become of Lou Martin, who, for many years, has turned over his run on the Southern Pacific for a shorter run, for the same company, up and down the aisles of the state Senate? In fixing up a straight whistle-blowing ticket for state offices it is inconceivable that Mr. Herrin's men should leave Lou Martin off and keep Curry and Jack Stafford on their slate.

A Short Bit of History. The days when Henry T. Gage was governor of California and James D. Phelan was mayor of San Francisco, were strenuous. There was something doing most of the time and all of the time while the teamsters were on strike. What with sympathetic abandonment of jobs, and the earth just then happening to be passing through an atmospheric zone of flying bricksbats, the commerce of San Francisco was brought to a standstill and a Moses was in demand to lead the people out of the wilderness. Mayor Phelan gave head and heart to the matter in hand and preserved order the best he could. Consultation, conciliation, compromise, concession, were all tried, but the employers stood firm and they had the men on strike so generally on the run that about the only thing they were looking for was an opportunity to lie down under conditions that would preserve their dignity while yielding to the employers substantial fruits of victory. Mr. Phelan arranged the affair for them, and after the details had all been perfected, Henry T. Gage was called in. He looked over the situation, perceived the feasibility of the Phelan plan of settlement of the strike, adopted it, recommended it to the strikers with his benediction, and when it was accepted by them, generously claimed all the credit for the settlement of the strike, which credit, The Examiner, hating Phelan heartily for lack of subservience to that sheet, heaped upon Gage with a liberality that knew no bounds. Gage made his campaign for renomination for governor on the strength of being "labor's friend" while, to this day, James D. Phelan, who really effected that compromise, is commonly accounted labor's enemy. It is not in the flesh that men get their due. Some other fellow gets it.

Mr. Phelan. Mr. James D. Phelan made one of the best mayors San Francisco ever had, and repeated the performance a second and a third time, a thing unprecedented except that Mr. Eugene Schmitz made one of the worst mayors San Francisco ever had and repeated that performance. To be sure, Mr. Phelan had his limitations. For instance, he did not permit the Examiner crowd to run the city, and he did not turn the spoils of office over to the "boys." He had ideas of his own which he insisted upon with a displeasing self-confidence. He enforced the laws to the displeasure of labor leaders who did not desire to have the particular laws enforced just at that particular time. He made himself unpopular with bad people of all classes and was too much of a reformer to suit negative righteousness. The unco guid began to fear that he, like Caesar, cherished ambitions and they made haste to sit down on him.

Mediocre Availability. The practical politician always distrusts the strength of a strong man. To his way of thinking mediocre availability offers the kind of strength that counts. He measures the powers of a prospective candidate by the number and character of his enemies rather than by the number and character of his friends, and he places the value of winning a fight above that of having won something worth winning when a fight has been made. The following of such a policy as meets the approbation of the practical politician has put a good many relatively weak men into the presidential office to the vast injury of the nation. It has given California a number of governors who went through the gubernatorial motions and did little else. If the practical politicians can have their way about it the same policy will give San Francisco one or more candidates for mayor for or against whom nothing can be said. This may be good politics, but it can not be good business for San Francisco.

Mayor White's Bombshell. Sacramento city politicians have been thrown into sudden agitation and confusion through the announcement made by Mayor White that under no circumstances will he consent to be a candidate for re-election. This is more of a disappointment than of a surprise, because it was well known that the city's highly esteemed mayor was in the aversion, if not with dread, upon the prospect of undergoing another two years' ordeal in the office; but so many citizens had urged him to run again that it was hoped he would yield to their wishes. But it seems the mayor, who on the former occasion was nominated in his absence and did not desire the office even then, believes he has fulfilled his duty in occupying it during two years, especially since that occupancy involved almost entire neglect of his private professional business.

Glee of Sacramento Machine Republicans. With no one clearly indicated by public opinion as a candidate, the situation in the capital city is that in which the Republican politicians feel that the game is theirs to play as they will. They will naturally proceed to pick out a candidate and nominate him at the primaries if they can, which they are likely to succeed in doing not because they are popular with the mass of Republican voters—for the reverse is the case—but because there is not apt to be any effective concentration of forces against them. With the backing of the State Printing Office, and with some assistance from the Southern Pacific company, the machine is still quite a power in Sacramento. There is talk of the Union Republican Club turning itself into an advisory nominating convention to put up a ticket.

Effects of the Primary Decision. The decision of the Supreme Court sustaining the primary law entire has cleared the political situation in San Francisco considerably, though it still leaves a fair with splintered tickets to do it. The first effect was to knock the Union Labor ticket to flinders. The effort of "P. H." to placate every party by having Republicans, Democrats, and what-not on his ticket has resulted disastrously, and his slate will have to be rewritten. Incidentally, it puts Frank Sullivan out of municipal politics this year, as he cannot beat McCarthy at the primaries.

Henry to Run. In the Republican ranks, the independently decided had the effect of precipitating the nomination of a ticket by the Municipal League of Independent Republican Clubs, without Francis J. Henry on it for district attorney, the reason being that, under the law, such a nomination would limit him to the support of the Republican ticket and would expose him to defeat at the primaries by the organization push, who could possibly end his chances there. Under the law a defeat at the primaries precludes the candidate from running independently. At Henry's own request, therefore, he will not be nominated by any party, but will make an independent campaign throughout. He was, however, heartily endorsed by the League.

Byron Mauzy Leads. Byron Mauzy is the League's candidate for mayor. Mr. Center, in view of the unexpected opposition to his candidacy, based upon his supervisorial record (which, The California Weekly believes, is an unpopular rather than a damaging record) withdrew his permission to use his name—a permission granted in the first place only upon the urgent plea of necessity made by the League. Mr. Mauzy, who now heads the ticket, has long been noted for his enthusiastic interest in political reform. He is an able man of independent fortune, and with high ideals. He is popular in his party, and should win both at the primaries and in the fall election. The rest of the ticket, when this is written, is only partly complete, but the nominations are of a high order.

The Call and the Good Government League. The Call has rather confused the friends of good government by its course in the last week. In its zeal to protect the primary law in the form for which the Call takes credit to itself for its passage, the paper has resented every attempt of even the best-meaning other friends of good government to bring before the public worthy candidates for office. It has repeatedly slammed the Municipal League, though the League is about as representative of reform forces as any body of citizens could be, because the League has ventured to prepare a ticket at all. It has seized upon the straw ballot of the Good Government League, in which the warm friends of that League believe the League made a mistake of judgment that is more than condoned by its honesty of intention, as a pretext for a hearty roasting, the real reason being, apparently, that the Call does not want the Good Government League to "interfere" with the free operation of the primary law by trying to sound public sentiment toward possible candidates. What further obscures the situation is the fact that the Call has not made clear how it expects the direct primary to be of any effective use in furthering good government if the friends of good government sit with their hands folded while the machine politicians actively continue to prepare programmes for the public to swallow at the primary. To The California Weekly, the Call's course seems fatuous, and to have resulted in confusing the cause of good government instead of solidifying it. This, too, without question of the Call's sincerity but only of its judgment.

A GOOD GOVERNMENT FUND

A PERMANENT MONEY SUPPLY FOR REFORM.

The forces which stand for good government in Los Angeles, and have stood for it ever since good government was urged to be hoped for, recognize that the conflict is irremediable. It will not end so long as the cohesive power of graft can unite two persons in a combined effort to procure a soft job or an inside position with reference to a public contract. Therefore these forces which made for civic righteousness recognize that they have got to settle down to something like the Siege of Troy and stay with the job until they can pass it on to a new generation reared to go into the trenches and keep up the contest. To do less would be to surrender to tendencies that would make urban property owning unprofitable and urban life unbearable.

Eliminating Sporadic Appeals.

"The most serious matter in connection with reform movements, and movements for good government, is the financing of them," explains one who has been in the forefront of the fight for better things at Los Angeles. "There are many good citizens of ability who are willing to devote a good deal of their time to good government work, and to contribute liberally to campaign funds besides, who balk when it comes to going hat in hand begging for funds which are doled out grudgingly by men who do practically none of the work, yet who are, by reason of their large interests, the principal beneficiaries of it. So it happens that citizens who are able and do give generously to financing good government movements are called upon on every occasion."

As it is in Los Angeles so it is in San Francisco and every other considerable city. But Los Angeles, alone of all the cities of California so far heard from, has set about remedying the difficulty. It has founded a good government fund, and placed it in the custody of a board of nine trustees, all tried and true citizens, men not disposed to fritter the fund away in useless endeavor, but who can be counted on to use the means for furthering movements best worth the effort and expense.

How the Fund is Collected.

In order to create this fund subscription blanks are passed around to prospective contributors who are asked to pledge a definite sum per year for a term of years, unless modified or changed by agreement thereafter, this pledge to be in lieu, if the subscriber so desires to have it, of all other giving for good government purposes. By this means Los Angeles now has a pledged good government fund in the neighborhood of $20,000, perhaps, which will be automatically renewed annually and made instantly available for good government work.

How the Money is Used.

The expenditures are made out of this fund for the enterprises that are best worth while. The first money contributed was toward maintaining the People's Lobby at Sacramento during the session of the last legislature. Another appropriation went to financing the recall of Mayor Harper. Other appropriations were made for circulating petitions for submitting charter amendments to the people. Some have been used in secret service work in gathering evidence in aid of the public prosecutor where some law or ordinance is being openly, flagrantly and continuously violated. Some will doubtless be used in making effective the direct primary when Los Angeles confronts her next city election.

Municipal research is another form of activity that may call for a considerable expenditure and will save, to the city, over and over what it will cost this fund. The calls upon the fund are, of course, many, and not all good enterprises can be financed from it, but only those best worth while, those promising greatest good and that are most pressing, and yet provision may readily be made for indispensable enterprises, a thing often impossible before the creation of this fund.

It is worthy of note that the trustees of this fund seldom have anything to do with the actual expenditure of appropriations made from it. They satisfy themselves that the work being undertaken is in competent hands, make the appropriation and confine their own activities to keeping the fund replenished.

To be sure this system of financing good government efforts is new even to Los Angeles, having been inaugurated in February of this year, but it has given great satisfaction so far and other cities and friends to good government are interesting themselves in the experiment.

Possibly a National Example.

The California Weekly learns, through the Secretary of the Board of Trustees of the Los Angeles Good Government Fund, Mr. M. Lissner, that the Secretary of the National Municipal League has become much interested in it and it is not impossible that it may become a national movement so far as its scope is concerned. At all events the cities and towns of California would do well to take up the subject at an early date. Mr. Lissner would be glad to furnish all needful information upon application to him. With all the larger cities so financed it would be only one step more for the cities to unite helpfully on behalf of state movements for the common benefit of all the cities. The possibilities of such a movement as Los Angeles has started might easily become far reaching.

The Red Cross stamps that everybody bought last Christmas realized $138,244.51 for the fund to be used in fighting tuberculosis. Nearly 15 million stamps were sold.

Some candy you buy always seems to stick around for days. Do you know why no one wants it? It's because it's "profit candy"—it's the poor pieces that make profit for some candy makers.

It's the absence of the poor pieces that makes profit for Lehnhardt.

ENGLAND'S BETTER CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

I. CONTRASTED WITH AMERICAN PRACTICE.

Written for The California Weekly by An English Attorney.

[This article is the first of a series to be published in The California Weekly, contrasting the procedure in the criminal courts of England with the California procedure and showing why the English system results in a more rapid and economical justice without expensiveness delays. America adopted the English method of administering justice shortly before England decided that method for a better one. America has completed a cumbersome system while England has simplified a better system. The reform of criminal procedure in California is the most urgent problem of the day, and this article, together with those to follow, will be illuminating to all readers. They have been prepared for The California Weekly by an eminent member of the English bar who now resides in San Francisco, and may be relied upon as an authoritative statement of the facts. The Editor.]

Some time ago the Hon. Melville Bigelow, addressing the New York State Bar Association, used the following language: "All right-minded lawyers would be glad to find some feasible way of shortening the long course of criminal trials. They seem to do these things better in England than we do." And Mr. Justice Brewer of the United States supreme court, speaking before the American Bar Association, said, "You may trust a jury to do justice to the accused with more safety than you can an appeals court to secure protection to the public by the speedy punishment of the criminal."

President Taft, our prominent judge and lawyers, in common with all other intelligent citizens, are anxious to discover some method of procedure by which the present scandalous delays, expense and uncertainty in the administration of our criminal laws can be remedied. President Taft, when secretary of war, addressed the graduating class of the Yale law school, in 1905, saying: "If a provision of the law could be enacted by which no judgment of the court below could be reversed except for an error which the court, after reading the entire evidence, can affirmatively say would have led to a different verdict, ninety-nine reversals out of one hundred under the present system would be abolished."

There is no doubt that trials are more speedily conducted in Great Britain and that there the criminal law is a greater terror to evildoers than it is here. It has been the boast of Great Britain that the jurists of all civilized nations regard with admiration the certainty, the expedition, and above all the justice of her criminal procedure.

It may be useful to outline the procedure in England, to see wherein it differs from our own and to trace if possible the results of such differences.

No "Unconstitutional" Laws.

The British parliament, which is equivalent to our Congress and to our state legislature, is "omnipotent"; no written constitution limits its power and it is therefore free to amend, repeal any act and change the succession to the throne, change any part of the law, or exercise the powers of a criminal court. No British judge or court can declare any statute to be unconstitutional and void. All that a court or judge could do is to interpret and apply the statute, and although he may err in his interpretation, other judges follow in his footsteps until parliament speaks again. To quote a forcible example, in the case of the asexualization law enacted by our legislature at its last session, and sentenced to imprisonment for life may be mutilated, no question of its constitutionality could be raised before an English court—the judges would simply have to determine the meaning of the statute and to apply it.

In the United States even the humblest court has the right and it is its duty, to declare void any act which contravenes the provisions of the constitution of the United States or of the state. This causes much uncertainty and delay which in England is avoided.

Nearly all of the crimes in the Penal Code of our state agree with the definitions of the same crimes in England and the penalties affixed to such crimes are more or less the same, the tendency in California being, however, to lighten penalties.

English Courts Enumerated.

In England the "House of Lords" is the court of last resort, and when sitting as such the lord chancellor and at least three lords of appeal must be present. It has no original jurisdiction. The highest court in England after the lords is the "Supreme Court of Judicature." It is divided into two permanent divisions: (1) the "High Court of Justice," exercising original jurisdiction; (2) the "Court of Appeals," which exercises appellate jurisdiction. The high court of justice is divided into five divisions and has twenty-six judges. The divisions are king's bench, common pleas, chancery, exchequer and probate. In 1907 the "Court of Criminal Appeals" composed of the lord chief justice and eight judges of the king's bench division of the high court, was added. There are many minor courts which correspond very closely with our police and other courts. "Assizes" are held two or three times a year in the different counties by judges appointed by special commission. "Quarter Sessions" and weekly "Petty Sessions" are also held. The latter are composed of justices of the peace. There is in England an officer known as the "Director of Public Prosecutions" who has several assistants and whose duty it is to institute and carry on criminal proceedings, to advise chiefs of police, clerks of magistrates and other persons concerned in criminal proceedings. There is also a "Clerk of the Peace," whose duty it is at quarter sessions to read indictments, record the proceedings and draw processes. Another, known as the "Clerk of Assize," records all judicial acts done by judges of circuits. These are somewhat similar to our clerks of court.

Having enumerated the courts, we come next to the mode of criminal procedure for the punishment of offenses against the public in England.

Criminal Procedure. The Arrest.

In criminal cases every person is liable to arrest without distinction, but the justice may in the first place issue a summons to the person accused and, if the summons be disobeyed, then issue a warrant of arrest. It lies, however, entirely in the discretion of the magistrate whether he issue the warrant at once or not. This provision obviates in many cases the inconvenience and humiliation of a public arrest. The summons directs the accused person to appear before the magistrate at a certain time and answer the charge made against him, and is served by a constable or police officer, either personally, or by leaving it at the accused's residence. A warrant, however, in California, is a command to apprehend the accused and bring him before the justice issuing the warrant or some other magistrate, and may be directed to a constable, or to any other person by name. If the person is not found in the jurisdiction, the warrant is endorsed to be executed in any other county. However, a warrant from any justice of the king's bench extends all over the kingdom and is dated "England."

Certain officers, as a justice of the peace, sheriff, coroner, or constable, may arrest without a warrant and even a private person present when a felony is committed is bound under pain of fine and imprisonment to arrest a felon. An arrest by warrant may be made on any day, at any time of the day or night, for treason, felony or a breach of the peace.

Preliminary Examination.

When an offender is arrested, the justice before whom he is brought is bound immediately to inquire into the circumstances of the alleged crime and to take the examination of the prisoner and the evidence of those who accuse him in writing; if the charge appear groundless the prisoner is discharged; if otherwise he is charged, or given bail for his appearance to answer the accusation at the next sessions or assizes; and the prosecuting witness or the person injured by the crime charged is also bound over to prosecute. A remand by a magistrate into the custody of an officer, or to a jail, must not exceed eight days and bail may sometimes consist of the accused's own recognizance without surety. If a witness refuses to testify before the magistrate he may be committed to jail. The accused may make any statement he likes, having first been cautioned that it may be used against him on his trial and any statement so made without promise or threat, is evidence.

Bail.

To refuse or to delay to bail any person is an offense against the common law and the statute. Formerly all felonies were bailable by a justice of the peace but now treason, murder, arson, or manslaughter if the prisoner is clearly guilty and not barely suspected to be so, are not bailable and even in cases of other felonies committed by persons of bad character or by notorious thieves, the justices may bail or not at their discretion.

The court of king's bench or any judge thereof in time of vacation, may admit to bail for any crime, but no one can claim this benefit as a matter of right. The house of lords may even bail a peer committed on an indictment for murder. If a party cannot obtain bail, he is committed to the county jail or house of correction by a warrant called a mittimus stating the cause of his committal. No person can be bailed for a felony by less than two sureties and the amount of the bail must depend upon the nature of the offense and the station in life of the accused.

Constitution of Grand Jury.

The next step toward the punishment of the accused is the presenting of an indictment or written accusation against him to the Grand Jury. The Grand Jury is an assembly of men consisting of not fewer than twelve nor more than twenty-three of the principal persons of the county who are summoned by the sheriff and are bound by an oath to the faithful discharge of their duty and to inquire into the alleged facts of the accusation.

For the purpose of selecting jurors, Churchwardens and Overseers of the Poor are required to make out an alphabetical list, before the first day of September in each year, of all men residing in their respective parishes and townships qualified to serve on juries, setting forth the christian and surnames, the place of abode, profession or business, and the nature and qualification of each individual; each juror must be over twenty-one years of age, under sixty, residing in England and a British subject or an alien of ten years' domicile, a householder, or the occupier of a store, warehouse, counting house, or other public place of the purpose of trade or commerce, and have lands, tenements, or personal estate of the value of One Hundred Pounds (Five Hundred Dollars). Any man having in his own name an income of ten Pounds (Fifty Dollars) annually arising from lands or tenements or twenty Pounds annual income from lands held by lease for twenty-one years or upwards, also is qualified.

The lists having been made out, copies thereof are affixed on the door of every church, chapel and other public place of religious worship with a notice subjoined that the lists will be revised at the Petty Sessions to be held within the last seven days in September of each year for the purpose of striking out those jurors who are not qualified, or who are infirm or convicts or outlaws or otherwise incompetent.

These lists are then, after revision, delivered to the High Constable and by him to the Court where they are copied into the "Jurors' Book" by the Clerk of the Peace and this book is then delivered to the sheriff to be used for one year commencing on the first day of January, and from it the sheriffs, coroners and others are to summon the jurors.

Announcement 1—"We do not propose to allow the prosecution to pledge this community to the harassment of another trial, which would be a travesty, inasmuch as it is known in advance that there is no case and can be no case against this defendant."

Announcement 2—"If the prosecution is ready to go forward with another trial, this defendant will be willing to go forward as well."

In pursuance of this mixed purpose not to "allow the prosecution to pledge this community to the harassment of another trial," and also to "go forward with another trial," the defense introduced a motion asking permission for the defendant to withdraw his plea of not guilty, under the indictment charging him with bribing former-Supervisor Furey, and to substitute in its place a motion to have all the indictments against Calhoun set aside. As a basis for this motion the allegation was made that Francis J. Heney was in the employ of the United States government, and receiving its pay, both when he appeared, as assistant district attorney, before the grand jury and ever since.

At the session of his court held last Wednesday Judge Lawlor denied the foregoing motion, and the defense at once filed another motion asking for an order transferring the remaining cases against Calhoun to some other department of the superior court. This motion was based on the allegation that Judge Lawlor entertains bias and prejudice against Calhoun. It was supported by the affidavits of Calhoun, himself, and his attorneys, Rogers, King, Barrett and Byington, and by the further affidavits of Alexander M. Bergevin, Charles W. Nelson and H. W. McLean. According to Bergevin's affidavit, Judge Lawlor on several occasions has inquired for Fremont Older at the Fairmont hotel, and has been friendly with the said Older. McLean and Nelson swore that Heney sometimes remained in Carpenter's Hall (the courtroom) after the crowd had left and while Judge Lawlor still remained.

Calhoun and his attorneys swore that Judge Lawlor consulted with Heney about the conduct of the prosecution and rattled papers in order to disconcert defendant's counsel. These affidavits were duly filed, and further consideration of the motion was postponed until next Thursday in order to give the prosecution time to prepare counter affidavits.

Judge Murasky has handed down a decision in which he holds that members of the district attorney's force were not in contempt of court when they continued to recover the papers stolen from Detective Burns, from United Railroads officials after a restraining order had been served. The decision was based on the fact that the restraining order had not been filed at the time of the alleged contempt.

A CONVENTION HALL FOR SAN FRANCISCO.

A movement is actively launched to provide by private enterprise backed by popular subscription of the necessary stock, an auditorium, or convention hall, for San Francisco, large enough to accommodate the biggest national conventions. The movement is organized by men of unquestioned integrity and large business experience, with the following board of directors: Joseph F. Forrester, president; Forrester Cornice Works; Will L. Greenbaum, impresario and theatrical director; A. J. Carmany, manager Title Insurance and Guaranty Co.; Frank P. Sheldon (Mark Sheldon Co.), capitalist; John D. Wilson, proprietor Hotel El Drisco; Samuel F. Weeks, president Weeks Howe-Emerson Co.; Chas. E. Naylor, attorney-at-law.

The California Weekly takes pleasure in calling to the attention of its readers the following excerpts from the statements published by San Francisco Auditorium Association, and commending investment in its stock as a matter of local patriotism entirely justifiable for anyone who is willing to sacrifice, if need be, the amount of money he subscribes to such patriotism—an investment which, though unapt to show any direct re-

WILSON leaned back in his chair and blew smoke rings at the gaudy chandelier of the hanging oil lamp, while the dealer shuffled the cards and little Maddox borrowed ten red chips from his pile. Wilson never was good at poker and often wondered, rather aimlessly, why he should play; but Maddox, who was unluckier still, paused for no doubts, but "sat in" every night with a savage desire to buck fortune until he made her smile. He was slight and short and red-headed and freckled; and those who did not call him Red Maddox, from the fire of his hair, had seen him play poker and called him Mad Maddox.

Wilson, per contra, was calm. His eyes and his hair were black, and his thin, shadowy face was gravely handsome. One could not imagine Maddox making a bluff successfully, and he did not try. It was Wilson's one art in the game. He had a good "poker face," and as poker judgment goes his judgment was good; but luck seemed to balk at giving him cards. "Red" and "Bill" were friends.

Tonight's game was no worse than the usual run, but somehow it palled upon Wilson, and he tossed his cigar to the floor and spoke to the dealer.

"By me on this deal, Mart. Credit Red with my chips and I'll go out for a stroll. Hot, ain't it? Well, good night, boys."

"Hot?" rasped Martin, the dealer, as the swinging doors of the "Commercial" had let Wilson out into the night. "What does a buckaroo expect of a greaser town of the name o' Caliente, meannin' hot?"

"Mebbe he was a referin' to the landscape to his left about where Mr. Maddox is a-settin'," drawled a Tennessean across the table. "No reflections, suh, upon yuh admirable charactah, suh, other than the natural perfection of yoh col'd hyahr upon ouh friendly faces, suh."

"Four cards," was Red's sole response, his eyes following the deftly thrown pieces of pasteboard intently as they fell before him.

"I have said worse looking objects than Nevada, jest the same, and hotter, too," remarked the bartender, who was watching the game.

"Air you a Presbyterian?" asked the other member of the group about the table, who came from Missouri.

"The gentleman's anything but a Baptist, suh; he can't no watah, suh, but —" and so the dialogue ran on as the cards flashed and the chips changed from pile to pile.

Outside, Wilson pulled off his sombrero and carried it in his hand as he sauntered down the one street of Caliente, "meannin' hot." The street was only a couple of blocks long, paralleling the railroad track a few rods away. There were two stores, a barber shop, and ten saloons on Front street. Only the saloons and barber shop were lighted; business was dull in all but the Commercial; the barber was drunk, and asleep in his solitary chair. On the hillside back of town a few scattered lights winked brightly from residences; and in the station a dull lamp cast rays of light on the green grass at the end of the switch. An engine in the roundhouse sneezed and puffed, softly. The overland was nearly due.

Wilson dropped his eyes from the mercifully moonlit hills and walked toward the station through the black shadow of the row of cottonwood trees that are the pride of the town. His pony whinnied to him as he passed, and he stepped over to her for a moment to pat her nose and loosen the cinch a little more. Red's horse sniffed at him familiarly from the next tree.

At the ticket window he dropped his hat on the ledge and rested his elbows beside it, smiling broadly at the agent's daughter, who sat by her father near the telegraph key. "Evenin', Miss Lucy. Howdy, Birch. Train on time?"

"Nup. Hou'n a half late—as usual."

"Unusual, you mean. Two hours'n a half's usual, ain't it?"

"Jest as you say. Lord knows, I ain't responsible for train time," and Birch turned again to his key.

"Take a ride, Miss Lucy? It's cooler'n sittin' in there. I'll lend you Red's horse."

UNLUCKY AT CARDS

BY

E. FRENCH STROTHER

"Don't care if I do. Dad, I'll be back by the time No. 2 gets in."

"Look sharp ye do, now."

Lucy came out smiling and walked with Wilson to the horses, deftly cinched Red's saddle and swung lightly astride, refusing all proffered assistance. They rode together out into the white moonlight, and struck an easy lope to the west.

"Where's Red?" inquired Lucy.

"Holdin' a business confab with some friends at the Commercial," was Wilson's reply.

"Holdin' a bob-tail flush 'gainst a full house, more likely," Lucy retorted, and then laughed aloud.

"Nope, that was me. That's the reason I quit."

"Well, I like that, now. That's the reason you wanted my company for a ride, is it? I'm goin' home."

Lucy wheeled her horse in his tracks, but Wilson's mare neatly blocked the back path. Lucy swung her quirt sharply and headed Red's pony into the open, Wilson hot in pursuit, shouting warnings of chuck holes and Lucy laughing joyously as they sped down a hillside toward a dark canyon. The chase became a game of tag as Wilson drove the girl's horse up the narrowing hollow, until, fairly cornered in the end of the canyon, Lucy drew rein and Wilson quieted his plunging mustang beside her, both laughing like children.

"Git back on the road, chile," ordered Wilson, and the ponies toiled back up the hillside. On the road again they walked slowly westward.

"What were we talkin' about when your pony went loco?" Lucy innocently asked him.

"Poker, I'm thinkin', and my luck at it."

"Taint as bad as Red's, is it?"

"Well, I reckon ain't nobody quite's unlucky as Red is. But I'm a mighty close second. Mebbe if I was as everlastingly bound and determined to see how unlucky I could be I could be worse."

"He plays the limit, don't he?"

"All he c'n beg, borrow, or steal."

"Same as he plays everything else, ain't it?"

"You bet! 'All same bluff pup,' as ole Ling says. Red 'n me've been partners ten years in the Circle T outfit and he's fought her through drought and cloudbursts and fever and every other fool thing when I jest wanted to throw up the sponge and let the thing slide. He's thorough, you bet. 'P he's goin' to win he wants to win solid, and if it's bust he's bound he'll bust flat. He's goin' to the bottom of anything that he tackles. I reckon he's bound for the top in his business, all right, but he's shorely unlucky at cards."

"Unlucky at cards, lucky in love," they do say," said Lucy to the stars.

Wilson drew his horse close to her and leaned towards her.

"That's what I've heard, and I wanted to know if it's true; if it wasn't a sign I could follow. It struck me tonight when I drew to a flush and caught a deuce pair that mebbe love was a waitin' out here on the mesa with you. That's what I meant when I said that my luck sent me out here. You said it yourself, Lucy: 'unlucky at cards, lucky at love.' My hand's on the table: what's your cards—dear?"

Lucy swung her quirt idly.

"I was thinkin' of Red when I said it," she answered.

"Red? Red! You don't mean it, Lucy. Him? Why he'd ride a five mile to dodge any woman on earth. He don't want you."

"Who said that he did?" Lucy hotly retorted. "Who'd have him if he did?" But, she added, more softly, "he's unluckier at cards than you are, you said. And if he did want anybody, wouldn't he want 'em a heap harder than you do, and fight harder to get 'em and play the game to the limit? Ain't you as good as said that? I can't do it, anyway, Bill. And I'm sorry; but let's talk about cattle. What's that?"

Clearly across the desert the long whistle of the overland.

"She's makin' up time. We'll have to get back," cried Lucy. "I'll race you."

The ponies wheeled and stretched low as their hoof beats struck a staccato rhythm. Wilson rode by her in silence as they sped down the canyon. As they turned toward the station, into the homestretch, Lucy whirled her quirt and broke into the Indian racing cry. Wilson, silent, unsmiling. Back to the cottonwood shadows, drawing rein sharply, the horses plowed the dirt with braided haunches, and a cloud of dust rose to the moonlight.

"Beat you!" cried Lucy, dismounting and handing the reins to Wilson. "Thanks for the ride."

"What you said about cards ain't a show-down, is it, Lucy?"

"Please don't let's talk any more about that. Only let's understand each other: it wasn't a lie. I am awfully sorry, Bill, but that's honest."

When Wilson reentered the Commercial the air was hotter and closer and heavy with smoke. The group he had left still sat at the table, but no one was looting as when he had left them. Each man gripped his hand tightly, stared at it intently and swore as five drew cards or tossed chips. The limit was off and the pots were big ones. At the edge of his chair sat Mad Maddox, earning his nickname, his red hair and red freckles in vivid contrast with his skin's pallor. He was winning at last, and as he had lost, so useful of battle. Wilson spoke directly to him:

"C'n I sit in again?"

"Give him chips," Red called to the dealer. "Credit him double he left me. It's our killin', Bill. Sure in."

"Cross yoh luck, yoh mean, yoh red-headed limb o' Satan," growled the Tennessean.

"Never mind, Johnny. Pards is pards, and I'll chance it."

"Raise you ten," added Wilson, as he picked up his draw.

"And ten," said Missouri.

"Twenty better," growled Martin, the dealer.

Red's face went livid with anger.

"Bible stakes, you! It's lust or a killin'! Show 'em down!"

Wilson had nothing—a bluff that failed: Tennessee a four flush; Missouri a pair of aces; Martin a straight, king high; Maddox, four kings. Wilson's gun flashed to the table, his face graver and whiter, but his voice was deliberate.

"Something's rotten here, Martin," Red, turn his king over I thought, red back in a blue deck. Swipe 'em in, Maddox. Easy there, you—"

The room was in darkness, the lamp shot to splinters. Wilson reached for little Maddox and hurled him through the door to the street outside and turned to the darkness where red spouts of flame leaped from the other's guns, and opened fire, Maddox, without, madly trying to get back to his side and Wilson blocking his return with his back to the door. Suddenly he was thrown to the floor as the door was hurled open, the Circle T outfit, with Maddox in front, crashing in. In a moment there was silence and Red struck a light. Martin was dead, by the table, and Wilson lay prone near the door. The others were gone.

Red bent his ear to Wilson's lips where the slightest breath fluttered.

"Missouri and Tenn weren't to blame, Red. And let Lucy I played the game."

Miss Jessie Shirley and her company established a record at the Auditorium Theater, Spokane, where they recently completed an engagement of 210 consecutive weeks.

The new copyright law which has just gone into effect extends the protection on books fourteen years, making the period fifty-six years instead of forty-two as heretofore.

Harry Leon Wilson and Booth Tarkington, authors of the very successful "The Man From Home," are busy putting the finishing touches to four plays, one for Mabel Taliaferro, another for Madge Carr Cook, the third for Ottis Skinner, and "Foreign Exchange," which the Lieblers will produce.

The Siamese twins, of famous museum memory, married Virginia women and their children have remained in the South. All have prospered, though nearly all of them were born deaf. The youngest son of twin Chang was recently killed by lightning in North Carolina, at the age of forty-eight years.

The Countess of Aberdeen, now in America to preside over the quinquennial of the international council of women at Toronto, had to leave her husband, the earl, at home. It is unwritten law that a former governor-general of Canada shall never return, as he would have to take an inferior rank to that which belonged to his office.

The man who originated the "remnant sale" and the idea of giving toy balloons to the children of his customers was Alfred Chauchano, who died, a multi-millionaire merchant, in Paris a few weeks ago. He began life as a clerk at $5 a month. He spent nearly $2,000,000 on oil paintings. His superstitious weakness led him to carry a horse chestnut and two potatoes in his pockets all his life.

Little Ting C. Chen, one of the two Chinese boys who graduated from West Point last month, has the honor of being not only one of the "five immortals" of the class of 1909, but "the goat." In other words he graduated at the foot of the class. A number of famous soldiers set him the example. Gen. Custer, who stood at the foot of his class, said that "it was a sight harder to graduate at that end than at the other."

Peers, judges, practicing lawyers, clergymen, teachers, doctors, officers of the army and navy in active service, customs officers, pilots, and Court officials are exempt.

Duties and Powers of Grand Jury.

When the Grand Jury has been summoned by the sheriff it is instructed on the subject of its inquiries by a charge from the bench; they then withdraw and hold sessions to receive the indictments which are preferred to them. They only hear evidence on behalf of the prosecution. In common cases of felony and misdemeanor an officer known as the "Clerk of Indictments" prepares the proper indictments from the depositions that have been returned to the Court by the committing magistrate; sometimes the indictment is framed by a barrister or Crown-draftsman, in which case the Clerk of Indictments only passes upon them, receiving his fee as if he had drawn it. Under Lord Chief Justice Campbell a useful measure of criminal reform was introduced in England of which the main scope is to abate the strictness of legal forms and phraseology; it abolishes the technical descriptions necessary in indictments for murder, forgery, etc., and gives power to the Court to amend variances not material to the merits of the issue or fair trial of the accused.

On the back of the indictment the names of the witnesses for the prosecution are written, and the persons attending before the Grand Jury to give evidence may be sworn and examined, the foreman writing his initials opposite the name of each witness so sworn and whose name is endorsed on the bill of indictment.

When the Grand Jury have heard the evidence for the prosecution, if they think the accusation groundless, they write on the back of the bill "Not found" or "Not a true bill" and then the prisoner is discharged. A new indictment, however, may afterwards be preferred to a subsequent Grand Jury.

If the Grand Jury be satisfied of the truth of the accusation they endorse upon it "A true bill" and the party stands indicted. The indictment is then to be found; but to find a bill at least twelve of the jury must concur.

To prevent vexatious indictments no bill for perjury, or several other offenses, can be presented to a Grand Jury unless the person presenting the same or making the accusation charges that the offense has been committed in England, that the accused is in custody or has been bound over to appear and answer, or unless such indictment be preferred by the direction, or with the consent in writing, of a judge of one of the Superior Courts or of the Attorney General or by the Public Prosecutor.

Prosecution Upon "Information."

There is another mode of carrying on a criminal process without the intervention of the Grand Jury: namely, by "Information" in the name of the King or jointly at the suit of the King and of the prosecuting witness. The latter is usually upon penal statute and is a sort of "qui tam" action; that is, an action prosecuted on a penal statute for the recovery of a penalty (part of which usually goes to the informer) and which is carried on only by a criminal instead of a civil process. In such cases the customs and excise officers or other authority, under the direction and control of the commissioners, supply their own forms of information, summons, warrants, etc., for which of course they are responsible.

The Attorney General can also file informations ex-officio against such offenders as disturb the Government in any case where delay in convicting and punishing might be dangerous.

Safeguards Against Delay.

In prosecutions by the Crown for misdemeanor, whether by "Information" or "Indictment," a copy of the Information or Indictment must be delivered to the defendant, and if the Attorney General do not bring the issue to trial within one year after the plea of not guilty, the Court may, on defendant's application, on twenty days' notice, bring the case to trial.

No indictment or information is altered by any dilatory plea of misnomer or wrong addition if the Court be satisfied of the truth of the plea; in such case the Court immediately orders the indictment to be amended and calls upon the accused to plead as if no such dilatory plea had been made.

The Arraignment.

To continue the process: Whether the procedure be by the finding of the Grand Jury or by Information the next step in the prosecution is the "arraignment" of the accused; that is, the calling him to the Bar of the Court to answer the charge against him. Unless there be danger of an escape, he must be brought to the Bar without letters or bonds and the Clerk of Arraigns calls upon him, by name, to hold up his hand. By holding up his hand he admits himself to be of the name by which he is called. The indictment is then read to him and the Clerk asks "Are you guilty of this felony of which you stand indicted, or not guilty?"

Excited Lady (who has been annoyed by drunken gentleman next to her): Conductor, are drunken people allowed in here? Conductor: 'Sh! That's all right, mum. Sit down quietly. Nobody'll notice yer.—The Tatler.

It was a spectacular put-out and bleachers and grand stand cheered vociferously. The young lady signified her approval by clapping her hands. "You begin to see the fine points, eh?" said the man. A regiment of soldiers were at camp and a young Scottish recruit was put on sentry outside the general's tent. In the morning the general rose, looked out of his tent and said to the young man in a stern and loud voice: "Who are you?" The young man turned around smartly and said: "Fine; hoo's yerself?"—Tit-Bits.

One of the wittiest instances of spontaneous parliamentary repartee was furnished a few years since by Swift MacNeill. A former member for Islington had asserted, in the course of a debate, that he represented the densest constituency in the whole of London. A natural selection exclaimed the member for South Donegal.—London Chronicle.

My next book is contracted for. The publisher has just forwarded a check on account. I am to receive 20 per cent. royalties besides. It is already being advertised. When the train stopped at the little Southern station the northern tourist sauntered out on the platform. Under a scrub oak stood a lean animal with scraggy bristles. The tourist was interested. "What do you call that?" he queried of a lanky native. "Razorback hawg." "Well, what is he doing rubbing against that tree?" "He's stropping himself, jest stropping himself."—Success.

"Bill had charge of the animal team," said Mr. Ringling, "and among his pets was a leopard. This leopard gave Bill more trouble than all the rest of the menagerie put together. One day when I had left the show on some advance business, a telegram was handed to me. It was from Bill and read: 'The leopard has escaped. What shall I do?' That was just like Bill. He didn't want to make a mistake. I immediately wired back to Bill: 'Shoot him on the spot.' Two hours later I received another telegram from conscientious, careful Bill: 'Which spot?'—Success.

One of the young architects who delivered a lecture on modern architecture in the series of free public school lectures in New York had just shown his audience the beauties of the Cologne cathedral the other night, when he thought of an experience he once had on a similar occasion. "It was at the conclusion of my lecture," he told his audience, "that a woman came to me, explained that she, too, was a student of architecture, and thanked me for enlightening her on one point that she had never been able to understand before. 'I have always wondered,' she said to me, 'where the colonial style of architecture came from. Now, of course, I see that it comes from Cologne.'"—New York Sun.

A Commendation That Counts.

The California Weekly,
26 Montgomery Street,
San Francisco, Cal.

Gentlemen: Enclosed please find my check for $10, for which send your magazine, one copy to me, S. D. Thatcher, and one copy to the Boyd Club, both at Groves, Northhoff, and both for three years. I am anxious to make this slight contribution to so excellent an offering. You are offering me the California the novel experience of reading news and comment that they may rely upon as truthful, honest, and high minded. For the first time in twenty years I feel that it is possible for me to take an intelligent interest in California politics, for I have never before felt that I could find out any facts about them.

Yours very truly,

SHERMAN D. THACHER.

Northhoff, Cal., June 17, 1909.

The foregoing is a kind of commendation that counts. The Staff appreciates it. This paper was started on the assumption that there are ten thousand heads of families in California who, if they can be found and The California Weekly can be brought to their favorable notice, will feel toward it as Mr. Thacher does. We have not found them yet. Any help that can be extended us toward finding them will be thankfully appreciated. Perhaps as affective a way as any would be to enclose us twenty-five cents with an address for a five-weeks' trial subscription or, better still, fifty cents for a thirteen weeks' trial subscription, by which time the recipient would be almost certain to so enter into the spirit of the paper and repose in it confidence as to wish to become a permanent patron of it. If one can help in no other way, we send us a list of persons with addresses whom he thinks might, could, would or should be interested in the paper that we may take the subject up with him. This paper aims to be dependent upon its friends, and not upon any man's millions, for its success.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

How Civil Rights May Be Lost.

No person shall be a senator or representative in Congress, or a member of the President or Vice-President, or hold any office civil or military, under the United States or any state, who having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress or as an officer of the United States, or as a senator or representative in Congress, or as a judge, executive or judicial officer of any state to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each house, remove such disability.

This, the third section of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, has little more than a retrospective and academic interest to the children of this generation, but to the men of four and forty years ago it presented a crucial issue.

There had been a great war, one of the greatest in all human history. The men who brought on that war were held to be culpable, and so they were, clear back to the time when a Dutch brig landed at Jamestown, but what was to be done with them? Those who had proven themselves "invincible in peace and invisible in war" demanded that they be punished, or, at least, deprived of civil rights while they lived. To punish so great a mass was palpably impossible. Had they proven irreconcilable the war could have been carried on, in guerilla fashion, until the present time. Therefore it occurred to some of the more far-sighted at the North that, inasmuch as the men of the South, lately in arms against their country, could not all be punished it might not be a bad idea to forgive them their iniquities and take them back into the national fold.

This was speedily done except as to the proscribed classes above enumerated, and Congress finally removed all disabilities growing out of the war, since which time the real work of restoration of the union may be said to have begun. Of all troublesome persons in any community the man without a country, the man who is governed but cannot participate in government, is likely to prove about the worst.

The greatest victory achieved by General Ulysses S. Grant was achieved at Appomattox court house when he ordered the surrendered Confederate soldiers to take home with them the horses they had ridden to enable them to put in their crops. He captured the hearts of his enemies as well as their munitions of war.

The greatest victory the North won over the South was in the removal of political disabilities from the men of the South whether or not they had previously taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and the greatest humiliation the North endured was not the first battle of Bull Run, but the reconstruction period during which the spirit of politics and graceless adventure held the Southern States of the Union in the grasp of rapacity that they might be impoverished for the advantage of adventurers. While the ku-klux regime cannot be excused it was not an unnatural outgrowth of abominable conditions and as such should have been foreseen and provided against by Northern statesmanship.

Another fact the history of this amendment proved: The life of a nation, as the life of an individual, is not long enough to justify the harboring of malice.

It would have been better had the third section of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States been left out of that amendment. It served no good purpose and worked much harm north and south. There should be some good way of expunging it from the record, but it is there and there to stay. The only justification for it is the truth that those were times when passion held sway over reason and when it was thought more patriotic to hate enemies than to meet them half way in an effort at reconciliation.

It will be noted from a careful reading of the section that the almost unforgivable offense, in the eyes of this amendment, was to engage in physical rebellion or to give aid and comfort to those in such physical rebellion against the government, and well may all hope and fervently pray that the ugly monster of rebellion may never again thrust up its loathsome head in our nation; yet it may be doubted if physical, overt rebellion is the greatest crime that can be committed against a state. Whoever would debauch, degrade or usurp the power of government, in his own selfish interest, is the greater and more dangerous enemy of the two and of these the country has not been without numerous examples in recent years. If such as these could somehow be placed under political proscription and disability it might be to some purpose for they are more dangerous enemies to our institutions than those who take up arms against them.

turns, is certain to be of great benefit to the city as an advertisement. "Kansas City, Mo., has a splendid convention hall, built with the money received from the sale to its patriotic and public-spirited citizens of shares of the capital stock of a corporation formed for that purpose. There are eight thousand shareholders in that corporation, people of moderate means holding ten shares and upwards, while the merchants, brokers, bankers, and other people of means subscribed for and held from five thousand to sixteen thousand shares each.

"That Convention Hall is recognized as the ideal building for the purposes to which a large auditorium is devoted, including national conventions, district conventions and meetings, state conventions, horse shows, cat shows, dog shows, skating, military drills, and poultry shows, food exhibits, dancing, flower shows, large dramatic and operatic performances, commercial exhibits, carnivals, concerts, public meetings, religious services, and athletic contests, and is, in fact, the people's auditorium, where every kind of legitimate entertainment, exhibition, and amusement may be given and enjoyed.

"This building was completely destroyed by fire and rebuilt in three months' time by the use of money subscribed a second time by its citizens in order to be in readiness for a national political convention. The total cost of the building was about four hundred thousand dollars each time. And this sum was subscribed purely in the shape of contributions for the general good and not in the expectation or hope of direct profit in the shape of dividends, although it has paid very well.

"The plans, which have been practically decided upon, provide for a Class A building 275 feet long by 220 feet wide, and following generally the Kansas City Convention Hall model, but of a somewhat better shape and with new and attractive features. All upper portions of the structure, including the balcony seats, will be reached by inclines instead of stairs, so arranged that the entire building can be emptied in five minutes without trouble or confusion. The cost will be about $400,000.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a truly electric telephone that fits on the ear, which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds.

It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and, also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

Our Task the Most Difficult.

In the course of his Fourth of July oration Mr. Walter Macarthur gave expression to a truth which, if it somehow reach the inner consciousness of our citizenry, would compensate the nation for all the casualties of the day, however they may terminate. It is that popular government is the most difficult of all forms of government to maintain, that there is no alchemy in its making, no innate tendency toward self-perpetuation in its higher forms. And he might have added that there is no Providence to stand betwixt a republic and the consequences of its own conduct. It reaps as it sows, every harvest after its own kind. Those who fail of participation in the functions of free government will be first ignored and finally disfranchised, and government will fall into the hands either of the few who fight the people's battles for them, or into the hands of the equally few who exercise the functions of government for their own advantage and the people's irremediable hurt. It was a hard task which our forefathers set for us, and when we come to give an account to posterity for our stewardship, what then?

The British Bench and Bar.

Those who have found the English distinction between attorneys and barristers a bit confusing, and who have not any too well understood the British bench, will be greatly helped by our second article on "England's Better Criminal Procedure," which appears in this issue. While we regret our inability to divulge the authorship of these articles we unhesitatingly pledge the faith of the paper to the fact that the writer of them knows wherever he speaks, as, indeed, the articles themselves bear evidence.

It will be noted that the salaries paid British judges, together with the continuity in office, and pensions on retirement, make the judicial position attractive to men of the finest legal powers, while the contrary is commonly true with us. There are lawyers in San Francisco who receive a single fee greater than a year's salary for a judge of the superior court.

While the British judiciary, in point of appointment, is not as non-partisan as many had supposed, yet, as the author points out, the security of position, the requirements of public sentiment and the expectations of the whole judicial and legal fraternity combine to make the judge as impartial as possible.

Finally, the British system of discipline for attorneys and barristers is far more effective than anything we know. With us one must have made his name so infamous as already to have disqualified him for getting business, in order that he shall be forbidden to do business as attorney-at-law, by which time the proceeding of disbarment is equivalent to the performance of the rites suitable only for those already dead.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

Standard Oil company ought to be treated differently from other citizens. The citizenship of Standard Oil ought to be open to serious question, as to fact as well as to quality. It was never the intent of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States to confer upon any corporation all the rights, powers and immunities enjoyed by citizens, and the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, that the Southern Pacific Railroad company was, under that amendment, a person of color, was an absurdity. In writing that opinion of the court, Justice Stephen J. Field performed an act of harmfulness that all the good he ever did will not atone for. Some day that decision will have to be reversed and creatures of legislative creation, no matter how great, be made less in the contemplation of the law than creatures made by Almighty God, in his own image, no matter how humble.

After Nine Years.

We have not found a way of determining how a public service corporation may best be paid for its services to the public. It was recognized that if the power to fix prices for service were conferred solely on the corporation extortion would usually be practiced, and that if the consumers were to be free to pay what they were minded to pay they might not pay a reasonable recompense, so the best thing seemed to be to give the city council, or board of supervisors, power annually to fix rates subject only to judicial interference if the rates fixed should prove confiscatory. The results of this device have been surprising. The public service corporations quite generally went into politics to secure the election of governments representative of such corporations rather than of the consuming public, and graft grew. If, however, rates of compensation did prove unsatisfactory to the public service corporations an appeal was made to the courts with results satisfactory to the corporations inasmuch as decisions were seldom or never rendered. The case of Oakland vs. the Contra Costa Water company affords an example. After nine years of litigation the Supreme Court of California has rendered a decision sustaining the action of a city council long since out of office, relative to the charges of a corporation no longer furnishing water and requiring that the case be begun all over again. Some principles have been laid down that may be of service in future cases of the kind, but as for this one the best, and only, practical thing to do is to forget it. The right kind of a proceeding should have determined that issue once for all in half a year.

If the People Would Be Fair.

Mr. C. Norman Fay, a former public service corporation manager, in Chicago, has lately completed a series of interesting articles, in the New York Outlook, giving a resume of his experiences and observations in dealing with the public, public service companies, politicians and grafters. The conclusion he reaches is that "if the People will but be fair to capital it will serve them better than they can serve themselves."

The California Weekly heartily concurs with this conclusion, with the reservation that the phrase "will serve" be stricken out and in its place be substituted either "may," "can," "might," "could" or "should" serve. There is no certainty that it "will," "must" or "would." Therein lies the difficulty of the people being fair toward capital. It is the predatory conduct of capital that affords the opportunity for agitators, grafters, sensational newspapers and the whole pack of hounds that go baying upon the track of public service corporations. It is not once in a hundred times that where capital, so invested, strives to be fair toward the people the people are unfair toward capital. But, when the people find government subverted, extortion practiced, graft employed or blackmail submitted to, they become angry and when men are angry, singly or by cities, states and nations, they are generally unfair. That private or corporate capital can serve the public better than the public can serve itself only a municipal ownership enthusiast will deny but, whether or not capital does so serve depends upon whether or not it makes service, or exploitation, its essential object. The people are not as prone to be unreasonable as associated capital is to be predatory.

Los Angeles is striving hard to annex San Pedro, notwithstanding the fact that the Southern Pacific company had annexed it long ago, converted its harbor into a bottle and all but got a stopper into the bottle. San Pedro's greatness depends upon Los Angeles' success, for it is only by having a great municipality make common cause with it that that port can be delivered out of bondage.

The recent census of Cuba shows 2,480,980 persons resident within the islands, of which 69.72 per cent. are classed as white and 30.28 as colored. It will be noted that these figures make no allowance for that twilight zone of color that contributes so much to the interest of Cuban society.

THE DESTRUCTION OF INITIATIVE.

Nothing else would lead to anarchy so speedily and certainly as socialism, and nothing else would lead to socialism so speedily and certainly as anarchy. In either case reaction would compel the antipodal result. Each would destroy itself. The same is true regarding individualism. An exaggerated individualism is anarchy, and we in America have an individualism of a pronounced if not of an exaggerated type. It is producing socialism with a rapidity that is appalling. It is causing the spirit of socialism to grow in every other breast.

But what concerns us most is the peril in which the initiative is being placed by this unfortunate tendency. The pride of American life has been its self reliance and its power of initiative. On these two related human qualities we have built our republic and have conquered a continent. In their defense we have set our faces resolutely against socialism in nearly all its forms, and yet our exaggerated individualism, our unregulated freedom for master minds to work their wills as they may, is destroying initiative and self reliance speedily and as certainly as socialism could.

Former President Roosevelt, in a recent article in the New York Outlook, has pointed this fact out more clearly, perhaps, than anyone else. Great combinations of capital have set all our workers to working for some one else. There are few, aside from farmers and small shop keepers, who are any longer self-directing. All the rest go to work when some one else rings a bell, and if no bell rings there is no work for them to go to. No other condition could be so destructive of self-reliance and initiative, and our captains of industry are furthering the tendency with a zeal worthy of a better cause.

Let it be remembered that our great combinations of capital are still mainly in the hands of the big men who organized them. When they are gone who will take their places? Unless history belies itself no one will. Their places will remain unfilled, but in those places will grow up a dead-timber bureaucracy as paralyzing as any form of socialism ever invented, as inert as red tape ever made government. An exaggerated individualism is producing an exaggerated concentration for the elimination of that competition which is at once the soul of individualism and the terror of socialism. Our great individualists are our great socialists, and they are doing what they would not do with a rapidity tenfold greater than the most sanguine socialists could hope to accomplish of themselves. They are "bringing all the means of production and all the means of distribution," to the door of state socialism, or precisely what state socialism consists in is the taking over by government of those means of production and distribution.

We have accepted our modern tendency toward concentration of commerce and industry as inevitable. Is it so? Can we not, by taking thought, recover for the benefit of our children that opportunity for developing self-reliance and initiative which made us Americans what we are? Are we fatalists that we must meet this problem with a kismet?

THE FORGOTTEN MAN.

The stupid, insane shot, the crumpling of Carolina Brasch's knees under her, her sinking to the floor in death agony, the coming forward of James Cunningham to confess his crime (because another had been arrested and charged with a crime which he himself had committed), his stolid, unfeeling, narration of the incidents of the tragedy and the train of circumstances that had led up to it—these things should not fade from the public mind like a tale that is told, like a dream that is forgotten before the day is half gone. At the bottom of this tragedy there is a wrong to be righted and a sociological fact of great significance to be taken into serious account.

In the ranks of unskilled labor, and especially that kind of unskilled labor that is employed in gangs, there are thousands of honest, worthy and fairly intelligent men, men who, from one cause or another, have not acquired a higher earning capacity, have not been able to found a family or to acquire a home; but there are also in these ranks the dregs of human incapacity, the criminal, the insane, the stupid, the bestial, as dangerous an element as afflicts society anywhere save at the top, where criminality is re-enforced by capacity and the wanderlust is transformed into love for hazard.

This body of humanity is unorganized and incoherent. Its wrongs are suffered in common but resisted in severity if at all. Aggressions upon it have hitherto been regarded as safe and men of low courage have been unafraid to practice it. The only knowledge the ordinary citizen has of this class of fellow mortals is that gained from seeing them doing work that he would not wish to do under conditions that would be intolerable. Being around the bottom of the industrial ladder, there is generally a crowd of such workers straggling from the employment office to the job. It is customary for employment agencies to charge $2 for getting each job for such a man as Cunningham, and for the contractor or foreman to receive one of these dollars for making places for the job hunters, though often by the ruse of discharging employed men, without other cause, after a few days' service, if the labor market be over supplied.

As a form labor this Cunningham type is particularly exasperating. It is irresponsible to a degree, has a low efficiency and the nearest saloon is not only its club, but also its banker, its plunderer of what is left it by its employer, when it is paid, but its friend when the day laborer needs one to stand him upon his feet and steer him for another job.

This is a socially forgotten man, by all who should remember him, save when, by the commission of some atrocity, he jars the social consciousness into a knowledge of his existence. Yet he it is who can be colonized by the Ruefs of all cities in the wards where his vote can be cast to the greatest injury to the common good, and in his hands may easily rest the balance of power betwixt good and evil government. If the shot that laid Carolina Brasch low shall rouse public sentiment to take cognizance of this socially forgotten man, that we may remember that the solidarity of society includes him also, that he has wrongs to be righted and needs friends to defend him, that he may not undertake stupidly to redress his own grievances, that young life may not have been offered as a vain sacrifice for our having forgotten our brother who needs to be remembered rather more than any other.

THE TWO PIVOTAL POINTS.

In what appears to be a sincere effort to justify its recent justification of the jury which failed of convicting Mr. Calhoun, the San Bernardino Sun affirms that the two salient features, or pivotal points, upon which the case must turn are these: The determination of who was the principal villain in this municipal drama, and, the condition of San Francisco when the trolley franchise was granted.

If The California Weekly, in considering the contentions of the Sun, ventures to thresh over old straw, it is because it accepts those contentions as being sincerely advanced and recognizes the importance to San Francisco of having the interior of the state set right whenever, by mistaking an outward seeming for an essential truth, it has been set wrong.

The Sun proclaims Abe Ruef to have been the principal and original villain and the condition of San Francisco, at the time the trolley franchise was granted, as an abundant excuse for Mr. Calhoun's submitting to the extortions of the villain in the interests of the public.

Abe Ruef was and is unscrupulous, ambitious and able, and he had a money lust that seemed insatiate; but he did not hold up the gas company, telephone companies, the United Railroads or Mr. Calhoun. Mr. Calhoun's attorneys have repeatedly and vociferously disclaimed any such hold-up.

San Francisco was held up and was the only party to the entire transaction that was held up. The hold-up men were the ones who were indicted for bribery and they represented great public service corporations the flotation of whose watered stocks for the mulcting of the public required franchises and special privileges at the hands of the government of San Francisco. That these valuable franchises and privileges might be obtained the predatory representatives of these predatory corporations entered into a conspiracy with Abe Ruef to capture and hold the government of San Francisco and, to that end, made common cause with Ruef to elect and re-elect Eugene Schmitz mayor, well knowing that the Schmitz-Ruef administration would, for a gratuity, do the things these corporation promoters wanted to have done.

Patrick Calhoun and the great corporation he represented were part and parcel with the other associated villains, and Abe Ruef was not the original, designing, malevolent villain. He was and is a miserable scoundrel, but he was an accessory and not a principal, a purveyor and not a dispenser, a lieutenant and not a captain, a go-between and not a chief, a convenient tool and not a master. And he received retainers in advance of the induction into office of his boodle board. Note that!

It was not so much the condition of San Francisco at the time of the granting of the trolley franchise as its supposed condition that disposed the people to grant that franchise. It was not generally known then, as it has become known since, that the cable lines could have been easily and quickly rehabilitated, but Calhoun and his associates knew it then. They wanted the franchise because it put not less than $10,000,000 into the value of their watered securities, and they paid the $200,000 to Ruef because that was the way they did business. It was by that means that they had been able to create and maintain city governments. By tossing a gratuity into the political corruption fund they were able to procure a bonanza.

This corrupt system is nation-wide and more than a third of a century old. The only way to break up that system is to put the principal villains into prison. Mr. Calhoun is a principal villain. There are a dozen others. San Francisco is fighting the battle of the republic, and in fighting that battle it wants the intelligent aid, not injurious apologies, of every interior newspaper, including the San Bernardino Sun.

UP TO THE VOTERS STRAIGHT.

It is unfortunate that party politics must enter into a city campaign, but it is with us and we must make the best of it. At the election in November party will count for relatively little, but at the primaries, it will count for much. The first test of San Francisco manhood, then, will be made at the primary election. Let that test be made straight.

On the part of the Municipal League of Republican Clubs the issue has been made straight. In the person of Byron Mauzy a candidacy is offered the rank and file of the Republican Party that calls for no explanation and no apology. Mr. Mauzy ever has stood, and still stands, for a government that is both free and clean. He has fought long and hard to make the Republican party a free party and San Francisco a free city and back of him, prompting his candidacy, are a number of gentlemen like-minded with himself, men who are working hard to vindicate the reputation of San Francisco wheresoever that reputation may extend.

An opposing candidacy is being offered Republican voters of San Francisco, a perfectly legitimate and proper proceeding and, fortunately also, what this candidacy will stand for is as apparent as though avowed through trumpets. The men behind the Crocker movement are "organization" Republicans, and no one with eye teeth cut requires to be told what "organization," as applied to Republican politics, means in this state and this city. It means the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau with the facile hands of Mr. Herrin and his handy men in control. It means that the great Southern Pacific corporation, and affiliated corporations, who are in politics for the special privileges they can get and the special immunities they can enjoy, are in this campaign to remain until the end. It means the installation of a city government whose mouth-piece will be the Globe-gorged Evening Post, whose main purpose will be the discontinuance of the graft prosecutions at the first opportunity, and the letting of predatory rascals go untried, unconvicted and as nearly unblemished as a technical vindication can make them.

It is always part of such a program to mask batteries behind a pleasing and popular personality such as that of Mr. William Crocker. To do otherwise would be to court defeat, but whoever the candidates may be the issue can hardly be less clear than here stated. It is proper to put this issue up to Republicans of San Francisco. The 17th of August is as good a day as any for taking the measure of their manhood. It is good to measure manhood, to note its growth or its decadence. It is stimulating. It lets us know what manner of people we are. By making a remeasuring of Republican manhood possible the gentlemen behind the alleged "Business Men's" Republican movement have performed a meritorious public service.

The Secondary Boycott.

The Supreme Court of California has legalized and legitimized the doctrine of vicarious suffering for the bad conduct of others. It has held that, so that only legal means of inflicting punishment be employed by a labor organization, or an striking body, it shall be held lawful in California to withdraw, or threaten to withdraw, patronage from any person who patronizes another person against whom a boycott has been declared. It follows by parity of reasoning (and it was by parity of reasoning and not common sense that the original conclusion was reached) that a striking organization may boycott any person who patronizes any person who patronizes some other person who gives patronage to a person who patronizes the boycotted person, firm or corporation. The secondary boycott may become tertiary, quadruplicate, quintuplicate, sextuplicate and so on until the doctrine of vicarious suffering for the omissions or commissions of another is lost in an inextricable maze of conflicting relationships. Somewhere the doctrine of public policy should enter in and put a stop to the application of a principle which parity of reasoning has saved from a well merited destruction. That doctrine may well affirm that those who make the quarrels shall be the only ones either to fight or to suffer such pains and penalties as may properly be visited upon persons who fail to do justice to those in their employ. President Taft was right in affirming that the secondary boycott involves duress and is oppressive and should not be employed and our supreme court is wrong in legalizing it.

In the Outer Chamber.

For the better part of a life time John A. Benson has striven to break into state prison, from which a merciful criminal procedure has hitherto forefended him, albeit at the cost of most of his ill-gotten gains. Well, he has gotten as far as the Alameda county jail, for one night anyway. No doubt John A. Benson finds in this indignity a sense of injustice. To him, no doubt, as to others who have accumulated much money by robbing the public or by corrupting public officials, his prosecution looks like persecution, for has he not done what others have done and nevertheless escaped punishment? Has not his method of defrauding the government assumed the dignity and magnitude of a system, and who was ever found guilty of wrongdoing who merely followed a system? Has it not always been held that it was the system and not the man who was to blame? Yet Benson has been forced to spend a night in jail. Hard luck, Benson! If the public withholds from him all sympathy (save that which all good men accord to those who have made the mistake of giving their lives to evil practices that wealth might be the more easily and quickly acquired) it will be because it has watched Benson's hitherto ineffectual efforts to break into prison and will rejoice that he got that far for that long. May the United States keep on wrestling with him until it gets him there for longer. The ambition of a lifetime should not be frustrated by the failure of one's government to do its part.

Driven Out of Oakland.

The example set by San Francisco in driving out the slot machines has been followed by Oakland, and October first will see the last of those kindergartens of iniquity in that city. These two achievements should encourage the forces of decency all over the state to carry on the war against these machines wherever they may be found. Subtlety never devised anything more certainly and insidiously destructive of character.

Judge Lawlor.

Judge W. P. Lawlor has filed an affidavit purging himself of all conscious bias or prejudice against defendant Patrick Calhoun. The public will take the word of his word, notwithstanding the fact that the conduct of the case of the defense was well calculated to exasperate a judge and to create in his mind a feeling that it was not justice that the defendant wanted but exonerated at the expense of justice. Not only is Judge W. P. Lawlor a remarkable judge, but he is a remarkable man. How any man made of common clay could occupy that bench week after week and month after month, umpiring the scrapping match, and submitting to the indignity of an ill-concealed contempt of court and law, without perishing of nervous prostration, is beyond comprehension, and yet he came through it all as serene as a sunflower.

The Deeper Significance
: : : : of Living : : : :

Yale University has, as one of its departments, a fine scientific school. For three years it has been giving evening courses of instruction for the benefit of the young workmen of New Haven, but these courses are to be discontinued. With rare exceptions the young men have been intellectually unable to do the prescribed work.

This announcement is infinitely pathetic. In the mind's eye one can see these stalwart young men with dazed faces striving unsuccessfully to get a mental grasp upon technical terms and mechanical principles, all new and strange, but without success. Their opportunity for advancement, for the development of a higher earning capacity, depended upon their ability to grasp what the instructors vainly sought to place within their reach, but their own efforts and the efforts of their instructors availed nothing and the evening classes are to be discontinued.

It is to be doubted if the trouble is really a lack of mentality. There are those who lack mentality, just as there are others who lack stature, and the one deficiency is no more to be remedied than the other, but the mentally incapable are below the status of skilled workmen and are not likely to have heard of the Yale Scientific School. Probability lies on the side of inadequate elementary and preparatory training in earlier life. No adequate foundation for mental functioning had been laid.

There is, however, a companion picture to that of the evening class at the Yale Scientific School, every whit as pathetic. It is made up of those educated, fumble-fingered individuals for whom the class room has done all it can and yet they are able to take hold nowhere. Yale has sent forth hundreds of graduates who never developed the earning capacity that those stupid young workmen had developed before they made application for admission to the night school. Such men are to be met with everywhere hanging on to the ragged edge of literature, art, law, medicine, the ministry—misfits wherever they are. They can learn out of books, but out of life they learn little or nothing, notwithstanding no lack of hard knocks to teach them. They never quite arrive and would consider themselves fortunate if they could earn the equivalent of the wage of a fair mechanic, only they would wish it called "salary" instead of "wage."

Where was their fault? Was it in a lack of capacity? Was it a mechanical and executive stupidity that prevented their fumbling fingers from taking hold anywhere? It may be. There are physical incapables born into the world as certainly as mental and moral, but again the preponderance of probability lies in the lack of proper training in early youth. The likelihood is that, in boyhood, these incapables never learned to play, hunt, fish, swim and make things with tools, to play Indian, dig caves, build forts, play ball, skate, fly kites, wrestle, run races and fight. Perhaps they were not turned loose on the playground with hundreds of others of all nationalities, colors, conditions, and forced to hold their own. We have outlined in this paragraph the best course of study ever invented, and any person who has gone to college without having taken it, the whole of it, not omitting the fighting, stands a good chance of coming out of college fumble-fingered and incapable of taking hold of life anywhere.

Yet this excellent school, this indispensable school for early life, can be supplemented by careful training and made better, just as the preparatory school work for the young mechanics of New Haven could have been made so much better that these young men could have sensed scientific instruction and profited by it. And one hour and a half per day, for two days in the week, from the primary grade to the end of the grammar school course, would have sufficed to make capable both classes of incapables! Manual training would have done it, unless nature left some of the wheels out of the mental machinery.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Boston to New Orleans by Canal.

Navigation in the vicinity of Cape Hatteras and Cape Cod is notoriously dangerous, and there are other points along the Atlantic coast where it is only less so. Vessels are obliged to make wide detours to avoid these storm-centers, and, while time is thus consumed, the danger is only partly avoided. Under these circumstances it has occurred to our Uncle Samuel that navigators would be greatly benefited should a canal (taking advantage of quiet waters on the way) be constructed from Boston to Beaufort, S. C., later to Key West, Florida, yet later to New Orleans, and still later, as a final possibility, to San Francisco. Evidently this is a big enterprise, but it is not so big that Uncle Sam has not been giving it serious attention, particularly, as it has the approval of large navigation interests as well as the military and naval departments of the government. Congress has appropriated $25,000 for preliminary surveys, and already this work, in charge of Lieutenant U. S. Grant, 3rd, is in progress between Boston and Taunton, Mass. The canal as projected would first be constructed to Narragansett bay, thence through the lagoons off Rhode Island to Long Island sound, thence to New York, thence to Delaware bay, from that to Chesapeake bay, and from the bay to Beaufort. Thus far the canal will be twenty-five feet deep, or less if a lesser depth is found to be sufficient for navigation purposes. This is the most essential part of the proposed canal, as it would eliminate the dangers of both Hatteras and Cod. Congress, however, has provided for an extension of the survey to Key West, this part of the proposed canal to be twelve feet deep and the St. Johns river to be part of its course. From Florida to New Orleans the canal, as proposed, would be twenty feet deep. The New Orleans-San Francisco end of the canal has been suggested by engineers, but as yet lacks congressional indorsement. Preliminary estimates of the cost (Boston to New Orleans) places it somewhat in excess of $150,000,000. The enterprise may come to much or little, but, at any rate, it is under way.

To Dam the Niagara River.

About a certain time in the fall of every year Lake Erie has a bad habit of lowering its waters about two feet. This lowering of the water level always has affected shipping injuriously, and, as the amount of the shipping increases, navigation is more and more menaced. For several years the International Waterways Commission has been considering the problem thus presented, and at last both the United States and Canadian commissioners have decided on a plan for bettering the condition. The plan on which they agree contemplates the damming of the Niagara river opposite Buffalo and Fort Erie, and, of course, a few miles above the falls. Engineering experts who have investigated the situation are agreed that the waters of the great lake could be maintained at a uniform level by means of such a dam, and, presuming this to be the case, the estimated cost—$5,000,000—will be slight when considered in connection with the promised advantage to shipping.

Interesting Facts Concerning Railways.

Poor's Railroad Manual, for 1908, is an immense volume, the contents of which form no part of popular reading. Fortunately, however, some of its most interesting details may be "boiled down" for public consideration, as follows: At the end of 1908 there were in this country slightly more than 230,000 miles of railroad, and this was an increase of about 3,600 miles during the year. In these roads there is a book investment of rather more than $19,000,000,000, against which there stands a capital stock liability of $7,600,000,000, a bonded debt of $8,800,000,000 and floating obligations of over $2,000,000,000. At the close of 1908 the indebtedness of the roads exceeded their capital stock by about $3,000,000,000. Nevertheless dividends averaging 3.5 per cent. were declared. In 1907 the dividends were 3.7 per cent., and in 1906 they were 3.6, but it is since 1903 that they have averaged as much as 3 per cent. The total traffic earnings in 1908 were $2,407,019,810, and these were the highest ever known in 1907, when they were $2,602,757,503. The surplus in 1908 was $494,437,610, and in 1907 it was $172,570,000. That the amount of American travel is increasing is indicated by the fact that the average passenger journey on all the roads of the country now is 32.5, while in 1896 it was but 24.4 miles, an increase in the twelve years of nearly 33 per cent.

British Censor of Plays Under Fire.

Prime Minister Asquith recently informed the British House of Commons that it appeared to be advisable to consider the matter of censoring plays. His action occasioned some interest, and there were various suppositions, more or less wide of the mark, concerning the cause of his attitude in the matter. Now, however, comes the explanation, which demonstrates that many of the suppositions went wrong. It appears that a play by Guitry was to be presented at the Adelphi theater. The play was "La Grèce," and it, well, perhaps not risqué, but daring, let us say. King Edward has a somewhat rollicking taste in such matters—as is indicated by the fact that, during his visit to Paris, he selected "Three Weeks" for presentation at a state performance—and he wished to see "La Grèce." Well, the censor, having an eye to public morals, prohibited its presentation, and then and there the trouble was on. King Edward is a man of considerable influence in the United Kingdom, and he brought it to bear, with the result that Mr. Asquith was obliged to allow the play. Well, finally will be done about it remains for Time, the great solver of problems, to tell.

Married Quite a While Ago.

For some time past, in the Royal Museum at Berlin, eminent scholars have been delving among the so-called "elephantine papyros," with the result that they have found some decidedly interesting "curios." Perhaps the most remarkable of these was a marriage contract which is believed to be the oldest now in existence; in fact, the parties to it now are dead. It was signed, as its text tells, "in the seventh year of the reign of Alexander, the son of Alexander, in the fourteenth year of the satrapy of Ptolemy, the son of Ptolemy, the son of Dios." This would make the date of its execution about 311 B. C., or 2,220 years ago. The parties to the contract are Herakleides and Demetria of Kos, the bride giving the groom, as her wedding dowry, clothing and jewels of the value of 1,000 drachmas, which is a comfortable sum, but not enough to buy an European title in these days; moreover, the groom is hampered by a condition to which no self-respecting modern title would submit—to return the value of the dowry and as much more in the event that he proves unfaithful to his wife. Six witnesses signed the contract, which is in a nearly perfect state of preservation.

The Population of Egypt.

With the exception of Bengal, the habitable parts of Egypt are the most densely populated of any portion of the earth's surface, yet, notwithstanding this condition, the population is still increasing more rapidly than that of any European country except Germany. The population, according to the census of 1907, was 11,189,978, and to this number should be added the nomad Arabs, of whom there are estimated to be 97,381, making a total of 11,287,359. Excluding the desert, this allows an average of 930 persons to the square mile, while Belgium, densely packed as its inhabitants are, has but 588.7 to the square mile. The average number of residents to a house is 5.81. So much for the density of population; now as to the growth. In 1897 the population was 9,717,228, so that in ten years it increased 1,570,131, or about 16 per cent. During the same decade Cairo increased by 84,414 inhabitants, and Alexandria by 50,243. About four-fifths of the population are Mohammedans. Eighty-five per cent. of the men and 3 per cent. of the women can read and write.

Suffragettes Are Active in Egypt.

Writing of Egypt, it is of interest to note that suffragettes are making themselves heard there as well as in countries where the women are more literate. To be sure, the Egyptian women are not asking for the privilege of voting, but quite certainly what they ask is as essential to their welfare. Recently 4,000 of the leaders among them assembled at the Cairo Opera House, indulged themselves in speeches sufficiently denunciatory of the men to have been heard in England, and finally adopted resolutions demanding their Egyptian rights, which, briefly expressed, were the following: Freedom from harem life, abolition of the veil as an out-of-doors necessity for women, permission to be in the society of men other than their husbands, and the right to be courted as the women of the occidental nations are courted. The unfortunate feature of these demands is the fact that the necessity for them exists, but perhaps the same remark might be made concerning most suffragette demands wherever they are heard and however they are shrieked. That the women of Egypt have ventured to take part in such a movement, however, indicates once more that the world certainly is moving.

WORTH KNOWING.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not put a percentage on any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.

Bacon's Essays.

Lord Bacon had something to say and forthrightly said it, in the stateliest, clearest prose our language boasts. He looked upon the world with the profound vision of a philosopher and with the shrewd eye of a courtier, and then translated what he saw into words so simple that the fool may read and understand. The knowing and the wise wince as they read the essays for, outside of Shakespeare, you shall not find such frankness, so unabashed recital of the truth of life that lies beneath the shams. And yet he did not undertake to write a satire: he merely wrote the truth, and the effect is much the same as one feels upon seeing a man naked—you are reminded, with a shock, of the clothes that usually hide the imperfections of his true shape and likeness.

His English style is marvelous. As clear as crystal, and as highly polished; smooth to the lips and ear; majestic, yet varied with liveliness and wit; almost parsimonious of words and yet every phrase is rounded to encompass the whole gem of the idea which it leaves brilliant, nay, dazzling, to the reader's eye. Brief as the phrases are, they stand out in the memory like ranges of massive mountain peaks, each one distinct and impressive, leaving the reader's mind to explore the intricacies of forest and canyon that their presence suggests lie at their bases.

And wonderfully human they are, so human that they are forever contemporaneous. Even the quaint speech of Elizabeth's time in which they are written does not give one a sense of reading old matter. What in them is pleasing would pass for an extra good bit in this morning's newspaper. They refuse to grow old. They are pure gold of wit, wisdom, and wording. The longest may be read in five minutes. I commend them to every reader, in a pocket edition, the size of a wallet. You can carry a purse full of less treasure than this handbook of practical lore of the world written by a most shrewd worldly old sinner and observer of life.

MASCAGNI'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

Signor Mascagni has written his autobiography, which will be published shortly in a book of lives of illustrious modern Italians.

He relates that once he obtained employment as a substitute leader of orchestra in an operetta company for five francs a day, which was not paid regularly. While leading "Satanello" at Naples a song was encored, but he refused to have it repeated. The audience shouted and howled; still Mascagni refused to repeat the song. Suddenly he was struck on the back by a heavy object and thrown off his chair.

"It was a cushion hurled from the gallery," Mascagni says. "I immediately repeated the song and have never received an encore since." When Mascagni was a poor boy he had a plate of macaroni every day. In 1883 while he was at Cerignola, bandmaster of the municipal band and giving piano lessons, he composed "Cavalleria," won the Sonzogno prize and became rich and famous.

SHAKESPEARE IN SYRIA.

Says The World To-day: Could a more picturesque stage setting be imagined for a Shakesperian production than a grove of stately pines on the shores of the Mediterranean with the Lebanon range, rising to a height of several thousand feet, as the distant background?

Such was the actual setting for the al fresco production of "As You Like It," given last spring on the beautiful campus of the Syrian Protestant College, Beirut, Syria, by its students. The chief interest of the performance lay perhaps in the cosmopolitan character of the cast, in the difficulties that had to be encountered by the actors and in the fact that it was the first play of the kind ever given in that ancient country.

ODDITIES OF AUTHORS.

Alexander Pope, who was the literary pontiff of his time, thought best when in bed. Whenever a thought came to him he would jot it down on a scrap of paper. His servant often found bedclothes and floor covered with white bits containing aphorisms which have now become hackneyed quotations.

Victor Hugo wrote "Les Misérables" standing up, an attitude which Hawthorne also assumed when he wrote many of his romances.

One leg thrown over the arm of a chair or sitting on the arm of his secretary's chair were Napoleon's favorite positions while dictating to Bourrienne, a position which he varied now and then by patting that scribe on the head or pulling his ears.

Sir Walter Scott could, while reclining on a lounge, dictate to two amanuenses, who frequently had to stop writing, so funny the dictated passages seemed to them.

Rabzac, in a monk's robe, frequently wrote from midnight till noon, taking draughts of strong coffee when drowsiness attacked him, and thus shortening his life by many years, no doubt.

William Morris made one of his famous translations from the Greek while riding on the steam cars. Walt Whitman and Horace Traubel, original in all things, were most original in the position they took while thinking. They were wont, so Mr. Traubel says, to climb upon a pile of lumber and lie down upon their backs. In that way each found out what the other's best thoughts were.

A man more absolutely governed by pure reason than Lord Macaulay could not well be found, but in his diary he refers to an after dinner talk about the feeling which Johnson had—of thinking oneself bound to touch a particular rail or post and to tread in the path of paving stones, and he adds: "I certainly have this very strongly."

In one of his Hibbert lectures Max Muller said to the students: "Many of you, I suspect, carry a ha'penny with a hole in it for luck. I am not ashamed to own that I have done so for many years."

Charles Dickens refused to lie down unless his bed was placed due north and south. He gave notice of the rule before arriving at a friend's house or a hotel, but a compass was always handy in his baggage to make sure.

Mrs. Justin McCarthy has told how Parnell gravely checked her stirring coffee "the wrong way" and insisted that she should take another cup.

A FATHER RYAN MEMORIAL.

The Mobile Register, says the Houston Post, is to be congratulated upon the prospect that its persistent efforts to build a monument to the memory of Father Abram J. Ryan, the poet-priest of the Confederacy, are to be crowned with success. For six years or longer the Register has carried at its masthead the appeal for funds for this purpose, and at the present time the sum of $2,000 has been contributed. It is strange that the Southern people have shown such apathy toward this movement. Father Ryan was a chaplain in the army, and the greatest poet produced by the war period. His inspiring lyrics will live as long as history records the deeds and sacrifices of the civil war.

His noble character and splendid sympathies were manifested just as bravely in the great yellow fever epidemic in 1878, when he gave his life in the effort to soothe and comfort the sufferers of that dreadful visitation, as when he served in our armies.

Of all the names of our dead that are entitled to be forever preserved in enduring form, none is more worthy than the sweet-souled priest who spent four years in our armies with the sick and wounded, invoking the sympathy of God for their sufferings and in the hush of midnight writing songs which inspired the men in the line to almost superhuman endeavor for the cause.

A POET'S PROPHECY.

By Alfred Tennyson.

(From "Locksley Hall.")

For I dight into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonder that would be;
Saw the heavens fill with commerce, argosies of magic sails,
Pilots of the purple twilight, dropping down with costly bales;
Heard the whistles blast with shouting, and there rained a ghastly dew
From the nations' airy navies grappling in the central blue;
Far along the world-wide whisper of the south-wind rushing warm,
With its stirred and drowsy peoples plunging thro' the thunder-storm;
Till the war-drum throbb'd no longer, and the battle-flags were fur'd
In the Parliament of man, the Federation of the world.

AN ART THEATER THAT PAYS.

Once more comes the report that the company of the noted Art Theater in Moscow is to go into the Western world next year and not merely to London and to Paris, but across the Atlantic to American cities. "So eager were the Russian players to see the new world and to be seen of it," says the Dramatic Mirror, "that when Sarah Bernhardt was playing in Moscow last December they besought her to inform them as to the details of foreign travel by a European company, and she gave them information on the business of transporting elaborate scenery and mounting different sets on successive nights."

The Mirror then adds some little-known particulars about the organization and methods of the company. It seems that a number of rich Moscow families, dissatisfied with the objective and superficial character that characterizes the repertory of the subventioned theater in Russia, set about to found an art theater, the repertory of which should be largely made up from the more modern plays of Russian authors. A company of players to be trained afresh was projected, and as a result one of the most artistic theaters in Europe has been developed. The patrons of this enterprise for the most part were and are wealthy manufacturers of Moscow.

Under such auspices, and with a definite object beyond the commercial in view, box office receipts were secondary in the scheme, or rather wholly subordinate. It is said that a hundred or more rehearsals have often preceded a performance, much being left to the individual initiative. But the class of actors recruited has been high in intelligence, as Moscow University supplies much of the personnel of both sexes. Each recruit, after leaving the university, takes a course of three years in the school maintained by the Art Theater before entering upon practical work. Gordon Craig is an artistic adviser as to settings, and pays semi-annual visits to Moscow from Florence, where he lives, to supervise the work in this department. Members of the company are engaged by the year, with an allowance of a two months' vacation. Salaries average much smaller than elsewhere, chiefly for the reason that while the public may decide to elect its favorite a star every member must play the part assigned by the directorate. The company has become so popular that, although prices are raised during the annual visits of the players to St. Petersburg, the seats for the season are usually bought up before the opening night. For several years the balance sheet has shown a large profit, part of which is divided as a bonus among the members of the company over and above their fixed salaries.

Edwin Milton Royle has written a sequel to "The Squaw Man." It is called "In the Blood," and the scene is the Indian reservation at White Rocks, Utah.

CITIES AND THINGS

II.

By WILLIAM KENT.

[The following is the second half of an address delivered before the City Club of Los Angeles on May 22nd by Mr. William Kent, of San Francisco, whose twenty-five years of active participation in the political, restoration and civic uplift of Chicago lends extra significance to his thoughtful analysis of the problems of the cities, "the hope of democracy."—The Editors.]

Returning to the question of economic necessities, it should be an inherent function of a city to furnish an adequate supply of pure water. This duty should never, under any conditions, be delegated to private initiative. It should be beyond the bounds of possibility that any reasons should ever be given for the curtailment of this vital necessity. Whatever the cost it must be had, and the people should at all times be in position to hold their representatives directly responsible for an adequate and wholesome supply. Good water should be furnished at cost, or in the event of extraordinary expenditure, even below cost, and part of the charge met out of general taxes.

Evils That Were Allowed to "Happen."

When we consider the other public necessities of the city (transportation and artificial light, telephone service and the distribution of heat and power) we find still more of the evil results of the accident theory. The city, as it grew, at first did without these things, that subsequently became necessities. Instead of being planned in advance they were left to private initiative. This private initiative considered, first of all, that in furnishing these requirements it was subject to risk and therefore should the business prove profitable the rewards should be large. With the development of our cities it became a certainty that street railways, run even by horse power in densely populated centers, were sure of enormous profits, when operating on the basis of a 5-cent fare; the cable, for dense traffic, further cut down operating expenses; the trolley, and especially the economical overhead trolley, still further reduced these expenses.

But the street railway promoters insisted upon taking to themselves all the advantages derived from this knowledge and these inventions and devices. The cheaper the operating cost, the greater the crop of the fruits of the printing press in stock and bonds. And then, when the cities began to wake up and demand more service for their nickel or more tickets for a quarter, they were met with storms of indignant protest and systems of bookkeeping beyond the abilities of Ananias.

This "assault upon vested interests" and the investments of "widows and orphans" was met by the stern resolve of the banded public utilities, led by the transportation companies, to properly govern in their interests these aggregations of "misinformed, envious, socialistic, anarchistic, and altogether undesirable" patrons of the public utilities aforesaid. Here is the direct cause of most of the municipal wickedness that has blotted the story of the American cities. Uncontrolled public utilities naturally linked themselves with other predatory classes.

Other Anti-Social Powers.

There were liquor dealers desirous of securing an adequate outlet for an unlimited output; and next came into line the purveyors of prostitution, gamblers, and "con" men, also asking their chance to live; and there was marshaled a malevolent army bent first of all upon profit, but incidentally upon the destruction of the social life and well-being of our cities.

It is not that those interested in public utilities were worse, or different at the start, from other people, but simply that they have been victims of custom and of false perspective. There are numerous examples of men of high character, who, having undertaken to protect such vested interests against public attack, have been driven to death between their sense of right and the deeds they were compelled to do at the insistence of their directors and stockholders.

A Solution of Public Utilities Problem.

Chicago, after thirteen years of struggle, has solved its traction problem in such a way as to establish a partnership between the companies and the city, and has eliminated from the situation the necessity or the possibility of the street railway people endeavoring to govern the city in their own interest. There is no reason for their doing so and they find peace and contentment and profit in giving good service to the traveling public.

Exactly the same solution is possible for the lighting concerns and the telephone service. There must be a protected monopoly practically free from any upon which reasonable earnings must be allowed upon actual, bona fide, well expended investments, together with due remuneration for good conduct and good management, if the city is to live harmoniously with these, its servants. The time must come, indeed should come, when the city should furnish these necessities at cost, and without profit, to its people. As a step in the right direction Chicago has gone far. The other cities must, sooner or later, follow its lead, preparing to take over these functions just as fast as financial ability and a recognition of business management in municipal affairs are obtainable.

"Farming" the Right to Tax.

When a city turns over to a corporation the right to furnish light or transportation, it hands over to that corporation one of its sovereign powers, the right to tax. The mere fact that water, transportation, and artificial light are necessities, carries with it the fact that the consumer must have and pay for them whether or no. That the city should farm this right to tax without placing upon it limitations in regard to cost and quality of service is as absurd and as iniquitous as the ancient practice of farming out the taxes of provinces. To exact a percentage of the gross receipts in such a farming-out system is equivalent to turning a tax collector loose on a community, only providing that he yield up to those authorizing him either a percentage of his gross collections or a fixed sum. Such practice is more malevolent than the authorization of gambling and lotteries by a municipality. It is optional whether people shall or shall not gamble; whereas, in this uncontrolled, tax-farming scheme, the municipality turns upon its own citizens those who are given the right to reap what they can out of the people's necessities.

This control and regulation is known by capitalists and promoters as "socialistic" and "anarchistic"; as being inspired by the envy and hatred of the mob, and as being fomented by pestilential demagogues. The epithets, plastered over the billboards of reform, bear more eloquent testimony to the grief of the greedy than to the intelligence of the grafters.

Extravagance and Waste.

There is another disease of American cities, allied to the troubles we have already considered, and that is the disease of waste and extravagance. It seems so easy to raise vast sums of money by bonding a community that the ordinary rules of business caution are overlooked. The bonds are sold. Who is to pay for them? The answer will be: "Nobody in this generation." So let them go. Add to this ability to raise money, an inability to spend it honestly and well, which inability has often been exemplified, and we have a complete scheme of self-destruction which must stop the growth of any city unless it continually draws new blood from without. This is the situation in New York, which long ago would have shared the fate of its trolley system if it had not been made the receptacle for the hoardings and savings of the rest of the country. I should hesitate long before settling down in any city that had been so thoroughly looted, with an expectation of reasonable taxes or rational hope of seeing it righted.

Chicago has been singularly fortunate in having had a bond limitation during the years of its misrule. The grafters were compelled to confine their stealings to what they could reach in the immediate present and to presenting themselves with franchises which, however, were also limited as to time: whereas, in prodigal New York they talk of perpetual franchises, and the charges against the city have reached figures beyond the dreams of promotion. Pay! Why, they have to pay these charges now, and the cost of living in New York is now a burden and always will be a burden, for past misgovernment and waste must all be paid.

Individualism Dying.

I would not be here talking to you if I did not feel that city questions are coming to be

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Human Nature, Human Nature!

Human nature, human nature, you're a peach!
Always want the thing you cannot seem to reach:

Want the thing you haven't got—
Say, your neighbor's house and lot—
Want the thing that makes him glad;
Want his cash, and want his lad;
Want the sunshine of his life;
Want—no, never! not his wife;
Want the thing that makes you sick,
Want to drop it mighty quick;
Want the lime-light's central spot;
Want—you really don't know what.
Oh, I tell you, all experience serves to teach,
Human nature, human nature, you're a peach.

Human nature, human nature, you're a chump!

Always scrapping for the refuse on the dump.

Baby for her rattle scraps;

Tommy biffs the other chaps

For a marble or a ball;

Susie wants Elnora's shawl;

Mama cannot rest of nights

Till her hat beats Mrs. Blythe's;

Papa's hustling like the deuce

Just to shake some fellow loose

From the dollar in his paw—

'Rah for human nature! 'Rah!

For I tell you here is wisdom in the lump:

Human nature, human nature, you're a chump.

The High-Browed Man on Poetry.

"If it were not for some natural limitations," said the high-browed man, I might have been a poet."

"I suppose you are properly grateful for your limitations," I remarked.

"Well, I don't know," he replied. "Of course, it is pleasant to have money, but, on the contrary, it must be rather gratifying to have people shy off from you on the street and say, 'Hush! Don't disturb him. He may be thinking beautiful, rhythmical thoughts.'"

"What are your limitations?" I inquired.

"The brevity of my hair and of my thoughts."

I can get either to grow long enough."

"What do you mean?"

"Well, of course, you understand about the length of hair that is essential to a real poet, and perhaps I best can make you understand what I mean by the brevity of my thoughts by illustrating. For example, take this little thing that I wrote:

"Should all my neighbors like me prove,

I think it likely that I'd—move.

"Now that rhymes, and it scans, but the trouble with it is the love finished. There is nothing more to say, and it is not long enough to be a poem. Here's another thing I wrote:

"I love the little birds that sing,

The buds, the brooks and everything.

"Can't you see that that is open to the same objection? Yes, I can love anything more when already I have loved everything? And if I don't love anything more how am I to tell about it in poetry? Oh, I tell you it is mightily discouraging to come that close to being a poet and then fall down because your thoughts are too short-winded to carry you through. So I might continue, but my emotions overcome me, and I must ask to be excused."

"You are excused," said I.

Found a Husband Necessary.

"Did you hear that Helen was married?"

"Why, no! I am surprised. I heard her say she never would marry, and I thought she meant it."

"Yes, but you know that was before these dresses that button down the back came into style."

Far From Entirely Bereft.

"Does the widow seem to be entirely inconsolable over the loss of her husband?"

"Well, I shouldn't say so. You know, she still has Fido."

The Opinions of Rufus.

It takes a wise man to tell what's right beforehand, but any dern chump 'll stand ready to prove to you that he can tell what's wrong afterward.

The doctor told the preacher that what he needed was change. Says the preacher, "I git it every Sunday on my 'lection plate, an' oh, my brother, it's mighty small change, too."

Thus you realize, my brethren, that life ain't hully a snap for the preachers.

I b'lieve that some folks are mistaken in 'pearin' to thik that the best way to help up a man that's down is to kick him up.

You kin teach your child that the Almighty Dollar ain't the best thing in life, but es long es you run further an' bow lower to a man that has wealth than you will to anybody else, 'tain't lively the kid 'll pay much 'tention to the preachin'.

The only odor some women never carry 'bout them is that of sanctity, an' they'd have that, too, if it could be bought at the same shops es the others.

Lots of us that haven't any respect for Beelzebub can't help admittin' we can we're talkin' low down 'tween ourselves, that we've had considerable fun with him.

You kin make your own choice 'tween the Prodigal Son an' his brother, but I've allers felt that I'd ruther be foolish, an' git over it, than to be low-down mean, an' not git over it.

What's needed almost more'n vacations is two weeks after every vacation in which we kin rest up an' git ready to go to work again.

I reely b'lieve that cigarettes injure the brain, but lots of fellers that smoke them ain't in any danger on that account.

It may be that you aim higher than you'll git, but it's a dead sure thing that you'll git no higher than you aim.

She Giggled.

She said that the weather was pleasant that day.

And giggled;

Remarked that her Willie was really au fait.

And giggled;

At church or at party, at funeral or rout,

Whether humor was in or humor was out,

By way of announcement that she was about.

She giggled.

She mentioned the style of the feminine hat,

And giggled.

(But I wish to remark I don't notice her for that.)

She giggled.

If people were merry, or people were sad,

She said that the conduct of Willie was bad,

That really it vexed her and made her quite mad.

And giggled.

She went to the gate that is narrow, they say,

And giggled.

When Peter said, "Pass," in his welcoming way,

She giggled;

And I'd bet you a dollar, two dollars, or four—

And I know of some people would offer you

That the first thing she did when she got through the door,

She giggled.

It will not fool everybody forever, but it may fool enough long enough to serve your purpose, and if you do not believe me you may ask Judge—to mention his name might be unpleasant, and so you may insert the name of the judge to whom your mind turns in this connection.

Now see, Henry, not all of us can be wise, but any of us can look so, and consequently we should play the game for all it is worth, as does Mr.—but again you may insert the name that occurs to you.

Again, look solemn and wise, Henry. Until a counterfeit is detected it does just as good service as a genuine coin.

Thoughtful Man on Reformers.

"A reformer," said the Thoughtful Man, "is a person who sees and deprecates the frailties and errors of mankind. 'It's too bad,' he remarks to anybody that is in his vicinity, 'and if it wasn't for me I fear that the world would go wrong. It now becomes my duty,' he says, 'to fasten on my armor and go out and belt Sceptered Iniquity. Come on, boys,' he says when his hearers encore him, 'let's go up to the armory and get ready for the fray.'"

"So the whole crowd adjourns, and prepares to get busy. They are good and well-meaning boys, and you can see that there's a raw and chilly day ahead for Sceptered Iniquity. Pretty soon one of them sees something suspicious."

"'Aha!' he cries, 'there's a Sceptered Iniquity,' and he hits him a belt with his battle-axe. 'Ouch!' says his victim, as he picks himself up. 'You under-headed imbecile, don't you know your own friends? I'm no Sceptered Iniquity. Take that!' he says, driving his lance into the first party's solar plexus."

"'And that!' says his friend, giving the first party another whack."

"'And you take this bouquet home to your parents!' says a friend of the first party, driving home with his broadsword at the friend of the second party."

By this time the friends of both parties have formed in battle line, and you can see that the world really does need reformation."

"What a Sceptered Iniquity doing all this time? Well, he's busy. He's standing on a convenient hillock and cheering the combatants on. 'That's it!' he says. 'Giveum!' he says. 'Don't let 'em impose on you!' he says. And there is more than one poor, fainting reformer whom he cheers to renewed exertion."

"If it wasn't for this peculiarity on the part of reformers; if it wasn't for their congenial tendency to belt a head regardless of where it sticks up or what fellow-soldier bears it, I should greatly fear for our loved country, for undoubtedly they would interfere with business and it would get so after a while that there would be neither pleasure nor profit in being held up. But, generally speaking, they can be relied upon. They start out meaning to blight Sceptered Iniquity, but they can't resist the challenge they find in the sight of a brother's head."

"In my opinion," the Thoughtful Man concluded, "this peculiar characteristic of reformers is due to an intervention of Providence in behalf of business, including those who do business—and us. Doesn't it look that way to you?"

"I left my glasses at home," said I.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

The Sacramento Valley Development Association has undertaken to raise a fund of $50,000, which is to be used in advertising the great valley throughout the East and elsewhere.

In an old mining tunnel at Table mountain, near Bodie, a vein of gold ore running from $40 to $100 to the ton recently was struck.

By a plurality of fifty-eight, the voters of Long Beach decided in favor of the adoption of an ordinance permitting householders to keep liquor on their premises for family use. This is a reversal of Long Beach's former attitude which will result in the sale of liquor for hotel dining-rooms.

The first carload of watermelons from the San Joaquin valley was shipped from Dinuba on June 28th.

A number of San Francisco capitalists have purchased 2,200 acres of land in Fresno county. They will plant it to oranges, and place it on the market in the East.

It is reported that peaches for fall delivery are selling in the interior valleys of California for $26 a ton.

The California Transportation Company's steamer Isleton, which was used on the run between San Francisco and Stockton, was burned at its wharf in the latter city last week. The loss is estimated at $100,000.

The Home Alliance, of Woodland, is eighteen years of age, and is perhaps the oldest strictly local paper in the state which has made the fighting of the saloons the principal object of its existence. It is almost unnecessary to add that its editor is a woman.

The Healdsburg Tribune has been sold by the Tribune Publishing Company to Alexander Crossman. As the latter says that "Healdsburg appeals to me as the one beauty spot selected by the Ruler of the Universe to receive his divine gifts," it would appear that he should not be lacking in incentive to make a success of his editorial labors.

But a few years ago the Imperial valley was a desert. To-day, with water upon it, it is yielding fruitage in abundance, and its excellent little paper, the Daily Standard, has attained the age of five years. All of which is mentioned as another evidence of the fact that time—and water—produce wonders.

Ralph A. Sage, formerly with the Suisun Republican, has purchased an interest in the Benicia New Era, and hereafter will be identified with the interests of the latter newspaper.

The Congress of Reform of the California Woman's Christian Temperance Union will be held in Berkeley from July 17th to July 23d, inclusive.

HOPE.

I must run and play
Where the sun
Shines brightest till the day
Is done.
Swifter than the light, I go
As the waters flow,
As the rivers run,
To the sea, to the snow,
Peak to level,
Good or evil,
On I run.
Water is not fluent
More than I;
I must be a truant
Till I die.
Wind and wave I follow,
Heaven hears my hollow—
To the sky,
In the sea-trough's wallow,
At the noon,
Neath the moon—
Hears my cry.
Hearthstone have I nowhere
On the earth;
I was seen by none there
Since my birth.
I am only coming,
I am less than dreaming,
I am worth
Much or little, jot or tittle,
As I'm won,
As I'm gone
From the earth.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Shall San Pedro Harbor be Down in Los Public or Private Property?

Los Angeles some political excitement has been caused by the act of the trustees of San Pedro in granting a lease for fifty years of valuable harbor privileges. Los Angeles city expected to annex San Pedro soon, and control of the harbor is the object sought; to anticipate this by granting away the remaining public water frontage previous to annexation strikes a blow at the Los Angeles plans in a vital part. There is the usual mystery enwrapping the "harbor steal," as it is called; the lease is to F. E. Shaw, at a nominal rental of $50 a year, and speculation is rife as to whom he represents, though it is believed some heavy interest is concerned in the attempted grab. Resort has been had to the courts to prevent the consummation of the job, and meantime the Attorney-General of the State is maintaining a suit which, if it succeeds, will strip of their possessions all the private claimants of harbor lands, whose titles are based on doubtful tide land sales by the State of California. The great prospective importance of San Pedro harbor makes the struggle of state-wide interest.

More Good Follows The California Weekly After a Good Job

The California Weekly has already noted the advent of Mr. Jack Stafford as a candidate for Secretary of State, and now come two other candidates for the same office who are almost as meritorious as Stafford. One is Frank C. Jordan, late Clerk of the Supreme Court, and the other is Lewis G. Hilborn, Secretary of the State Senate. So here are three candidates, any one of whom is capable of making the wildest enthusiasm among the politicians, all after the office of Secretary of State before there is any certainty that Charles F. Curry will not want it any longer. But what is the Secretary of State, and what kind of man is needed to perform the duties? Before going further it might be well for somebody to ask and answer that question.

It is a more important office than most persons are aware. It has double the number of deputies and clerks found in any other office in the state capital. Among the duties are the collection of about $600,000 a year in the corporation license taxes, and more than $200,000 a year is taken in as fees. All of the automobile licenses are issued from this office. One of the most important duties of the Secretary of State is to canvass the votes cast at general elections. He is also the State Sealer of Weights and Measures. He is the superintendent of the Capitol Building and the general purchasing agent, spending large sums for furniture, ballot paper and general office supplies. He is ex-officio one of the three members of the State Board of Examiners, which is the most important of all the state commissions, of the State Board of Forestry, of the Capitol Commission and of many special boards and commissions. That is a brief statement of the duties and powers of the Secretary of State. It may enable the people to judge whether they want the office filled by a "good fellow" who is one of the "boys."

Dust Germs State Senator McCartney of Thrown In Los Angeles, who has been enforcement of pure food legislation, was in San Francisco a few days since, and he expressed his surprise at seeing fruit exposed for sale at the fruit stands without being protected from the dust of the atmosphere. Since the last legislature passed an act requiring that fruit and other articles of food shall be covered when offered for sale, the dealers in Los Angeles and other southern cities show all of their products under glass. In San Francisco and other northern cities few persons have yet found out that the law requires this, but it is to be hoped the law will, some day, be discovered in the statute books and when found will be enforced in the interest of the public health.

The State Fair

To be on Wheels of the legislature which authorized this new departure, and appropriated $10,000 to carry it out, the State Board of Agriculture is now arranging for the holding of a fair in Oakland, to follow immediately after the regular state fair in Sacramento. Only this branch state fair was authorized last winter, but it is safe to assume that another session will not pass without requests from a number of cities to share in the favor granted to Oakland, and it will be something strange if hereafter the state fair is not repeated at four or five different places. Secretary Filcher, of the State Board of Agriculture, admits that such will be the tendency, and he rejoices in it because he believes the effect will be to restore the fair to their former vogue. With a circuit of fairs in, say, Los Angeles, Fresno, Oakland and Sacramento, he believes that it will be easy to find exhibitors, while few are willing to go to the expense of preparing exhibits for a single fair. In the East, where several state fairs can be combined in a circuit, exhibitors machinery exhibits at last year the agricultural twenty acres of ground, and fifteen hundred hogs and twelve hundred horses were shown. At recent California state fairs the machinery and live stock exhibits have been very limited.

Troubles

At Patton The unfortunate Southern California state hospital, lately at Patton, near San Bernardino, has been again undergoing investigation this week, on account of charges of neglect and cruelty by attendants. This has been the most unlucky of the state hospitals, and although it has always had men of reputed ability and character at its head, its history has been marked by embezzlement, suicide, epidemic diseases and repeated charges of misconduct toward patients. Investigations have usually revealed conditions to be remedied, although the most sensational charges have been disproved. What is at the bottom of all these often-recurring troubles has never been made plain.

From Chief To Mayor

In Sacramento, as in San Francisco, the political situation, at least so far as the nomination for mayor is concerned, gives signs of settling itself. Following the declination of Mayor White, all was confusion for a week or more, and at least a score of leading citizens who were imported to be candidates, refused the honor. But a willing candidate has at last been found in the person of John E. Sullivan, present chief of police. He has made an acceptable head of the police department, and it is a strong point in his favor that Mayor White is promoting his candidacy. On the Democratic side M. R. Beard is as good as nominated for mayor.

Is Going to be Good Governor Gillett, to The Rest of the Term use an expression to which many are addicted, is still keeping the politicians guessing. He will not say whether or not he will be a candidate for re-election, and this reticence or indecision, whichever it may be, the polities are half disposed to resent, because until they know something definite they cannot very well make plans. They do not concede that the nomination would be his for the asking, but the cards must be played one way if he is in the game and another way if he is out of it. The latest report is that the governor has said to somebody that he intends to go ahead for a year, making as good a governor as he can without any reference to next year's election, and allow his ultimate decision to depend entirely upon what the situation shall be at the end of that time. This, if the story is true, is rather showed upon the part of Mr. Gillett, but it will put a hard strain upon the nerves of Charles F. Curry and some other aspirants.

An Unnecessary Institution Judged by his Being Given a Bad Start most recent appointments, the governor is bringing forth mixed results in his endeavor to be the best governor possible. Some of the good appointments were noted in The California Weekly a week or two since, and to this list have since been added the names of Dr. Thomas Addison, and C. C. Chapman as trustees of the San Jose Normal School, besides others. But he has also appointed W. H. Metson and W. L. Crooks as trustees of the new California State Trades and Training School. It has been seriously doubted whether the institution, which is intended to take the graduates of state-aided orphanages, ought ever to have been established; but, since the legislature made provision for it, it ought to be started right, if at all, and Metson and Crooks are not the men to do it. The former is a San Francisco attorney who has a natural affinity for the pro-gram side of the local controversy, and who years ago served on the Yosemite Commission without covering himself with glory. As for Crooks, he is the staidest politician whom Solano county has to offer, and the one who has oftenest helped to manipulate local conventions in the interest of the Southern Pacific.

Politics in San Francisco

The only political events of this week in San Francisco were the revision of the Union Labor ticket, made necessary by the Supreme Court decision that the primary law limits candidates to their own party nomination, and the formation of a so-called Business Men's League of machine Republicans to further the candidacy of William H. Crocker. The Union Labor candidates are now all of that party, in striking contrast to the original complexion of the ticket, which was made up of Republicans and Democrats of various factional affiliations as well as straight-grained labor unionists. The Business Men's League is ostensibly a representative body of 150 Republican business men, but a careful perusal of the list reveals the fact that three-fourths of them are distinctly men of past machine affiliations. This organization professes to be formed for the purpose of securing a safe and sane business administration of the city's officers, but its membership leads conservative thinkers to suspect that it is in reality a new manifestation of the fine Italian hand of Mr. Hiram.

THE NEW PLAYWRIGHTS

A REVIEW OF THE LAST DRAMATIC SEASON.

Under this heading the Christian Science Monitor, of Boston, gives the following lucid and interesting resume of the rise of the new dramatists as indicated by the New York theatrical season just ended.

This season has been notable for the number of new playwrights who have come forward, and for the young playwrights who have established themselves.

William J. Hurlburt's success is very interesting in view of the performance of two of his first plays by prominent women stars. "The Fighting Hope" was played 240 times in New York and afterward taken on tour by Miss Blanche Bates. "The Writing on the Wall" served Miss Olga Nethersole the entire season on the road and in New York.

Thompson Buchanan wrote "A Woman's Way," and Miss Grace George played it all the season on the road and over 100 times in New York. This is Mr. Buchanan's second play. Last year he had "The Intruder," which was shelved after a trial performance. This play has been revised and is to be produced next season.

Elmer B. Harris failed to attract much attention early in the season with "The Offenders," but later collaborated with Miss Geraldine Bonner in "Sham," which proved a successful vehicle for Miss Henrietta Crosman.

Edward J. Locke is another new author this season. His play, "The Climax," requires a cast of only four characters and has proved one of the interesting offerings of the New York season.

Harry Leon Wilson and Booth Tarkington scored another success after their comedy of an Indiana man in Italy, "The Man from Home," which has been the success of two seasons in Chicago and New York. Their new comedy is "Cameo Kirby," which Dustin Farnum played several weeks in Chicago.

Robert H. Davis has had a rather remarkable success in the West with his first drama, "The Family." The play ran several weeks in Chicago, and is to be produced in New York the first of next season.

Harrison Rhodes has been moderately successful as a playwright in England, but this year he has with Thomas Wise, the comedian, written one of the two longest-lived plays of the New York season, "A Gentleman from Mississippi," which was produced September 29th, last, and is still running.

Edward Carpenter wrote an interesting play of old Louisiana days called "The Barber of New Orleans," his first important play. It was produced by William Faversham, who also put on "The World and His Wife," an adaptation of a classic Spanish play made by Charles Frederick Nirdlinger—his first play.

Miss Mary Johnston, the novelist, had her first drama produced by Miss Julia Marlowe. "The Goddess of Reason" proved an interesting and moderately successful play, made of familiar materials, that gave Miss Marlowe a striking character.

J. Hartley Manners this year has established himself, after several years of moderate success, by "Ganton & Co." and "The House Next Door." The first is a dramatization of a novel, and enjoyed long runs in Chicago and New York. The second play is an adaptation from the German, and sets forth the subject of racial antipathy between Jew and Gentile. The play ends happily. It proved so interesting that it enjoyed a long New York run, which has just closed, and which will be resumed in August.

Cleveland Moffett achieved his first stage success with his socialist drama, "The Battle," played all the season on the road and for over 150 performances in New York by Wilton Lackaye.

Percy Mackaye has yet to make a popular success. To his "Jeanne d'Arc" and "Sappho and Phaen" he has added "Mater," which was played twenty-seven times at the Savoy early in the season. The latter, Mr. Mackaye's first play in modern prose, received high praise on all sides for its delicacy and wit. His "The Canterbury Pilgrims" has proved well adapted to open-air performances, and has been so played at various colleges throughout the East by the Coburn players of New York, always to large and pleased audiences. It is to be played on a spectacular scale at Gloucester, Mass., August 4th, and will be witnessed by an audience of notables, including President Taft.

Edgar Selwyn, an excellent actor, made a moderately successful play out of one of Gilbert Parker's novels, called "Pierre of the Plains." Last year Mr. Selwyn produced an interesting farce, "It's All Your Fault."

Edward Sheldon, a young man just out of Harvard, wrote "Salvation Nell," a realistic play of the New York East Side, which lasted Mrs. Fiske all the season and is to be played by her next year.

If James Forbes needed a second success to prove that "The Chorus Lady" was not an accident he certainly produced it in the clever comedy of life on "the road," "The Traveling Salesman." The play was given almost the entire season in New York and has been played simultaneously in Chicago and Boston for three months.

Austin Strong wrote the libretto of "The Pied Piper," a musical play that was quaintly interesting through its genuine representation of child character.

Miss Anne Warner has produced no new play since "The Rejuvenation of Aunt Mary," a rather boisterous farce.

Miss Margaret Mayo has added to her success as an adapter of "Divorçons" and "The

ENGLAND'S BETTER CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

II. THE ENGLISH BENCH, BAR, AND ATTORNEYS.

Written for The California Weekly by An English Attorney.

[This article is the second of a series to be published in The California Weekly, contrasting the procedure in the criminal courts of England with the California procedure and showing why the English system results in a nearer approach to even-handed justice without expensiveness, delay, or the abuse of the English method of administering justice shortly before England has completed a cumbersome system while England has simplified a better system. The reform of criminal procedure in California is the most urgent problem of the day, and this article, together with those to follow, will be illuminating to all readers. They have been prepared for The California Weekly by an eminent member of the English bar who now resides in San Francisco, and may be relied upon as an authoritative statement of the facts. The Editor.]

The accused having been brought to the bar of the court and having been called upon to plead guilty or not guilty, may at once plead guilty and upon such simple and plain confession of guilt the court has nothing to do but to award judgment. It is, however, generally backward in receiving and recording such confession and it usually counsels the prisoner to retract it and plead to the indictment.

When the prisoner pleads not guilty he is deemed to have put himself on his country for trial and the court may order a jury accordingly.

Instead of pleading, however, the prisoner may stand mute, in which case in former times he was subjected to "peine forte et dure"; that is, he was conducted to the jail, stretched upon his back on the ground and covered with a plank upon which increasing weights were daily added, food and water being given him on alternate days only, until he either pleaded or died. To-day, of course, such barbarities are no longer practiced and if he stands mute the court may direct the proper officer to enter a plea of not guilty on his behalf, which has the same effect as if he had actually pleaded.

High Salaries of Judges.

So far, the accused has not been represented by counsel, and a few words may now be out of place concerning the bench, the bar, and the attorneys in England, as they all differ somewhat from the judiciary and bar of this state. All English judges are appointed for life, or during good behavior, and cannot be removed from office except by impeachment. They are all in receipt of ample salaries; the Lord Chancellor receives $50,000 annually, the justices of the Supreme Court from $25,000 to $30,000, those of minor courts from $10,000 to $12,000 a year. The Justices of the Peace in the country are unpaid; they are chosen as a rule from the most substantial and trustworthy men; usually have private fortunes and in case of want of ability can be removed at pleasure; they are not lawyers but when sitting in petty sessions or in quarter sessions they are aided by the so-called "Clerks to the Magistrates," who is always a lawyer. All other justices or judges must be barristers at law (not attorneys-at-law) of from ten to fifteen years' standing at the bar and they are appointed on account of their ability and prominence in the profession. It is true that each political party, when in power, usually chooses its appointees from among the members of its own party but the salaries being large and the dignity of the office great, appointments to the bench are eagerly sought, even by the most eminent members of the bar, which gives the government the choice of the very best men. In addition to the salaries, adequate pensions are granted to retiring judges and titles of nobility are frequently conferred upon them while in office. In several cases the chief carrier of the bar is the of "Baron," and a seat in the House of Lords.

Judges Appointed for Life.

Being appointed for life and handsomely salaried, English judges are fearless and independent, not subject to political influence or open to corruption. The public have therefore the fullest confidence in their integrity and impartiality. Able and conscientious judges being among the most honored digni-taries of the nation, are respected by both people and bar.

Ranks in Legal Profession.

In England, attorneys-at-law, and counselors (that is, to say, barristers-at-law) are separate branches of the legal profession. The attorney is of a lower social and professional status than the barrister (or counselor). Attorneys and solicitors are persons admitted into the King's Court where they act as the agents and representatives of their clients, but except in the lowest courts do not plead. They are considered officers of the court and enjoy certain privileges on account of their admission, wherefore they are peculiarly subject to the control of the judges, who exercise summary jurisdiction over them, not merely in cases where they are employed in the conduct of suits or other matter purely professional, but wherever the employment is so connected with their professional character as to afford a presumption that it formed the ground of their employment. Any person having taken the degree of Bachelor of Laws or of Arts or any higher university degree at certain universities, and who after having taken such degree has served as an articled clerk to a practicing attorney for three years may be admitted without examination as an attorney or solicitor. The conduct of the examination is regulated by the judges and vested in the Incorporated Law Society; there are three examinations, preliminary, intermediate and final. And other persons, who have not taken a degree, are admitted by examination and service in the office of some practicing attorney or solicitor for a longer term.

An Attorney's Duties.

An attorney is permitted to receive certain fees which are established by statute. He does not conduct trials in the superior courts; his duties are of a humbler but perhaps more onerous nature; he interviews clients and witnesses, collects evidence and prepares the case for trial, attending to all minor details; he also writes a summary of the client's case for the instruction of counsel where necessary, and usually briefly but is often lengthily stated. This summary in English practice is called a "brief." The other duties of an attorney are preparing and serving papers, transfers of property, and the usual practice of an attorney at law here.

Privileges and Duties of Barristers.

To barristers-at-law is reserved the right of practicing as counsel and of pleading in court. They take upon themselves the advising and the defense of clients. Barristers are called to the bar by one of the four Inns of Court, in London, Lincoln's Inn, Inner Temple, Middle Temple, or Gray's Inn, which are a species of unincorporated Law Schools, independent of the state and not under the jurisdiction of any court. A barrister, therefore, is not an officer of the court as an attorney is. The courts, however, recognize the degree of barrister-at-law as necessary to practice. After a certain number of years of study and attending lectures, the student is called to the bar by the senior members of the society, who are called benchers. The call is made by the whole body of benchers and as the degree of barrister can only be conferred by the benchers so it can only be taken away by them; therefore the position of a barrister and the right to plead in court is held by him, at the will of the benchers and they exercise disciplinary jurisdiction over the whole bar. A student, barrister, or benchman who is expelled from one inn is expelled from all and when the inns disbar a barrister or a benchman cannot practice in any court. Every barrister must continue to be a member of an inn as long as he practices and he will be disbarred for any conduct unbecoming to his profession. The business of a barrister is—beside pleading in court or advocacy—conveyancing, advising on questions of law, signing pleadings and drawing documents, etc. If a barrister in court be guilty of contempt, such as prolix, frivolous, scandalous, or tricky pleading, vexatious proceedings, etc., the court may punish him for contempt by fine or imprisonment but he cannot be disbarred by the court. In case of misconduct the judges report to the benchers of the inns of which he is a member and they withdraw from him the right to practice if the offense be sufficiently serious, or they otherwise discipline him.

How Barristers Are Employed.

Barristers undertake no business except through solicitors and never or seldom come into personal contact with the client or the witnesses. They are not permitted to sue for their fees, which must, therefore, be paid in advance by the solicitor, as there is no legal obligation to pay a barrister, whose remuneration is supposed to be a gratuity; and he cannot contract with a client, or make an agreement for a percentage of the proceeds of the suit. When the so-called brief is handed to him by a solicitor the amount of the fee is endorsed upon it and is, if satisfactory, signed or initialed by the barrister. In court the junior counsel (there are usually at least two counsel on each side) opens the pleadings, the leader opens the case and closes. There are two degrees of barristers in modern practice (serjeants at law having been abolished), to-wit, king's counsel and barristers. The ablest, oldest and most experienced barristers are selected for king's counsel and it is usual from them to select the attorney general, solicitor general and other officials of the crown.

The general rules of qualification to entitle a person to be called to the bar in the inns of court are: he must be twenty-one years of age, and have been for five years at least a member of the society. He must be a bachelor or bachelor of arts of either of the English universities or of the Dublin University, in which case the time is three years.

Guarding the Profession's Ethics.

In forensic pleadings a barrister has the privilege to enforce anything communicated to him in his professional capacity, but it must be strictly relevant to the matter in issue, and if not relevant he will not be excused. There is a general council of the bar composed of attorneys general, solicitors general, and about seventy-five practicing barristers nominated by the inns of court or elected by the whole bar, which regulates the ethics and practice of the profession. This council is recognized both by the parliament and by the courts. Any barrister of ten years' standing is qualified to be appointed a judge or a justice of the high court and the lord chief justice of the exchequer. A qualified person he selects to other judgements.

In criminal trials, if no counsel appears for the prisoner, it is not necessary for the counsel for the prosecution to make an opening speech to the jury; however, when the prisoner is defended by counsel, the prosecution must always open the case, stating all that is proposed to be proved, so that the jury may see what the theory of the prosecution is. Counsel for the prosecution can only sum up the evidence for the prosecution when the prisoner is defended by counsel.

Neither at the opening nor at any stage of the trial may counsel give his own personal opinion of the case or state facts which require proof or which are not relevant to the issue. If more than one counsel appear on one side they generally divide between them the examination of witnesses and it is the duty of the junior counsel, when not engaged in examining witnesses, to take notes of the evidence.

King's counsel wear gowns of silk; other barristers gowns of stuff; all of them wear wigs and robes; and no one is allowed to address the court unless properly robed.

recognized at their real importance and that the recognition is leading to a wonderful change in the government of the cities. There is a municipal spirit, a new growth of public opinion in this country. The old, heedless anarchy of unrestrained individualism, which grew up in pioneer times, is rapidly giving way. It had, in its day and generation, the backing, if it wished to look for any backing, of the laissez faire school of sociology and economy. The laissez faire theory has gone to the scrap heap and the necessity of curbing the heedlessness of unrestrained individualism is everywhere felt.

The growing social sense that is accomplishing this result has had its rise in the growing consciousness of the cities. Step by step, beginning with the attempts to secure civil service laws, then into the limitations of the terms of franchises, in the militant fight for honest officials, the struggle for small parks and playgrounds, and later along, in the insistent demand for decent housing conditions, the cities have shown the growth of municipal self-respect.

The Growth of Civic Consciousness.

The clearing away of the machinery between the people and their representative may well be compared to the Reformation where the main contention was to get the people nearer to their God. The direct primaries, the initiative and referendum and recall; the elimination of city issues from national parties; a ballot reform; reforms of the elections laws; these are all means toward the great end. They come late but not too late. Any time is better than no time at all.

Every one knows the cost and worry of building without plans. The penalty for the creation of our cities under old conditions must be paid over and over, and extravagantly paid; and every step toward improvement is vastly more expensive than far-sighted provision would have been at the start.

This vision must be broader than most of us realize. The artificial towns that have been made to order as was the case with Pullman, in the past, and with the town of Gary, now building, may provide against some few of the mistakes of our accidental cities, but just as long as the land is turned over to private individuals for speculation with the certainty of unearned values being reaped without adequate service, just so long such cities are bound to be burdened with injustice which will rest heavy on those least able to bear it.

To realize how a city ought to be constituted, we should have a vision of one constructed solely for the benefit of its people and all its people, and then we could by no possibility provide for exploited public utilities, or the absorption of land values into the pockets of a few, which values were produced by all. In such a city it would seem absurd that politicians should, by the nature of their occupation, have the licensed right to pillage. Provisions certainly would not be made for paying the legitimate expenses of city government out of slot machines or the sale of liquor. Every citizen would be granted, at the cheapest possible price, a license to live and to enjoy himself during good behavior, and no one would be given any sort of a license to steal or to debauch the community under any guise whatever.

Cities Are "The Hope of Democracy."

My last word is that democracy is the question at the bottom of it all; that every man should know that he has an interest in his city; every man must feel that he has a fair chance in his city; every man must realize what the city can do for him and his children and for other people and their children, and then with a realizing sense of what may be and what ought to be, he can doubtless be brought to work for the regeneration of his community. Our republic is going to be saved and not wrecked by our great cities. Urban life is not going to be displaced by the old-time, slow-thinking, unsocial life of the country. On the other hand, rural communities are more and more to enjoy such social opportunities as the cities furnish.

The future of our country and the future of democracy are bright to the man who knows the city and who sees its dawning consciousness, and who is working to promote its welfare. Democracy is ultimate and sure; and he who is working to further democracy is working with a beneficent current which will bear its flood of blessings to the average man. The man favored of fortune, who is fortunate, living to give time and effort to the spread of the good things of the world to those less favored, knows nothing of social life and is more than half dead.

THE teacher that day had whipped Chuffy, known to his elders as Charles, for attempting to vary the monotony of life in school by throwing a paper wad which, owing to bad marksmanship, struck the pedagogue in the face, damaging his countenance little but injuring his feelings much. As the blows fell on the back of her unfortunate companion Mary had wept, and the teacher had chided her for what he considered undue sympathy. It is hard to be whipped in school at any time or under any circumstances, but it is particularly trying when the flogging is administered in the presence of one who admires the victim would like to shine as a hero, as some who long ago forgot how to be boys may remember.

And the worst of it was that Chuffy vaguely felt it was difficult for him to look like a hero, anyway. He knew what the books of romance demanded of such an individual, for he had read all on which he could lay his grimy hands, and he sadly realized that he fell far short of "filling the bill." The books insisted that the hero must be tall; Chuffy could barely attain four feet eleven inches by standing at his straightness, as the mark on the kitchen wall at home demonstrated. The books said he must be handsome; Chuffy undoubtedly was snub-nosed and freckle-faced. They demanded a "princely costume," or something of that sort; Chuffy's costume consisted of a calico waist and a pair of trousers which, having descended from his father, still were better adapted to his form than to that of his son, and the rag which perennially bound the worst of his stubbed toes, at the same time rapidly assuming the color of the ground, did not add to the charm and distinction of his appearance. And then, on top of these keenly-felt natural disadvantages, to be publicly whipped in the presence of the one girl whom he desired to believe in him wholly—even Mary's evident sympathy could only reduce, and not entirely remove, the sting of it.

But the faith of even a germinal woman in her hero is not easily shattered, and the mantle of her loving sympathy will cover ignominy, as Chuffy learned before long. That very evening an urchin of eleven years and a "little maid of nine sat beneath the spreading branches of an oak and consulted darkly, as did the Israelites of old, concerning how they should escape from the house of their bondage.

"Our pas an' our mas say we mus' go to school," said Chuffy, while the look of one injured settled more darkly upon his caked-seemingly countenance, "an' we jus' can't go to school w'ile the tetter acts the way he does; an' so I guess 'bout all we can do is to elope."

"What's to elope?" Mary asked, with the show of deep interest that the occasion appeared to warrant.

"Shucks! Don't you know what that means?" Chuffy replied. "Why, it means when a feller an' a girl love each other they—Oh, I forgot!"

Greatly to the little girl's surprise, and somewhat to her perturbation, Chuffy suddenly threw himself upon his knees before her, lifted his hands imploringly, and cried:

"Mary, sweet Mary, I love thee. Say, oh, say that thou wilt be mine."

Mary started, for in her small way she began to fear that her hero's whipping had affected his mind.

"Git up, Chuffy Hoppin! What ails you?" she cried.

The boy rose from his knees with an injured air.

"You're awful discouragin', Mary Tapler," he said. "That's the way they say it in all the books, an' if you're goin' to 'lope with me what you want to do is to throw your head on my manly bosom an' say, 'Oh, Charles, my own Charles, at last I am thine!' Say it that way, can't you?"

But Mary was obdurate. She said perhaps she would—anyway, she might—elope, but she wasn't going to make a fool of herself. Just because the books said so. And at last Chuffy, notwithstanding the books, was compelled to compromise on her terms; it was to be an elopement without any frills on it.

CHUFFY'S ELOPEMENT

BY

B. R. TENAFLY

The arrangements for the elopement were quickly perfected. The children were to meet on their way to school, each with a well-filled lunch-pail. In addition to this, Chuffy was to carry a bow and arrows in order to secure the spoils of the chase for a permanent food supply, and Mary was to take a doll, not because it was essential, but because, with feminine obduracy or incipient maternal love, she insisted upon it.

In those days—more than fifty years ago—the forest, broken here or there by the clearings made by settlers, stretched away on every side of the little Wisconsin village. The two babes had but to step within the border of the woods, and the civilized world was lost to them. And, oh, these great woods! Do you know how their shadows seem to reach out and enfold you as if they would hold you forever? And how the sun sinks at you only occasionally, and then hastens away as if it were afraid of what it saw there in the gray gloom? And how the imagination pictures some lurking danger lurking behind every sheltering tree? Unless you know the great forests you do not understand these things; but we who walked in them in our childhood, we know.

But the eloping children were very brave, or they bravely pretended that they were. Even the soul of the woman-child did its tiny best to make this pretense, and it occasionally she drew nearer to her companion at some mysterious noise, she faintly laughed with him at her fears and said they were absurd.

Lost Lake, which in those days hid among the woods and deserved its designation, was their destination. They wandered on in the cool shade of the trees until the robust appetite of youth asserted itself, and then they sat down by a little tinkling brooklet and ate until the stock of provisions in their pails was very low. But this would not matter, they agreed, when they had reached Lost Lake, where the spoils of the chase would prove the prowess of the hero. For of such fragile stuff is formed the faith of childhood; a faith nevertheless, which rarely goes entirely astray, for will He not surely care for those of whom He has said, "Of such is the kingdom of God?"

The sun slid down the western heaven, the shadows grew denser and darker, the birds in the trees began to twitter their good nights to one another, and still there was no Lost Lake, or if there were, it was doubly lost. A suspicion of the dreadful truth began to dawn upon the little girl, and she asked Chuffy if he knew where they were. He courageously did his best to reassure her, but doubt and uncertainty were in his own small heart, and do what he might, they would speak their message in his voice. The little girl was no heroine except as confidence in her hero might make her so, and her companion soon discovered that she was softly crying.

"My dolly is so tired!" she explained, wishing to be brave to the last. "I don't b'lieve she ought to have 'loped, too."

On the whole, I do believe that Chuffy really was a hero; a misguided one, perhaps, but not the less a hero on that account. He was but a very small boy, the heart in his wee calico breast was not so entirely courageous as he would have had Mary suppose, and the tears had welled upward until they stood surprisingly close to the outer surface of his eyes, but he winked them back very manfully indeed, carried the doll with the expressed hope that the change would prove beneficial to it, and did his best to comfort his weary little companion.

Before long twilight was almost upon the two wanderers. Outside of the woods the world still lay hushed in twilight, but within them there was little better than complete darkness. The four small feet all but completely refused to go any farther.

"I guess," said Chuffy then, "that we'd better build a fire for company, an' then eat what we've got. To-morrow we'll go on to Lost Lake, an' after that we'll be mighty glad we've 'loped."

Strategic Chuffy! He realized that neither of them was feeling "mighty glad" at that moment, and so he cunningly appealed to that hope which "springs eternal in the human breast." And, again, strategic Chuffy! He had been reared on the frontier and knew that wolves were a thing to be feared in Wisconsin in that day, and that, although they were the dreadful in summer than in winter, still a fire would be a good thing to keep them away. This, in no slight degree, was why they were to have a fire "for company," and honor to Chuffy, I say, that he kept his own large fears in his own small chest.

The fire, easily made of sticks and leaves, really was company. They gathered a pile of brush, very large for such small hands to accumulate, to feed it during the night, and, ah, how it sparkled and crackled and shed a genial warmth all about them! Hungry as they were, their slight supper had left them, it really was great fun for an hour or so, but after that they began to hear the weird voices and mysterious noises of the great forest, and then it was not so pleasant. There were footsteps that pattered and pattered, although nothing was in sight, creakings and groanings which were perfectly unaccountable, vague whispers which they almost, but not quite, could understand, and yet it seemed that the whispers were meant for them—whispers of warning or of warning, perhaps. These sounds really were very dreadful, and as the children sat close together listened to them, the icy hand of a terrible fear reached out and clutched their hearts. Mary again cried, but the heroic Chuffy assured her that there was nothing to dread, although his own little heart was beating like a trip-hammer, and so she was partly comforted.

But there is something which weighs even more with childhood than the eerie noises which wake in the night in the depths of a somber forest, and this is the need of sleep. Mary, being the younger of the two, was the first to respond to it. Even while the whispers and the pattering footsteps still were about her, her eyelids crept closer and closer, and at last her head drooped to the ground. She and her dolly were asleep together.

"That's right," said Chuffy to himself, very sagely; "she needs the sleep, but I'll set up to-night an' tend the fire an' keep the wolves away."

Chuffy had been sitting there alone but a very short time, though the minutes seemed extremely long, when he saw two small balls of fire very close together beyond the circle of light about him. The small heart in his small breast beat tumultuously at the sight.

"My!" he gasped, "it's a mighty good thing I've set up to keep the fire goin'! I almost know that's a wolf."

Then he threw some branches on the fire. The two balls of fire disappeared, but after a time they were replaced by four balls which glimmered in pairs, and a little later, although Chuffy kept the fire at its brightest, he saw eight balls at one time, all in pairs. He seriously thought of waking Mary then, but he concluded that a real hero would not do so, and so he did not; but he attended to the fire very carefully.

At last there was a yelping howl in the distance, the two balls disappeared, and then a thing took place which you would not believe possible if you never had been a child yourself. Chuffy's eyelids grew heavier and heavier; from time to time he determinedly opened them, but only to find they might draw together again, the light of the fire about him grew strangely hazy and dim; the woods retreated to an immeasurable distance, and then —then, prone upon the ground, with his arm for a pillow, Chuffy was sound asleep. With those glimmering balls not so far away, and with his fire sinking lower and lower, he slept the dreamless sleep of childhood. What if the wolves were about? What if dangers accumulated? The two children slept, and they were in the hands of One who heeds even the sparrow that falleth.

A little later in the night, when the fire of small boughs had died down to glowing embers, a four-footed beast, seeming strangely large in the semi-darkness about them, came where the children were lying and snuggled first at the one and then at the other. Apparently satisfied with this investigation, the creature lay down near them and set two faintly glimmering balls of fire against such other balls as might appear beyond the fading circle of light. Once before the morning broke, although the sleeping children knew nothing about it, this unrecognized visitor sprang to his feet and darted after a ghostly gray something that lurked beneath a neighboring bush. There was a patter of running footsteps, a succession of yelping cries, and after a little time the visitor came back with blood upon his jaws, and again laid himself down by the children.

The sun already was up, and, shining through the leaves, was weaving shifting, fantastic patterns upon the ground, when Chuffy awoke with a start. His eyes first fell upon Mary, and he devoted a little time to vaguely wondering how she came there. The events of the previous day were beginning to come back to him when his shifting glance fell upon the visitor who had remained by his side throughout the latter part of the night.

"Carlo!" he cried in the utmost surprise, for Carlo was his dog, and he had decided that it would be as well not to make him a part of the elopement. "How did you get here?"

But as Carlo had been denied the power of speech, he did not verbally answer, merely wagging his tail by way of assurance that all was well. Nor did the great dog vouchsafe any information concerning the gaunt, gray, mangled form which lay in the wood not far from them, although he knew all about how it got there. Perhaps in the canine heart of him he felt that his services in tracking and protecting the children were entitled to grateful recognition, but if so he said nothing about it unless his enthusiastically wagging tail was striving to say it for him.

And now it was up and on to Lost Lake, wherever that might be, with stomachs that complained of an increasing emptiness, but with a resolution so immense that it might have filled the breast of the largest man. Alas for the weakness of human nature! Exactly as the gnawing pain in their stomachs increased, the resolution diminished, until at last the former was so big that it left no room at all for the latter.

Heartsick, hungry and wearied by their long tramp of the previous day, they finally sat down beneath a mighty oak, with Carlo still by their side, and for the first time Chuffy admitted his timidity and discouragement. He still tried to be brave, but it was impossible to conceal the tears which would break all barriers and stream down his cheeks, and at sight of them Mary did the most dreadful thing which one of womankind can do, lost confidence in her hero, and, throwing herself prone upon the leaf-strewn ground, wept as if her baby heart would break. The sight of her grief was too much for Chuffy; he prostrated himself by her side, and the two children wept together.

And now, if it be true that sympathetic robins once found lost babes in a wood and covered them with warm, rustling leaves, it would seem that the time surely had come for the red-breasted missionaries to engage in such another labor of love.

To Chuffy, thus sobbing in immeasurable grief, there came an inspiration, and he immediately proceeded to put it into effect.

"Mary," he said, "don't you s'pose you'd better pray for help, an' I'll say amen." For Chuffy had an indefinable conviction, for which there may be some warrant, that feminine prayers reach higher and farther than the masculine article.

Then Mary, being thus urged, prayed.

"Dear God," she whispered, "we're lost an' we can't find ourselves. Won't you please send someone to do it, an' we'll be much obliged."

And Chuffy, as in honor and duty bound, said, "Amen!"

Greatly reassured, they now waited for their rescuer to find them, but if their childish faith had been less firmly fixed than it was, it certainly would have been shaken by the very first thing that took place after the simple play had been tremulously whispered unto the unseen Presence and recorded in the great book where such petitions are registered. Carlo, who had been lying by their side and only occasionally wagging his tail, as if he thought there might be some small reassurance in the action, suddenly pricked up his ears, started, and before they fairly realized it was gone. They were without their one protector, and although they called and called, he did not come back. And now, indeed, it required all their faith in prayer to give them even some small comfort; and yet they held to that faith, for it was all that was left to them.

But how now, ye skeptics? What will you say of those distant shouts ringing through the wood? What will you say of Carlo, barking and leaping in the van of a party of rescuers who had been out all night with lanterns and torches? What of this boy, trying hard to conceal his tears while he endeavors to explain the situation to a father too happy to heed the stammering words? What of the little girl who cries and laughs by turns, safely clasped within her father's protecting arms and against his loving breast? Perhaps that baby prater had nothing to do with all this, but then, again, are you quite sure that there is no heeding One beyond the mists that may not be mists at all to a vision clearer than ours?

("The New Playwrights"—Concluded.)

Marriage of William Ashe," the play of life in a girl's college, "Commencement Days," in the writing of which she collaborated with Miss Virginia Frame. "Polly of the Circus," Miss Mayo's original comedy, has enjoyed a successful second season, being played this year by two companies. It is to go on tour again next year.

Miss Marian Fairfax provided Miss Maxine Elliott with a slight but interesting comedy called "The Chaperon." This author is certainly to be reckoned with. Her first play, "The Builders," proved interesting when played in New York last season, but for some reason has not been revived.

One of the successes of the season has been achieved by another woman, Miss Edith Ellis, who has been writing plays for years, but until this fall has not had a popular success. This was achieved in "Mary Jane's Pa," a rural play which was played for a long time in New York and Chicago by Henry Dixey. Lee Wilson Doods, a young man just out of Yale, wrote "The Return of Eve" for Miss Bertha Galland. The play was a moderate success, and proved that the author is original and witty. His next play will be watched for with interest.

Miss Gladys Unger, a young American girl now living in Paris, made an excellent adaptation of a French comedy called in English "Love Watches," which served as a delightful vehicle for the stellar debut of Miss Billie Burke. Miss Unger with this play has established herself. Her earlier plays, "Mr. Sheridan," and the one-act piece "The Lemonade Boy," have been played to interested audiences in this country and in England.

A number of new American authors are not included in the above list. Their plays prove unimportant, although they promise interesting work in the future.

If we serve you with Washington pie, it's no sign there's a picture of the Capitol on every piece, and when we bring you college fritters there isn't a term's tuition in advance thrown in. Any cheese with your pie, sir?'—Columbus Dispatch.

"Good morning, madam!" voiced the cheery salesman. "Good morning!" echoed the quizzical matron. "Have you something very choice in Irish lace?" "Well—er—no; but here's something just as good at seventy-five cents a yard." "Just as good?" doubtfully. "Yes, yes; in fact, confidentially, superior to the real article. How much do you wish, please?" "Just a yard," sweetly. "Here's your money." "But, madam!" in confusion, "you've made a mistake—this isn't money." "No?" agreeably. "Why, no! It's a matinee ticket." "So it is!" sweetly. "But it represents seventy-five cents, and while it isn't actual money, it's just as good. Adios." The clerk faints.—Ex.

The whole Southland never claimed a sweeter, more lovable and gentle woman, but she could never be persuaded to use a 'phone. Lately the entire household was down with the gripe and there was no one else able to call a physician in the night. After ringing up "Central" this dear little woman became panic-stricken and could not think of the word the household used when they wanted "Exchange." Hurriedly she put the receiver up and whispered into the astonished ear of the telephone girl the word: "Hurrah!"—Lippincott's.

PERSONALIA

The champion long distance woman swimmer is Miss Lillian Smith, of London.

Governor Folk's recent lecture tour carried him 230,000 miles and is said to have earned him $20,000.

Maude Adams's mother is acting in a stock company at Salt Lake City. Her name is Mrs. Annie Adams.

Z. K. Graham, of Los Angeles, recently won the Call d'Aspin mountain climb in the Pyrenees, France, a distance of nearly sixty miles, against seven competitors.

Mrs. Jesse L. Pickering has been appointed head probation officer of Philadelphia, at a salary of $85 a month. She will have twenty deputies at her command.

The pope has an auto, presented by an anonymous American friend. He admires the machine greatly, but regrets that the confines of the Vatican gardens give him no room for extensive touring.

Clyde Fitch's newest play is named "The City," and will be first produced in New York on October 4th. He has worked two years on this play which, it is said, treats a phase of New York life in much the manner of his earlier play, "The Climbers."

The oldest customs inspector in active service last month, but now retired, was Jacob R. Riley, of New York, aged eighty-five. He bitterly resents his automatic retirement and has the word of a physician that he will probably be active till he is between ninety and 100 years old.

"Little Joe" Brown, successor to Gov. Hoke Smith of Georgia, was inaugurated June 26th in a suit of brown jeans, made of wool clipped from Georgia sheep and manufactured into cloth by a factory at Marietta, where Brown lives. Brown owes his election to the governor whom he succeeds, for Smith's action in discharging him from the railroad commission opened the way to his success at the polls.

Harison Grey Fiske has obtained the dramatic rights of W. J. Locke's novel "Septimus," which is to be dramatized by Philip Littell and produced early next season, with George Arliss in the title role. The actor has been resting in England since the close of his tour in "The Devil." Mr. Fiske announces that he also has obtained for Arliss a new play by Ramsay Morris, in which the star will have dual characters to impersonate.

Brutal Criminal Laws.

"The English criminal laws must be fairly brutal."
"What makes you think so?"
"Why, I am informed that every once in a while they send a wealthy criminal to jail."

CALIFORNIA POETS' CORNER.

[The following poem, written by Mr. Bruce Porter, the San Francisco artist, was published twelve years ago (Nov. 1897) as a love poem. "The Lord," a famous literary product of Old San Francisco. It has been republished scores of times in all parts of the world, it was set to music by A. M. Wakefield, an English composer; it was sung regularly as a chorus by one of the United States officers' messes in the Philippines during the occupation of 1897-8; and it has been chanted by a group of students in a Parisian Order of the works of Californian poets will follow. THE CREED OF DESIRE.

By Bruce Porter.

Still to be sure of the dawn,
Still to be glad for the sea,
Still to know fire of the blood:—
God keep these gifts in me!

Then I shall cleave the dark,
Then I shall breast the redoubt,
Then I shall glory the Lord—
And go down to the grave

With a shout!

The Nation's Guarantee of Good Faith.

The validity of the public debts of the United States, authorized by law, and the debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States, nor any state, shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slaves; but all such debts, obligations and claims shall be held illegal and void.

So reads Section 4 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. It was a proper and necessary amendment, not because the constitution especially needed strengthening on that point, but because the people needed to have the idea of repudiation, compromise or compounding put beyond temptation. There was, too, a danger that the states, lately in rebellion might (through feelings of that state patriotism that had carried them as nearly out of the union as they could get) so load themselves down with debts and obligations assumed by the confederacy as to cripple them and burden the rising generation. Besides, much money was owing by the Confederacy to foreign creditors and the adoption into the national constitution of this section saved the states themselves from pressure to assume any part of this debt due in foreign countries. Our government wisely took the view that whoever lent money to the confederacy did it knowing that the money would be lost if the cause was lost and it was right that it should be so.

The question of the inviolability of a national debt has always been a perplexing one. It was a great embarrassment to the makers of the constitution and to the young government at starting. The old confederation, that had fought the Revolutionary War, had created as big a debt as possible and the colonies had very generally pledged their faith for about all they were able. For these evidences of credit relatively little of value had been received, for the paper representing those evidences had greatly depreciated. Furthermore, when the war had closed these evidences had been bought up for little by speculators, and our great grandfathers were much inclined to scale these claims to the lowest terms if not to repudiate them altogether, claiming that the persons who had furnished the merchandise or services would not be the ones to receive the payment, that having parted with the promises to pay, they would go unrequited to their graves.

There was much feeling to this effect at the close of the Civil War. Whatever the government had borrowed it had to pay a high, even a usurious rate of interest for, and its paper money and its bonds had depreciated to such an extent as practically to double the cost of the war, or what would have been its cost had our country had gold enough to make payment in gold. There were those who wished our government to force what they regarded as an equitable compromise of these claims or to pay such claims in paper money rather than in gold.

There was a certain sense of equity in this claim. Speculators who had bought our evidences of debt at low prices, and had held them for their full redemption, made great fortunes, but a promise to pay involves the faith of the giver of that promise no matter who holds it and the American people wisely ordained the redemption in gold, at full face value, of every such promise and every such has long ago been redeemed.

As a consequence of this our government has since been able to borrow money at a lower rate than any other nation on earth. Its resources are known to be great and its faith as great as its resources and so, if ever war should come again, and need should arise for borrowing vast sums of money with which to carry it on, the presence in the constitution of the nation of this definite pledging of the national faith will be of inestimable value to the nation.

Twice since the Civil War has the nation refused to slave, or in any way depreciate, the value of its own promises. In 1874, 1876 and 1878, it continuously refused to pay obligations in a depreciated paper, and in 1896 it refused to pay its debts in a silver coinage that was not intrinsically worth more than half its face value. Whenever the issue has arisen, from the Revolutionary War until the present day, the United States has kept its financial faith untarnished with the happy result that it is now unquestioned. And so may it ever be!

TYPES OF BUSINESS GENIUS.

Since the death of Henry Rogers a great deal has been written about the genius for business organization which was possessed by him and his associates. One of the best illustrations of it can be found directly across the bay from San Francisco, at Point Richmond, in the great manufacturing plant of the Standard Oil company. That plant is probably worth more than $5,000,000; the best evidence of that is that the county assessor has been able to find $3,000,000 worth of property belonging to the company.

On the day Rogers was buried a flag was flying at half-mast over the office, and the workmen were given a half-day of rest. A visitor asked how many times Rogers had come to Richmond to see the vast establishment and was told he had never seen it; neither had John D. Rockefeller, Wm. Rockefeller, John D. Archbold, H. M. Flagler, or any of the men whose names are famous as managers and owners of Standard oil.

This constituted the proof of the immense organizing and executive ability of this group of men; they had their business so organized that they could safely locate a new establishment and put millions into it, without once seeing it, while the ordinary man cannot keep his business running smoothly even when he goes to view the scene of operation every day.

But, then, different captains of industry have different ways of winning success: Henry Miller, the great cattleman and landowner, for example, spends his time in riding from ranch to ranch to look after the details of business, while a Rogers or a Rockefeller makes more money by building up a perfect organization and hiring other men to attend to details thousands of miles away.

One on Judge Gray.

It is said that when Judge Wheaton A. Gray, one of the first appellate court judges of this state, was on the superior court bench in Tulare county he was called to Fresno to try a criminal case. The day was warm and some of the jurors fell asleep while the arguments were proceeding. Towards four o'clock in the afternoon Judge Gray roused the slumbers by saying in a loud tone: "Gentlemen of the jury, the district attorney has finished his argument. Now wake up and hear the charge of the court."

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Electrical, Scientific and Practical Invention for those who are Deaf or Partially Deaf.

MAY NOW BE TESTED IN YOUR OWN HOME.

Deaf or partially deaf people now may make a trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This personal, practical test serves to prove that the device satisfies, with ease, every requirement of a perfect hearing device.

This new invention renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds.

It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises and also, so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

The Human Quality.

It is the boast of jurists that "Ours is a government of laws, not of men." That sounds as though laws were immutable and that their application is an inflexible ordeal leaving no margin of variation for the human quality.

The chemist has to do with laws, not men, and so has the astronomer, the mathematician, the electrician and, in a sense, the physician. They are all struggling to find out what the law is because it is, but human laws are what humans make them, the human quality cannot be taken out of them and any attempt to apply them as natural law must be futile because founded in fallacy.

A fault with our laws and their administration is that an effort has been made to read out of them the human quality and to take out of the hands of judges the power to administer justice rather than law. Somebody must be trusted, and that somebody must be human. The justice he will administer must fall short of abstract justice, as men contemplate it when unrelated to any particular human being; but we shall do best to take our chances with the justice to be meted out by the man on the ground, the man who has both heard the evidence and seen the witnesses when they gave their evidence—the trial judge.

Our is, in fact, a government of men, not of laws. We may bind the hands of these men with laws as best we may, but as our government under Taft will be a different government from that under Roosevelt, even under the same laws, so will it ever be with the administration of the law. It will make all the difference in the world who names the judges and what judges are named. The great corporations have long understood this and acted accordingly. Why should not the people understand it and act accordingly?

Occasion, Not Cause.

There is danger lest the public mind go astray in fixing the responsibility for the killing of Carolina Bransch by that stupid imbecile, if not insane, Cunningham. The worst that can be said of the pay check system employed by Gray Brothers is that it was the occasion, not the cause, of the murder. The cause was the bloodthirsty vindictiveness of Cunningham, a degenerate subject to homicidal mania. The Gray Brothers are guilty of injustice, of predatory practices, of grinding hard those little able to resist their aggressions, but not of murder. They are not participants in that murder either in law or ethics. Cunningham is a brutal, sullen, atrocious murderer of helpless innocence and as such should either suffer the extreme penalty of the law, as a being unfit to live, or be imprisoned at hard labor, alone, in silence until he dies. The other wrong needs to be remedied and the inflictors of it condemned for that wrong, not Cunningham's. There are evidences that the public mind has suffered the lesser offense to assume the proportions of the greater. A confused public sense of justice is always calamitous, but not much to be wondered at in San Francisco, at this time

A Set-back for Non-Partisanship.

Not until the text of the decision comes to hand can it certainly be known upon precisely what grounds the supreme court of Nebraska set aside the statute providing for a non-partisanly elected judiciary, but the press dispatch warrants the presumption that it was a partisan bench that nullified the non-partisan act of legislation. It is conceivable that many gentlemen on the bench may be satisfied with the present system of judicial selection. It is much easier to have some mutual friend arrange with a corporation political boss for a party nomination than to have to go before all the people on one's record, afoot and alone as it were, with no party hurrah behind one to make one's election sure; but every man who loves justice, be he Jew or Gentile, bond or free, knows that the non-partisan principle of judicial selection is not only right but necessary to an impartial administration of justice. It will prevail even though judges array themselves against it.

Tide-water and Interior.

The contest over the interior rate issue is not settled and it should not be settled until it is settled right. It has pleased providence to establish the greatest cities on the banks of the most considerable rivers or bays, not as a whim, but for the greater convenience of trade. Under normal conditions no city so established has to ask for special privileges at the cost of any city not so situated. If conditions are so abnormal that, being located on a river or a bay counts for little or nothing on behalf of a city, the interior should not be mulcted for the abnormality. There is no reason in the nature of things why merchandise manufactured at Chicago should be shipped to San Francisco at a less cost than to Reno, and will not be any such reason until the Chicago drainage canal shall have been made a deep waterway to the gulf and the Panama Canal shall have been completed, but there is every reason why freight rates on goods manufactured in Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, our northern coast or our southern, should be much less from San Francisco to Ogden than from Chicago, New York or Boston. The greatness of San Francisco depends upon development of sea power, not in handicapping interior cities ambitious to become jobbing centers. The development of San Francisco's sea power unhappily involves the rehabilitation of the American merchant marine, for which San Francisco should be doing more than it is. That it may do more, and do it intelligently, The California Weekly has arranged for a series of articles upon the subject written by the one, among all our citizens, best able to speak and therefore having the best right to be heard. These articles should be watched for with anticipation and read with interest.

A Man with a Purpose.

The writer of this paragraph never met James H. Barry, but he can hardly remember when he has not felt that he knew and admired him. He is a man with a purpose, a purpose not centered in self, and the chief jewel in his crown of glory (and it is presumable that, unless bald headed, he by now wears such a crown) is his sincerity. His head gets off wrong now and again and he is not devoid of hobbies, but his heart is in the right place and he has an unflinching will to do and dare worthy of any cause. His Star is now twenty-five years old and, while it has not developed into a great newspaper "property" such as might cause some man of millions to wish to add it to his conquests, it is to be doubted if San Francisco has a paper that has proven a better lever in lifting the city into a higher and better life. And this not only because of the ability and sincerity and good Irish pugnacity of the writer of the Star's editorials, but because what the paper said has seldom or never been discounted by its ownership. Editor, owner, sincerity and Barry have been one and inseparable. Here is to another quarter of a century of the same!

The Trouble With Our Hospitals.

Last week mention was made in this paper of the recent renewal of scandals at the Southern California State Hospital. That particular institution should gain an unenviable reputation while others escape is to be accounted for more as a run of ill-luck than as due to a specific cause applying to that institution alone. There are three principal causes for trouble in all these institutions: Political pressure, divided responsibility and the policy of having few attendants at relatively high wages rather than, as in the East, many attendants at relatively low wages with permanency of occupation. We may not look for better things until we abolish local boards of politicians and establish a centralized Department of State Hospitals with a superintendent at the head responsible to the Governor and the Governor to the people. The Lunacy Commission is a joke.

WHAT DID THE BASTILLE MEAN?

It is a hundred and twenty years since a Parisian mob assaulted the Bastille, then in the custody of a few old inviolated soldiers, broke down the gates and turned loose such prisoners as chanced to be incarcerated therein. Of itself the incident was unimportant. The French Revolution saw thousands of incidents more sanguinary, where greater courage was displayed and greater sacrifice made. Then why has this incident overshadowed all others in French history, ancient or modern? Why has it become a landmark in the world's progress? Why has it taken its place among the few supreme events in human affairs?

The answer is, Because it marked one of the few occasions in human history where the common people rediscovered themselves and asserted themselves to be factors in government, factors to be reckoned with. That's why.

Bourbonism had dominated France for a century and a half, growing daily more arrogant, grasping, unfeeling, cruel, autocratic. Bourbonism is a constant quality in human nature. It is spawned of the possession of irresponsible power. No possessor of such power but will find the spirit of Bourbonism springing up within him and striving for the mastery. The Bastille was the symbol of that spirit, and its overthrow meant the downfall of that spirit and the assertion of the spirit of liberty going forth to seek justice and political equality.

The spirit of liberty is still seeking justice if haply it may find it. Since the fall of that Bastille a hundred other Bastilles have fallen and there are hundreds yet to be felled. They are fighting to fell one right now in far Persia. Another fell a little while ago in Turkey. A few valiant men of the Middle West are storming the gates of another within the capitol of this Great Republic where Bourbonism has entrenched itself in special privilege and is fighting to mule the multitude for the advantage of the few favored ones. That is always the purpose of Bourbonism.

We are fighting the same battle here in San Francisco where the commonality, represented by a few persons who place loyalty to country and community above adherence to a caste, is striving to establish justice, equal justice between man and man without reference to dollars. That was the fight which the French fought, and the overthrow of the Bastille was the first victory gained in a conquest waged for equality.

The Lincoln-Roosevelt League is fighting the same battle in and for the state of California, where an impudent and arrogant Bourbonism has usurped the functions of popular government and caused them to be exercised by its own hirelings for its own advantage. Bourbonism is not dead. It cannot be killed. It is as imperishable as greed, as undying as love of power. Over against it stands Liberty with a light in her hand seeking Justice, and wherever that light shines Bourbonism flees into some lurking place to abide its time and its opportunity to come forth again. It is because the Fall of the Bastille exemplifies a never-ending human conflict that the civilized world has accepted it as typifying a great and notable victory of humanity-at-large over a depraved and malignant human spirit, common in some measure to us all, companion to our lusts and greeds and predatory instincts.

Let not this fact escape the thoughtful reader: There were as many of the French nobility in the ranks of those who stormed the Bastille as in the ranks of those who defended it. All through the French Revolution this continued to be true, else that revolution could not have been even measurably successful. The most hopeful aspect of the struggle here in San Francisco, here in California, in the capitol at Washington, is the truth that the power-holding (moneyed) class is as certainly divided on the issue as was royalty and aristocracy in France.

If we see clearly what the conflict is all about, what the issues are in their fundamental spirit, we shall know where we individually belong and what our duty is to city, state and country. Whatever the form the issue may take the human conflict is always between liberty striving for justice, on the one hand, and Bourbonism striving for privilege and power, on the other. Liberty wants justice for the amelioration of the race. Bourbonism wants power for the perpetuation of the many for the aggrandizement of the few. Liberty is enlightened, but wavering. Bourbonism is stupid but steadfast.

Under which banner does the reader of this propose taking his stand? And what does he propose to do about it when he has taken it?

WHY GO ON WITH THE CASE?

Why go on with the case against Patrick Calhoun? It is manifest that a jury perfectly representative of San Francisco public sentiment will disagree on a verdict because San Francisco public sentiment is in disagreement as to what the verdict should be. The two without a man of sound mind, on the jury or off it, daring to affirm that Patrick Calhoun did not authorize the payment to Abe Ruef of that $200,000, in part for the purpose of bribing the boodle board of supervisors, and in part for enriching Schmitz and Ruef for their perfidy.

In order to secure a conviction it would be necessary for the prosecution to secure a jury without a Calhoun sympathizer on it, an achievement, under the rules of the game, beyond the bounds of probability. In order for the defense to secure an acquittal it would be necessary to secure a jury composed of nothing but Calhoun sympathizers, an achievement nearly as difficult. Then why go on with the case?

There are two principal reasons why. There are others, but these will serve. The first is that these issues should be fought until all the world comes to know why it is, if it be so, that our American judicial system cannot convict a rich man of a crime which neither he himself nor any of his partisans deny that he committed. If, under our alleged free government, there has grown up a system of monetary immunity from punishment more efficacious than anything that the privileges of royalty can afford, the world needs to know the truth that it may govern itself accordingly. The highest interests of humanity demand that this truth be made plain.

Having demonstrated the capacity or incapacity of our system of criminal jurisprudence to establish justice without respect to dollars we need to know if the system, still capable under extreme pressure of doing justice, may be so reformed or amended as to make fortunate results attainable without extreme pressure, but as of course as in other cases. Or, if the incapacity of the system be proved, then we need to know whether or not that incapacity is inherent in the system in our form of government, and if the system or the form of government, one or both, must be made to give place to another. For, as this republic could not endure half slave and half free, so it cannot endure with our growing millionaire class, evolving into an incorporated plutocracy, superior to the system of laws to which other men are held accountable.

These issues need to be fought to a finality. They have not been yet. Mr. Calhoun is rich enough, and has the needful physical and mental stamina to fight them out. San Francisco can afford to do its part. Marshallled on the side of Calhoun are all the incorporated and associated infamies of this coast. On the side of the people are all the powers of civic and moral righteousness supporting an American commonality. It should be determined which of these holds the ultimate mastery under our civilization else we shall not know whether we are bond or free until too late, if bond, to achieve our freedom. Therefore, and to these ends, let the prosecution go on until one side or the other is whipped and that right soundly.

THE MISTAKES OF JUDGE LAWLOR.

Mr. Calhoun's publicity bureau is not inactive. Its presses are not idle and its patronage of the postoffice, in the purchase of stamps, is well calculated to reduce the annual deficiency in the conduct of that department of government. It is an ill wind that blows nobody good, and the "blowing" of Calhoun coin admittedly advantages Uncle Sam's post-office.

The burden of the Calhoun publicity bureau has lately been the mistakes of Judge Lawlor. With seven men of great cunning employed to work error into the record at every crevice it would be remarkable if error were not made, but Judge W. P. Lawlor has made as few errors as any judge could.

But the Judge has made one error to which Mr. Calhoun's literary bureau probably has not called attention. The California Weekly makes bold to correct the oversight and to suggest that, in the forthcoming trial of Mr. Calhoun, he avoid that error at all cost.

The error referred to is that of permitting Mr. Calhoun's attorneys to bait, badger, prod, pinch, prick and nettle Francis J. Heney with the view of keeping him in a constant state of wrathful ebullition to the injury of the cause of justice. He should send them to jail in relays and if Mr. Heney, without proper justification, persistently oversteps the bounds of decorum he should be sent to the tanks, too, to cool off. Temperamentally Mr. Heney has much to contend with and the policy of persistently provoking disorder in the court is one that should not be tolerated for one hour. Days and nights in jail, to think it over, would prove wonderfully restraining and the public would back Judge Lawlor up in exercising the authority that in him vests for the preservation of order in his court. It might happen also that if there were fewer sensational "scraps" between counsel for the newspaper men to "play up" they would give fuller and fairer reports of what really does take place at the trial.

Taft and Tarriff In Conference.

The tariff bill will be in conference committee for another week. So will the President. His opportunity has come at last and he appears to be taking full advantage of it. If he had his ear to the ground he has heard from the public before this. It has spoken unmistakably. Only Bourbonism in Senate and House has been too deaf to hear and Bourbonism has ever been an adder. Scarcely a public journal of character, in or out of any political party, has failed of denouncing the Aldrich bill and the Aldrich method of constructing it. The people look to the President to apply all the pressure his office affords him in the interests of a tariff so modified as to decrease the cost of living to the people and prevent international combinations practicing extortion. Nothing less than this will satisfy expectations from President or party. We are all protectionists without all being extortionists. A tariff expert affirms that the Aldrich bill reduces the Dingley schedule by an average of 2 per cent. The President should insist that it be made 20 per cent. instead of two. A Yankee guess stands as good a chance of being right as the result of four months of logrolling.

This is the committee of twenty-five selected by the group of business men rounded up by the son of the Senior Hellman who heads the trust company that accepted the carpet rags as security for the loan that financed the operations of the Corkins Swindleate.

This is the sub-committee of the committee of twenty-five that was named by the group of business men rounded up by the son of the Senior Hellman who heads the trust company that accepted the carpet rags as security for the loan that financed the operations of the Corkins Swindleate.

This is the city ticket submitted to the Republican primary election by the sub-committee of the committee of twenty-five named by the bunch of business men rounded up by the son of the Senior Hellman who heads the trust company that accepted the carpet rags as security for the loan of $174,000 that financed the operations of the Corkins Swindleate.

If the voter will take the trouble to trace this carefully, step by step, the animus and genealogy of this "business men's primary ticket" back to the Corkins Swindleate, and then remember that that swindleate undertook to educate public sentiment in the interests of Calhoun and his indicted associates for a price, and labored assiduously at the task until it became so disreputable that it had to be kicked to pieces, he will plainly see what policy, purpose and personnel that ticket stands committed to. If there are men on that ticket who do not know what use is being made of them it is because they are incapable of putting two and two together in any way to make anything but twenty-two.

British Criminal Procedure.

Our third article on British Criminal Procedure comes near to explaining why the British system of administering justice is efficient while ours is not. The reader will note that if defects appear in the form of the indictment they do not invalidate proceedings unless grossly defective, and, if defects are found, they are corrected in a common sense way then and there and the trial proceeds.

It is to be noted, too, that the demurrer is not much used for, if used, it is understood to admit the truth of that which is not demurred to and the whole case hinges on the demurrer which cannot be employed, as with us, for the purpose of securing delay. This expedites the trial on its merits.

But it is with reference to the selection of the jury that this article will prove of greatest interest. Excuses for not serving on juries are seldom accepted, whereas Judge Lawlor excused several hundred veniremen for reasons which, in this country, are uniformly accepted as sufficient. The men excused would have been most likely to make good jurors.

Nor are jurors, over there, permitted to fib themselves off the panel by confessing a bias they do not feel. These two differences are, perhaps, sufficient to account for the greater efficiency of the British jury system as compared with our own.

The method of challenging and trying challenges is novel. It should be impartial and, inasmuch as the jurors are only onlookers, it ought to prove expeditious. There are peremptory challenges enough left to save the rights of Englishmen without reducing the whole proceeding to a farce as in our country. We might do likewise with good profit.

Where Adolph Sutro Erred.

Adolph Sutro meant well toward San Francisco. He meant that his wealth should do the world good—after he got through with it, not before. There is where he made his mistake. Like many another rich man he could not pry himself loose from his millions and left it to death to perform that necessary service. His daughter, Mrs. Emma L. Merritt, is a veritable Electra in wishing to do justice to her father's memory and give efficacy to his wishes. Pity it is that the other children are not all of equal nobility of mind, but if a rich man wants his wealth to do good he will do well to attend to the doing himself, as Dr. Pearson of Chicago has done. Dr. Pearson has now started to give away his last million. Having given wisely, his giving has afforded him great joy, a joy that Adolph Sutro denied himself during life and that his quarrelsome children, the lawyers and the courts, seem likely to deny him wherever he may be now that he is dead.

What If They Had Done It?

The Liquor Dealers' Protective Association of Chicago recently (quite too recently) prescribed the following rules for the government of saloons by the members of that association. They are to obey all ordinances, serve no drinks to women, stop all forms of gambling, exclude indecent pictures, drive away disorderly persons, harbor no loafers, sell no liquor to intoxicated persons or known inebriates or minors. What if all the saloon keepers had habitually obeyed all these rules and, in addition thereto, had forbidden boisterous behavior and the telling of dirty stories in their places of business? Would there be a liquor problem before the public?

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Billy Sunday, the loud-mouthed, vituperative, black guardly and blasphemous alleged evangelist, received $122.00 for a full year at Decatur, Ill.

And there was One 2000 years ago who, when the foxes of the earth had their holes and the birds of the air their nests, had not whereon to lay His head. And then the man who made two thousand dollars was Billy Sunday; the other was only Jesus Christ who, were He living to-day as He lived in the olden and the golden days of Judea, preaching to-day as He preached then, would not be permitted in any city in Christendom, and would be arrested in any city in which He appeared as a vagrant.—Sacramento Bee

At a first reading the foregoing sounds true, and that there is an element of truth in it few will deny. If any ordinary person were to attempt to save the life that Jesus lived, and to do the things that he did, it is more than likely that he would have hard luck stories to tell that would rival those of a hobo. Conventional Christianity is as certainly at variance with the religion Jesus taught as was the conventional Judaism of his day, and his criticisms of it would be hard to endure.

But Jesus was no ordinary person. His personality has been the wonder of the ages. We are indebted to mediaeval artists for our conventional concept of the Christ, and those artists were indebted to the traditional concept of the church, but the words of Jesus, as they have come down to us, and the spirit and tone of the gospels themselves, beget in the mind a concept of the Living Christ quite at variance with that of the early artists. There was a robustness of character in that personality that the artists failed to depict. There was that within him which commanded a hearing. He was an orator. Vast crowds waited upon his words. He had not where to lay his head, but he was no beggar. Every home was open to him and he lacked nothing. He had made no invitation to anyone who he could accept. He was the center of interest at every feast and when mobs of angry men surged about him he passed through the crowds unharmed, for no man durst lay hands on him. When at last he was apprehended and executed it was because he had finished his task and submitted himself to his necessary fate.

The Billy Sundays have their uses, as the Salvation Army has its place. They are voices crying such messages only as many ears are attuned to hear. Suffer them to do the work they have to do in the only way in which they can do it, and forbid them not.

Much can be said for conventional Christianity. It is not likely that the Christ would denounce it altogether or have no part or lot in it. He would shake it and fire anew the hearts of church members with zeal, but inasmuch as he would find the sick visited, the hungry fed, more than half of all the charitable work in the world done under the direction and through the instrumentalities of churches, working in His Name, it is inconceivable that his church would turn altogether from him or he from his church.

There is not today a voice preaching his gospel in simplicity and truth, with intelligence, that is lacking in hearing. If preachers are empty it is because pulpits are filled with dead timber, because those who preach lack any measure of that personality that Jesus had in such abundance as caused him to speak as never man spake. There are too many preaching whose call it was to set hens and hoo cabages. Human nature has not much changed in 2000 years and if Jesus were here now the churches would be as open to him as the synagogues were in his day, and crowds would throng to hear him as they thronged then, and never was a broader field whiter for the harvest than now.

The Bee's picture is true enough save that it left out of consideration the supreme factor of personality, the marvel of the ages. Nevertheless, the Bee's view will seem by many to be true and it was no doubt received with many hand-clappings of approval.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

American Stage for American Singers.

The American grand opera stage for American singers may soon be, if not a popular cry, at least an accomplished fact, since where the Italians and other foreigners formerly reigned supreme native talent is rapidly making its way. Andreas Dippel, the impresario for the Metropolitan opera of New York, reports that twenty-one Americans have been engaged for the coming season, and that this number is about one-third of the total of principal singers. The first includes Mesdames Nordica, Farrar, Fremstad, Fornia, Homer, Wakefield, Osborne, Hannah, Wickham, Courtney, Case, Gluck, Neilsen, Pasquali, Noria, Clark, and Snelling, sopranos or mezzo-sopranos; Messrs. Hinkley, Witherspoon, and Griswold, basses, and Hall and Martin, tenors. To secure some of these it was necessary to take them away from opera houses in Europe where they were singing successfully. There is not a first-class opera in Europe to-day, Dippel states, which has not one or more Americans in its ensemble, and in many cases Americans—as in Berlin, for instance—are the leading members. It all goes to show that there was nothing in the old idea that the American voice was not so good as the voice of Europeans.

Wealth From a Heap of Refuse.

The Trenworth copper mine, at St. Ives, Cornwall, England, has been shut down since 1886, but before that year it had been worked for a long time. One of its products which greatly depreciated the value of the copper ore, and was considered valueless, was pitchblende, and, acting upon instructions, the miners threw it away, a large heap of refuse thus accumulating. Now comes Sir William Ramsay and declares that this heap of refuse probably is fully as valuable as the copper ore from which it was taken, for the reason that it contains radium; and Sir William is the highest of authorities concerning this remarkable substance. He says that every ton of the pitchblende "might be expected to yield a quarter gram of radium." Now, a quarter gram is about as much as, if it were snuff, you might inhale at a pinch, but, at the current price of radium, it is worth $12,500. Forty tons of pitchblende thus far has been obtained from the heap, and about as much more is contained in it, or perhaps eighty tons in all. At Sir William's estimate this should yield about a million dollars' worth of radium, and, as the value of copper taken from the mine was but $570,000, it will be recognized that "the stone that the builders rejected" easily may turn out to be of more worth than all that they saved.

Grafters Out of Luck in Japan.

Somewhat, the little brown men over in Japan appear to do things, and a look in that direction at any time may prove beneficial. To illustrate the truth of the foregoing assertion: Recently the Nipponese came face to face with their first great case of legislative grafting; which might prove that they are becoming rapidly occidentalized, but that is a side issue, the real point of this narrative being found farther on. Twenty-three members of the Diet had engaged in this grafting by voting in the interest of a sugar corporation and their own pocket-books. And now comes the point. Every one of those twenty-three grafters now is imprisoned; not an appellate court has given them the wealthiest of them a new lease of liberty; not a still higher court has tossed one of them a line—they are behind stone walls, and they are likely to stay there for some time. It really seems that wealth and "pull" do not "cut much ice" with criminals in Japan. Imagine so stern a code of justice being applied to some of our graft—But, no; there are some things which we have not been reared to comprehend, and this is all the more reason why it will do us no harm occasionally to look in the direction of Japan.

Ozone to "Age" Wines and Spirits.

A recent discovery made by Victor Dorn, which is described in a technical magazine of Berlin, will be of great importance to vintners and distillers if it proves to be well founded. It consists in a process for "aging" wines and spirits by the use of ozone. Already it was known that oxygen was useful for this purpose, but it now is demonstrated that ozone is much more efficacious. Under Dorn's process oxygen, which has been introduced into a cask of liquor, is treated by electricity, which converts the oxygen into ozone, the length of the treatment depending upon the amount of alcohol in the liquor. Wines require from twenty to ninety minutes treatment, and spirits from two to six hours. The treatment has been tested, with surprising results. For example, a sour young claret which sold for $12 to $15 a hectolitre (about 26½ gallons) sold after the ozone treatment for $20, and raw brandy which had sold for $25 to $37.50 a hectolitre sold, after treatment, for from $75 to $100. As the tests appear to have been thorough, a revolution in this line of business may be impending.

Italy and Its Lottery.

Although running a lottery, as a sort of show-stopper to a governmental circus, is not generally recognized as either necessary or admirable, Italy does it, and a very neat financial plum she makes out of it. For instance, during the financial year 1907-8 she received from the gamblers in her little game $16,681,296, and she returned to them in prizes $8,028,738. She received 108 per cent., or 9 per cent. a month, on her investment, which was less than her average gain. This is a highly prosperous business, and, if the moral welfare of her subjects is not to be considered, Italy is entitled to congratulate herself. Who are the people who play this governmental lottery? Why, generally speaking, the Italian fools. This sounds harsh, but statistical facts justify the assertion. By far the heaviest investors are found in Sicily and Southern Italy, and the people emphatically are the most illiterate, and as one goes north the sale of tickets decreases in surprisingly accurate proportion to the increase in literacy. The average inhabitant of Naples (in the south) spends about three dollars a year on the lottery; in Palermo, farther north, he spends about two dollars; in Rome, Venice and Turin, yet farther north, he spends less than a dollar, while in the northern provinces, where the standard of education is decidedly highest, the average expenditure is less than 25 cents. Do not the facts demonstrate that Italy makes nearly $9,000,000 by dropping a bait skillfully prepared to lure her fools?

Human Sacrifices in Religion's Name.

Out of the oppressed and ignorant masses of Russian peasantry have sprung up to be some strange and revolting monstrosities which masquerade in the name of religion. Such a monstrosity was the Doukhorob sect, which first migrated to Canada, and then, wildly believing itself to have received a "revelation from God," denuded itself of all clothing and started another migration, which naturally terminated in convenient jails. But the latest of such sects, the Krausobosniki, discovered in Russia, is the most horrible of all. For months the police of Perm have been attempting to account for the mysterious disappearance of certain young men and girls. Recently information they received caused them to investigate the Krausobosniki. They broke into one of their places of meeting, and there, in addition to wooden idols which the people were worshipping, they found a priest brandishing a long knife before an altar on which a man lay bound. Further search revealed an adjacent cave in which the bodies of several missing people were discovered. There appears to be no doubt that these were murdered by the Krausobosniki, and there is just as little doubt that they went to their deaths voluntarily, believing that by so doing they pleased such god as they worshipped. A number of members of the sect have been arrested, and all will be prosecuted for murder.

Perhaps a Near Relative of Adam.

About a year ago the skeleton of a prehistoric man was found in a cavern in the southwestern part of France. The skeleton was considerably damaged, but since it was found scientists have succeeded in reconstructing it. They found it to be that of a young man about sixteen or eighteen years of age (at the time he passed away), with protruding jaws, receding forehead and a generally apelike appearance; in brief, possibly good, but not handsome, a fairly close approach to the "missing link." He belonged to a late interglacial epoch, and the scientists have decided that he lived on this earth about 400,000 years ago. The interesting feature of the discovery is that these are the oldest remains of a human being found since man first began to record his doings.

An Odiously Guilty Wretch.

"He was arrested for bribery, tried, found guilty, sentenced, and sent to prison."

"Do you believe that he deserved his punishment?"

"Deserved it? Well, I should say so! Why, less than a thousand dollars was involved in the transaction."

"He says that the boy is troubled with kittleptic fits. Must mean cataleptic, don't you think?"

"Well, I don't know. I understand that they are little fits and not fully developed as yet."

WORTH KNOWING.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

REVELATION.

By D. S. Richardson.

There was a song I loved but could not sing:
And all day long it haunted me, and in
The summer night I heard it as one hears.
The distant murmur of a whispering stream
In pathless woodlands hid, when stars look down.

And evermore I listened, hoping still
The melody might shape itself to notes
Of golden song my ear could grasp, my lips
Could speak, my lagging senses flood with joy

But still it moved in undertones; and still
It baffled while it calmed; and evermore
Eluded my dulled sense as dreams of bliss
Elude a lover when he startled wakes
To find his dream a phantom of the dark.

And so the years went by; and then there came

An hour of revelation when the tongues
Of field and sky and mount and wood were loosed.

And all the stars that burned along the cliffs
Broke into strains of wondrous harmony.

And I could understand the river's voice,
And know the heartbeats of the happy trees,
And what the winds were saying, and the clouds.

Dost thou remember, love, that night our cars

Awakened to the music of the spheres?

THROUGH THE YUKON AND ALASKA.

It is a good deal of bother and expense to travel between 8,000 and 9,000 miles through Alaska and the Yukon even in summer, and unless one is a trained observer, he will, after having made the circuit, return with a superficial knowledge of a very wonderful portion of this world's surface. Unless one has the wanderlust in his very bones, and time and money to spare, he will do better to let Mr. T. A. Rickard do his traveling for him, sit down in dressing gown and slippers, hear the report and look at the pictures offered in his new book bearing the above title.

For Mr. T. A. Rickard is a trained observer. He is not only a trained mining engineer and geologist but, what will be of even greater advantage to the non-technical reader, he is a trained journalist, a trained writer of simple English, and he has eyes trained to see things that most persons would not see at all, or would not know what the things they saw were if they did see them. Mr. Rickard sees, knows, and tells understandingly, and the California Weekly knows of no greater pleasure in store for anyone at all interested in Alaska and the Yukon than the reading of this book will afford. The illustrations are abundant and illuminating and the text is as fascinating as a new novel and many times as informing. There is not a dull page in the book.

Mr. Rickard takes his reading companions with him from Seattle to Juneau, seeing things by day and by night, in the light of 240 years' scattered historical incidents, through the Treadwell mines that have produced the world's $22,500,000, and its owners $10,500,000, to Skagway; over the White Pass to White Horse and down the Yukon by steamer to Dawson, seeing something every minute; through the diggings wherever there are diggings, into the lives of the people and through the workings of their government, and the development of mining methods; from Dawson to Fairbanks, down the lower Yukon to St. Michaels and to Nome and so on, by other mining districts toward home again where, inside the Golden Gate, the author contemplates San Francisco in a strain characteristic of himself which will awaken a hearty amen from many readers, and so 'tis given here:

"As the tattered veil of fog was blown southward by the morning breeze I looked at the awakening city, now radiant in the sunlight, and seemed to see the day when San Francisco should glow in the dawn of a civic regeneration and feel the bracing air of a sane patriotism before which the greed and graft, the corruption and chicanery, should be blown as a fog from the sea. Then, firmly poised on her peninsula, San Francisco shall face her destiny in proud serenity. With her back to the trails that brought her people over mountain and plain from the distant seaboard on the other side of the continent, she shall face the sunset with an earnest face. The Atlantic breakers sound faint; the surf at her feet thunders a welcome. Her eyes have caught the glow of the setting sun and in her ear is the song of the Pacific, bringing the promise of commerce with the immemorial East that has become a new West."

The foregoing is the concluding paragraph of the book. It affords a glimpse of the personality of the author, not the least attractive feature of his book, abounding in interest though all its pages are, and yet that personality, having many facets, is well glimpsed at the outset in the dedication, which we venture to quote entire, not so much to show the very human quality of the man as to give pleasure to lovers of good verse for the verses' own sake.

To John.

It was worth while to go to Nome,

To Tanana and Nuvavek,

That I might have your welcome home

And feel your arms about my neck

When you have grown to be a man

The world will seem a narrow strait.

From Singapore to Ketchikan

No shore will be inviolate.

But yours will be a nobler chance

As a voyager in realms of thought

To steer through shoals of circumstance

To isles of truth we vainly sought;

And fresh horizons you will see

Beyond the hills that shut our view,

And vistas of philosophy—

Forever old, forever new.

God give you grace and make you strong

To rise above all meaner things;

And be your life as sweet a song

As that your mother sings.

"THE CLIMBER."

"The Climber," by E. F. Benson, one of the brilliant sons of the late Archbishop of Canterbury, is a novel of English life. The leading character (one can hardly call her a heroine) is Lucia Grimson, a girl of great personal charm and abounding vitality, who, at the opening of the story, is visiting her intimate friend, Maud Eddis. Lucia's home is with two crochety old aunts in a little country town, the dullness of which she loathes, while Maud's must have a handsome house in London. The two girls had been fast friends at Girton College, Cambridge, but, as is so commonly the case, one took and the other gave all. Maud entertains the greatest admiration for Lucia's beauty, talent and vivacity, while Lucia accepts the homage as only her due. Just before Lucia returns to Brixham, Maud confesses the tender interest she feels in Edgar Comber, a man of good education and social standing. Soon Edgar, by the death of a relative, succeeds to the earldom of Brayton and a great future. Lucia, whose passion for rank, splendor and luxury is consuming, at once exerts herself to the utmost to attract the young peer and succeeds so well that ere long she has him at her feet. Maud is surprised and shocked, but her nature is so gentle and her faith in Lucia so strong that she forgives her even this treachery. Lucia makes the most of her splendid position and by her cleverness and audacity soon becomes a personage in London society. Lord Brayton, whom she married to escape from her narrow life at Brixham, has a mania for intellectual improvement, to gratify which he takes his wife on long tours to Italy, Greece, Egypt and other lands, making laborious researches into their art, history and literature. Though bored almost to extinction by his minute exactness, Lucia plays her part well and humors her husband so that he never suspects how weary she is. On their return Lucia's entertainments become the talk of fashionable society, the manners and jargon of which she acquires quickly. Among the frequent visitors at Brayton (Lord Brayton's seat) are Lady Heron, a clever woman with a past, and Charlie Lindsay, the husband of Maud. For the sake of a new sensation, Lucia begins a flirtation with Charlie and draws him on until she infatuates him. Lady Heron gives Lucia some excellent advice, based on her own hard experience, but it is unheeded. Gradually suspicion enters Lord Brayton's mind and is confirmed by many circumstances. He observes his wife's movements carefully and on the eve of a yachting trip finds her and her lover in the London mansion, which had been shut up and left in charge of a caretaker. The evidence of guilt is so conclusive that Lord Brayton brings suit for divorce, and Lady Brayton, in consideration of a handsome allowance, makes no defense. Even after this convincing proof of Lucia's innate baseness, the ever-loyal Maud, as soon as she recovers a little from the cruel blow, comes to tell her that Charlie will go away for six months and then will choose between the two women. Charlie, who had been entrapped by the wiles of an unprincipled woman, rightly goes back to his wronged wife, and Lucia, who had hoped against hope that he would return to her side, kills herself devotedly.

The story is most interesting and the character drawing is excellent. Lucia, for all her beauty and intelligence, is shallow, abysmally selfish and entirely without scruple. Eager to seize the best in life, to experience every delight, climb every tree and reach every summit, she is devoid of elemental principle or rudimentary affection. She marries her dearest friend's lover to gain a secure position in society and has not even the common decency to be a faithful wife. Dishonest to every one, even to herself, she is incapable of a generous thought, yet she is so clever that she can feign honorable emotion and friendship, and can give love to her nature that, even when she becomes a mother, her child bores her. Steeped in selfishness, she yet possesses physical and mental attractions so compelling that her old Aunt Catharine, whom she has treated abominably, offers her an asylum, and Lucia goes back to the attic in the little Brixham villa, where she dreamed her girlish dreams of wealth and luxury, and whither she returned embittered, having made shipwreck of her life.

The story is written in excellent, clear English; the dialogue is clever, the style simple and the interest sustained. It need hardly be said that the picture of high life, drawn by one familiar with it from childhood, is a convincing one.

The volume is issued by Doubleday, Page & Co. of New York, and is printed in clear type on paper of satisfactory quality.

ARTHUR INKERSLEY

The censorship of the English stage against which George Bernard Shaw has recently been bitterly railing is said to have been established as the direct result of the presentation at Haymarket of "The Historical Register for the Year 1736," a political play in which Henry Fielding, the author of "Tom Jones," satirized Walpole.

MEN WHO DO THINGS

MARSHALL STIMSON.

Mr. Marshall Stimson.

The election law provides that the polls shall open at 6 a. m.

In one of the downtown lodging-houses precincts in Los Angeles on the morning of an election a few years ago, the "push" election officers had been busy since 5:30 sharp getting the election paraphernalia in order, and nothing now disturbed the usual quietude of the early morning; the most conspicuous noise was the ticking of the electric clock in the office of the Merchants' fire dispatch, which was being temporarily used as the voting place.

In various dark hallways up and down the street, bums, floaters, repeaters and others of that ilk, whom the machine precinct manager deemed it better to "vote" before the sun came up, lurked ready for orders. Perhaps the glimpses he caught of these hallway loungers at this uncanny hour caused the young fellow who was making for the polling place to hasten. He arrived there just as the election officers were on the point of permitting the first voter to cast his ballot, while several others stood in line.

The young man looked at his watch, which showed ten minutes of six, and immediately exclaimed, "See here, what are you fellows trying to do? Don't you know it's against the law to permit voting to commence before six o'clock?" Every mother's son of an election officer pulled out his watch and showed it, and every watch marked precisely five minutes after six.

"Why, you damn old fools," cried the young fellow, "Why didn't you fix the clock while you were about it?"

All turned and looked at the clock, which registered 5:50—and the voting was immediately postponed for ten minutes.

Usually fifty votes were cast in that precinct before 6:30 a. m.—that morning less than ten were cast in the first hour. Your fixed voter and your machine precinct worker don't like to take chances with the penal clause of the election laws when one of these long-haired, impractical, silk stocking, kid reformers has his eye peeled and is in on the job.

Incidentally, the wardheeler who owned that precinct, and always "delivered the goods," was eventually made superintendent of the County Farm as a reward of merit for faithful service.

A Militant Reformer.

The young man who got up before breakfast in order to see that there was a square deal in at least one precinct that day, was Marshall Stimson, militant reformer, the subject of this sketch—not one of the dilettante sort that depend wholly on a just cause and a good candidate, but one of those who realize that only by eternal vigilance and thorough practical organization can the forces of good government hope to cope with machine tactics.

Stimson is a New Englander by birth and a Southern Californian by adoption. He was born in Cambridge, Mass., and is now in his thirty-third year. He came, or was brought, to Los Angeles when he was eleven years old and was there educated in the public schools. Then he went to Harvard, where he was a student for five years, two of which were spent at Harvard Law School. He is a lawyer by profession, but his time is pretty evenly divided between his practice, his private interests and his devotion to public affairs.

Born a Good Politician.

They say a good politician is born such and that what he learns in future years is only by way of finish. If this theory is correct, Stimson is a pretty good exemplar of it. When he attended the high school he was president of the debating club and of the school fraternity. He organized a First Voters' Club while he was still in school, during the first McKinley campaign. While he was a student at Harvard he found time enough actively to assist the good government organization in Boston by taking charge of Ward 19, a tough one, where he cut his political eye-teeth. He personally canvassed eight precincts in that campaign and organized precinct clubs in each of them. He watched, in Faneuil Hall, a recount, the result of which gave the good government forces an additional member of the school board.

Since returning to Los Angeles, in 1903, he has been pugnaciously active in every fight against the machine and for the forces of decency. He was one of the ward managers in the contest which gave Los Angeles its first non-partisan school board, ever since which time our school administration has been absolutely divorced from politics.

One of His First Fights.

He was in the thick of the fight on the Bard end of it in the Bard-Flint campaign for United States Senator, which was fought at a time when the sudden increase of Republican, and corresponding decrease of Democratic, votes at the primaries was nothing less than remarkable, and not to be accounted for except upon the theory that there were several thousand Democrats who, for some reason, had come to the conclusion that they might as well give their votes to a Republican who was a good fellow and "appreciative" as to "throw them away" by consistently voting for a Democrat who had no show.

That day the voting place in Stimson's precinct was in the City Jail building. At that time the jail building was a safer place to do a certain kind of politics than it is under our present administration. The vote was extraordinarily heavy. The precinct usually cast about fifty Democratic votes. That day only three Democratic votes were cast. It is remarkable with what chameleon-like and kaleidoscopic transformation a machine Democrat can change himself into a machine Republican, and vice versa, the slightest provocation as the occasion may require.

Some of His Enemies.

Along in the afternoon Stimson detected a particularly raw piece of fraudulent voting and, grabbing the fellow by the collar, was about to apprehend him. Just at that moment a load of the kind of cattle who pass as voters on desperate political occasions, was driven up in a "three-seater." At this crisis a scuffle was precipitated by the machine precinct manager in which the culprit was freed from the clutches of the vigilant Stimson. Shouting, "Run, you son-of-a-gun, you're pinned," the push undertrapper gave the man a shove out into the street and at the same time gave the high sign to the driver of the rig to light out with his load of "voters"; and in less than a minute the coast was clear. For this sort of work the precinct committeeman was appointed a justice of the peace by a machine board of supervisors, an office which he still graces—or disgraces.

It's a way the machine has of always taking care of its henchmen. The man whom Stimson has had to fight the hardest in his ward is a now United States marshal. Another United States district attorney, who had the hardihood actually to stand up and defend the machine in a debate with Stimson from a public platform, and who was hissed for his pains by the intelligent audience, is now assistant attorney general of the United States in Washington, D. C. They say that United States Senators have something to do with the appointment of United States marshals, district attorneys and assistant attorney generals.

The incidents related gives an idea of the kind of work Marshall Stimson has been doing; and that it is appreciated by all lovers of good government is manifested by the high esteem in which he is held. Even the rank push politicians have to respect him because he is a fighter and knows the game. It is probably safe to say that Marshall Stimson has more friends in the machine than any other man in the reform organization in Los Angeles.

OAKLAND, CAL.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Nothing, My Master.

Nothing, my Master, nothing.
My hands all empty fall.
I come from the lands where the ripe grain stands,
With never a sheaf at all.
Nothing, my Master, nothing.
I know how the harvest cry:
"Come forth and reap till your time for sleep."
Yet never a sheaf have I.
Nothing, my Master, nothing.
There were those who reaped in pain
The harvest of gold while I idly stood;
And theirs is the harvest's gain.
Nothing, my Master, nothing.
My fields all barren lie—
Save bramble and tare are sojourners there—
And empty of hands am I.
Nothing, my Master, nothing.
My sun is sinking low,
And save love's plea is heard for me,
Ah, never a hope I know.

Optimist and Pessimist.

The Progress magazine recently defined an optimist as one who "lives under a clear sky," and a pessimist as one who "lives in a fog."
Don't you believe it, Agamemnon. Those definitions do injustice to the optimist by underestimating him and to the pessimist by overestimating. This brown-and-green old planet of ours forever rolls on through alternate shine and fog, and radiance and shadow mantle optimist and pessimist alike. The difference in these two—old it is eternity-wide in its significance—is that the optimist whenever he stands in fog says, "Well, I have seen this sort of thing before, and it always gives way to a very glory of sunlight. On the whole, it emphasizes the days of shine, and is a very good thing," but the pessimist as he stands in sunshine says, "Oh dear, oh dear! I am acquainted with such weather, and it never lasts. Any minute now we may run into the shadows, for bitter experience teaches us that that is what we must expect; therefore let us weep."
This, my Agamemnon, forever is the difference between optimist and pessimist. One came face to face with a Grisly Apparition. "Aha!" cried the Grisly Apparition in exultant tones, "I have you again, have I, old girl? Well, I'll make you sick this time. You will wish once more that you never had made my acquaintance."
Thereupon, notwithstanding the shrieks of affrighted Justice, did the Grisly Apparition fall upon her, and beat her full sorely, and pommel her with great vigor, and deal her one in the solar plexus, and knock her jaw out of shape, and give her an eye so widely black that not even the bandage could conceal it, and mop the ground with her.

Then, after the Grisly Apparition had departed, chucking, on his way, did Justice pick herself up, groaning dismally. "Alas and alas!" she moaned, "I wish that somebody would inform me so that I may know this Technicality when I meet him, for he changes his shape so frequently that I cannot be sure that it is he, and it is no joy first to be used as a planet-mop and then to sew up one's wounds in time to be ready for the next trial. I wonder where I can get a byefestick for this eye. Ah, woe is me! Woe is me!"
Moral—Justice is an unfortunate old girl, and we ought to feel sorry for her.

The Opinions of Rufus.

If I wan't for the men an' women some folks are married to I don't b'lieve they'd be any excuse for divorces.
John D. Rockefeller pulled in $1,400,000 on his seventieth birthday, an' the price of gasoline was raised a cent on the same day. But I don't care; I'm fond of pork.
Praps the Lord in His wisdom keeps us poor 'cause He knows a lot of money would make us as mean as it does some other men that has it.
It's all right to cheer heroes, but I b'lieve some rangelomert orto be made to include a woman that stays home an' does the washin' while her husband's off hero'in'.
I know it's the style fer women to be willow, slender an' beanpoleish, but some of us kin stand consider'ble fat.
Speakin' of Charley Curry bein' a candidate fer governor of the state, what'll you take fer yours, boys?
'O course, my brethern an' sisters, this talk 'bout a Foolkiller is all nonsense. Ain't we still livin', an' feelin' middlin' healthy, too?
Rogers is dead, an' Harriman ain't feelin' well, an' after a while two ghosts'll meet an' catch each other. 'Where's that stuff you was scribbelin' after?' an' there won't be no ans'er.
Oh, if we only knowed how to skip in es easy es we know how to tell others to do it, what a gratifyin' world this would be, my b'loved hearers!

If you kin watch the rush fer the best place on a ferry-boat an' still b'lieve in altruism, I judge that your faith is likely to make you hull.

Failure? Nay, Listen.

Failure? Who says it? I know he built N' James, an' carved his name
On a granite slab 'neath a dome of gilt
In the muttable Hall of Fame;
But he loved his kind, and he loved no less
E'en him whom the world reviles,
Striving the sorrowing ones to bless;
And his epitaph's writ in smiles.
Failure? 'Tis written, and yet I know
Tears that he wiped away;
Ay, that no bus was waiting low
For him on his burial day.
Ah, low is the mound where he slumbers deep,
With never a shaft above,
But perhaps he knows, in his peaceful sleep,
It is wet by the tears of love.

Failure? God judge us more wisely than we,
Who worship the idols we build,
Whose victors may swim through the desolate

Of tears that their victims have spilled.
He lived and he loved, and his pity fell sweet
As dew from the spaces above.
Failure? Nay, listen! The angels repeat:
'He won by the might of his love.'

Thoughtful Man on the Next Mayor.

"If you ask me who should be the next mayor," said the Thoughtful Man, "I answer in unmitigable and clarion accents, 'Coroner Leland. He is the man.' If you ask me why this choice, I answer, in still more clarion accents, 'Because of his beautiful sympathy with the unfortunate and oppressed.' I, myself, am a sorrowing sympathizer with the unfortunate and oppressed, for in these bitter times of graft prosecutions they scarcely can tell from day to day whether their stocks and bonds will be above or below par. 'Tis at such time that Coroner Leland, who could be prevailed upon to be mayor, steps nobly to the front."

"There had been a little social gathering at which brave women and fair men—I mean brave men and fair women—were present, and one of the women had shot herself accidentally, or committed suicide, or been no; there might have been other suppositions if those present had been of the canaille, but they were so well off as to be classed among the wealthy.

"Great heavens!" says the fairest of the brave men, "This is terrible! What shall I do? It is almost certain to interfere with my business, for I have an urgent call to the south."

"Alas, alas!" says the bravest of the fair men, "How shocking! And I, too, have business matters which demand my immediate attention. Madam," he says, turning to the sole surviving woman, "if you kindly will stay here and look after the late departed, we also will depart. We hate to leave you thus, but you know how insatiable are the demands of business."

"Yes, indeed, they are very insatiable," says the fair man.

"So the fair men, leaving the brave woman"—of course, I mean the brave men, leaving the fair woman alone in that house of horror, dropped in to see Coroner Leland.

"There was a little incident occurred down here this evening," says one of them, naturally adopting that tone of innate refinement which only the cultured can adopt.

"What was it?" says the coroner. "Boy, be sure that my suitcase is properly packed."

"Why," says the spokesman, "in the course of an evening of gaiety a woman shot herself, or committed suicide, or—anyway, she's dead."

"That's unfortunate," says the coroner. "Boy, is my gipsack all ready?—Was she in good society at the time? I'll have to hurry, or I'll miss my train."

"She was in the best of society," was the answer; "we ourselves were present."

"Oh, well, in the midst of life we are in death," says the coroner. "You'd better mention the circumstance to anybody who appears to be interested, if there are such. I really must hasten, or I won't get to Santa Cruz. S'long!"

"Ta ta," says the men, and departed to look after their business affairs.

"How could a person give Coroner Leland too great praise for the nobility he thus displayed? He might have made trouble for the fair men who left that brave woman alone with the dead, but, instead—and being in a hurry to get to Santa Cruz, too—he sympathized with them and did not interfere with their business. Such sympathy is needed in the mayor's chair. It is especially needed in these times of trial and other preparations for appeal. It's me for Leland. Don't you say so?"

But I explained that, having been born deaf and dumb, I could say nothing.

Better Far to Tumble Up.

Know a man that tumbles, an' if 'tumblein' was a crime
I guess he'd be in prison, for he tumbles all the time
Stubs his toes, an' meets with blows when he falls down flat,
But he gets right up an' goes ahead for all o' that.
Shins are covered o'er with scars, bruises on his knee,
But he keeps a-tumblein' on, happy as can be,
An' he keeps a-risin', too, though the gain is small—
Better far to tumble up than not get up at all.

See the moral, do you, friend? Notice that it's plain?

Though your crooked pathway leads to the stumbler's pain;
Though your shins with scars are decked—not a pretty sight—
And your latest plans are wrecked in abysmal night.

You may up and on again, though you wince with pain;
Looking backward o'er the course, you may say, "Gee, how I got here!"

Somewhat higher you have pressed, though your hill be small—
Better far to tumble up than not get up at all.

THE JOLLY OLD PEDAGOGUE.

By George Arnold.

'Twas a jolly old pedagogue, long ago,
Tall and slender and sawly and dry;
His form was bent and his gait was slow;
His long, thin hair was as white as snow.
But a wonderful twinkle shone in his eye;
And he sang every night as he went to bed:
'Let us be happy down here below—
The living should live, though the dead be dead.'

Said the jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

He taught his scholars the rule of three,
Writing and reading and history, too;
He took the little ones on his knee,
For a kind old heart in his breast had he,
And the wants of the littlest child he knew.
'Learn while you're young,' he often said;
'There's much to enjoy down here below;
Life for the living and rest for the dead!'
Said the jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

With the stupidest boys he was kind and cool,
Speaking only in gentler tones;
The rod was hardly known in his school—
Whipping, to him, was a barbarous rule,
And too hard work for his poor old bones.
'Besides it is painful,' he sometimes said;
'We should make life pleasant down here below—
Joy for the living and peace for the dead!'
Said the jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

He lived in the house by the hawthorn lane,
With roses and woodbine over the door;
His rooms were quiet and neat and plain,
But a spirit of comfort there held reign.
And made him forget he was old and poor.
'I need so little,' he often said;
'And my friends and relatives here below
Won't litigate over me when I am dead,'
Said the jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

He smoked his pipe in the balmy air
Every night when the sun went down,
While the soft wind played in his silvery hair,
Leaving his tenderest kisses there,
On the jolly old pedagogue's jolly old crown;
And feeling the kisses, he smiled and said:
'Twas a glorious world down here below—
Why wait for happiness till we are dead?'
Said the jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

He sat at his door one midsummer night,
After the sun had sunk in the west,
And the lingering beams of golden light
Made his kindly old face look warm and Bright,
While the odoriferous night wind whispered
'Rest!'
Gently, gently, he bowed his head—
There were angels waiting for him, I know;
He was sure of happiness, living or dead—
This jolly old pedagogue, long ago.

MEREDITH'S LETTERS.

An interesting legal and literary dispute seems certain to arise over the letters of the late George Meredith and the case is bound to attract attention. The London solicitors of the Meredith executors have issued a statement calling attention to the fact that the copyright of all letters written by Meredith is now vested in the executors. It will be recalled that there was a dispute over the ownership of the letters written by Charles Lamb, but then the courts decided that the owner of a letter was the proprietor of the paper with the words written on it and not the proprietor of the composition independent of its inscription. Yet the same court later made the decision, in another case, that the possessor of the letters written by a person now dead is not entitled to publish them, either in full or in part, without the consent of the executors. The law appears to be mixed, and the matter will doubtless be taken into the courts again, as Meredith was a voluntary letter writer, and there will be those who wish to make money from his correspondence.

In any event, we shall get the letters, sooner or later, which is the public's main interest. And they should prove mightily entertaining reading.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

One Reason Why Appropriations Grow

In the Washington correspondence of one of the dailies it is announced that Speaker Cannon has decided not to appoint Congressman Knowland of California upon the Naval Committee, although Knowland wants the place in order to be able to work more effectively for Mare Island navy yard, which is in his district. But it is Cannon's policy not to have the Naval Committee made up of members representing navy yard districts, because that would not be consistent with economy of expenditure. This watchful regard for economy, even to the point of antagonizing half the politicians in Congress, explains why Speaker Cannon is strong in spite of churches, labor unions and newspapers, and it is well worth while to compare his policy in the make-up of committees with that which prevails in the California legislature. One of our state Senators or Assemblymen has no difficulty in getting appointed on the committee which will enable him to do most effective work in getting appropriations for the state institution located in his district, and that is one reason why appropriations grow by leaps and bounds.

A Good Working Member Preferring What's Right

The same correspondent who is quoted in the foregoing adds that other California Congressmen will fail in securing committee appointments for which they had hoped; they will generally retain their old places instead of being promoted. Congressman Needham, who is on the Ways and Means Committee, is the only Californian who holds a place which is looked upon with envy. In the tariff contests of the present session Needham has used his advantage with not a little effect to protect California interests, and yet he is a representative who outside of his district is comparatively little known. A tribute which citizens ought to pay to a representative who is doing good work for them is to become interested in him to the extent of knowing something about his personality. Needham is a young man, and a rather quiet, unassuming one. At home he has been inclined to independence in politics, but in Washington he has adhered closely to the party policy as defined by the caucus. If not a shining example as a reformer, Needham is a good working congressman who has a marked preference for the right side of things.

Expert Salaries

The State Board of Prison Directors did a rather queer thing recently when they increased the salaries of the wardens of San Quentin and Folsom prison from $3,000 to $5,000 a year. In reality the new salary amounts to something like $7,000 a year, because the wardens are given residences rent free, have trustees for house servants and are allowed subsistence to the extent of $100 per month. Leaving out of consideration the question whether $5,000 with all of these other things thrown in is not an excessive salary both absolutely and in comparison with the pay of other state officers, it is doubtful whether the new move will do anything for the permanent elevation of the service. Whenever a new governor comes into office a strong effort is made to have the prison wardens treated as spoils of war, and too often it succeeds, as in the instance of Warden Yell of Folsom, who was removed for political reasons about a year ago. With the salary so largely increased, the fight for the offices will be fiercer than ever. But the paramount consideration is this: If California is going to pay fancy salaries for prison wardens, it ought to have men of ripe experience, the best there are in the business, and as a matter of fact she has two wardens who, though they seem to be promising material, are mere novices as yet.

A Premium Placed Clío Lloyd, well known On Appropriations

as chief clerk of the legislature in session, has been made the heart of the board of directors of the new state manual training school—if that is what it is to be located in Santa Barbara. Mr. Lloyd, a resident of Santa Barbara, is an efficient political hustler, and he will see to it that the new institution, the necessity for which does not appeal to a good many persons who ought to know a little something about it, obtains all of the appropriations it can use conveniently. This is the way California does. It establishes a state institution, needed or unneeded, and puts it under government into the hands of a local board, which booms the institution as a matter of local patriotism. A big show of buildings, inmates, teachers and attendants is what the local spirit calls for, and the taxpayers—not the local tax-payers but those of the state at large—pay the bills.

Will Prove Profitable Unless Politics Gets In

The new state banking department has gone into operation under conditions which hold out a hope of good work, and there is a general feeling that Superintendent Alden Anderson will administer the law with fairness and discretion. But he has some knotty questions to solve, including the division of the capital stock of banks which propose to do both a commercial and a savings business, and which, under the terms of the law, must have a certain amount of capital behind each department. Incidentally, the new department will be considerably more expensive than the old one, which used to spend from $30,000 to $35,000 a year. The new department starts off with a salary of $10,000 for the superintendent, $4,000 for chief deputy, $3,000 each for four examiners, and other assistants to a total cost of $29,000 a year, and traveling, rent and general office expenses are likely to add $12,000 to $15,000 more. All of this money comes out of the banks, which are assessed to pay the cost of the department. Of course the national banks, not being under the jurisdiction of the department, pay no part of the cost, and at the rate at which state banks are now being nationalized, those remaining on the old basis will have quite a little burden to carry. But they can probably afford to stand the raise in view of what an efficient department will mean to them.

The Prison Brigade Being Rapidly Recruited

The State Board of Charities and Corrections has issued its July statistical report, from which it appears that on the first day of the month there were 1,314 prisoners in San Quentin and 1,029 in Folsom, or a total in both of 2,343. This is an increase in one year of 164 prisoners, a statement which standing by itself might not appear in any way alarming, but its aspect changes when you stop to think that if this rate of increase should be kept up in a little more than six years California would have another thousand prisoners to feed and care for. If comparison is made with the record of two years before, the recent growth in the number of prisoners becomes almost startling, for in that two years the total increase was only seventy-eight, or 3.9 per cent a year. What strange epidemic of crime has broken out in the last year which has so recruited the prison brigade in spite of the efforts which have been made to reduce it through probation and more liberal granting of paroles?

Department of Engineering Governor Gillett is to be the Whole Thing has opened the $18,000,000 road bond issue by a speech at Santa Barbara, in which he talked convincingly of the benefits to be expected from the establishment of good roads on a state-wide plan. It is an excellent idea to begin this discussion early, because the proposal is a formidable one by reason of its magnitude, and because there are quite a number of things which the people will desire to have explained. Among these is the extraordinary centralization of authority provided for in carrying out the good roads scheme. In the first section of the law it is written that there shall be a state highway system constructed or acquired "as and in the manner provided by law by the Department of Engineering of said state at a cost not to exceed $18,000,000." This is the keynote and really constitutes a synopsis of the whole law, for the Department of Engineering is to be the whole thing.

Who Constitutes This Department? For example: "The route or routes of said highways shall be selected by the Department of Engineering." Again: "The Department of Engineering shall have full power and authority to purchase all supplies, material, machinery and to do all other things necessary or proper in the construction and maintenance of said state highway." It is to have all the power and is not to be restricted by any forms and conditions of doing the business; at least none are mentioned in the act. And who constitutes the Department of Engineering? According to the statute of 1907, it is "to consist of an advisory board composed of the governor as ex-officio member and chairman of said board, and a state engineer, who shall be the chief executive officer of the department, the general superintendent of state hospitals, and the chairman of the State Board of Harbor Commissioners of San Francisco."

Power Centralized To the Limit

The chairman of the Harbor Commission may as well be counted out, for since the law of 1907 was passed, the Harbor Commission work has been taken out of the jurisdiction of the State Engineer, and the chairman of the commission is not likely to act on the advisory board. Then the general superintendent of state hospitals, who is a medical man, cannot be expected to concern himself with or know about engineering works unless they relate to his department. So the Department of Engineering is readily reducible to the governor and the state engineer whom he appoints, and naturally the governor, who is not likely to be an engineer, and who has a thousand other things with which to busy himself, must trust to the state engineer for his information and usually for his conclusions. All of the responsibility, not only for the technical, professional work, but also for the business administration of this great undertaking is thrown upon one man. If in the mutations of politics a dishonest man, or an incompetent one, should be made state engineer the opportunities for graft or for disastrous blunders would be limitless.

Under the management of JAMES WOODS

Let the Discussion Be Full and Free A study of the act proposing this big enterprise, and submitting it to the people of California for their approval, shows that it is peculiar in several respects besides those already mentioned. It fills five pages in the statute book, but most of the space is taken up with minute provisions with regard to the bonds or the terms of the election when the vote is to be taken, and only about forty lines are devoted to the selection of routes, the planning and construction of the system of roads and the subsequent maintenance. Practically everything is to be left to the Department of Engineering, which, as we have seen, means the state engineer. It may be said that if the people vote the $18,000,000 of bonds, the next legislature will by legislation provide for satisfactory ways of doing everything; but here arises a novel question of law, for possibly it may not be in the power of the legislature to alter conditions established by an act which, so far as the bond issue is concerned, has been voted upon and ratified by the people. At the very least, it would be awkward to do this. Attention is called to these things by The California Weekly not for the purpose of antagonizing the undertaking but principally to expedite a discussion which is bound to come.

"Business" in Solemn Role With lumbering solemnity the so-called Business Men's Republican League of San Francisco has gone through the motions of organizing and appointing a president to appoint a committee to appoint candidates for the Republican nomination for municipal offices at the approaching primary election. The outcome of all this solemnity is merely the endorsement of the machine candidates that have all along been in the field under the political tutelage of statesmen like Tim Sullivan. This result was universally discounted by the personnel of the Business Men's League, three-fourths of whose members have always been identified with the machine push.

Who Crocker Is, and His "Business" Backers William Crocker is the machine-plus-business candidate for the mayoralty nomination. Mr. Crocker made a handsome fortune in the planing mill business in San Francisco, from which business he retired shortly after the fire to pursue the elegant leisure of a capitalist whose principal income is now derived from the rents of extensive residence properties in the Western Addition. He is not related to "the Royal Family" of Crockers who own the Crocker National Bank nor to the Crockers of stationery fame. He is just William Crocker, retired, but not retiring, for close acquaintances believe that he has simply yielded to a desire for the limelight in his ambition to be mayor. He yielded, however, in a bad direction, for his first political sponsor was Tim Sullivan, one of the oldest of machine politicians, and his latest support is from the Business Men's League, which is engineered by I. W. Hellman, Jr. The meaning of this latter support is indicated by the editorial entitled "The House That Hellman Built," which appears on an earlier page of this paper. In addition to the sufficiently disengaging connection there shown to exist between Mr. Hellman, Jr., and the Calkins crowd, it is pertinent to point out that Mr. Hellman, Sr., is the treasurer of three street railways in Los Angeles of which railways William F. Herrin of San Francisco is vice-president, which seems to link up the Southern Pacific with the rest of Mr. Crocker's friends political.

Mauzy's Candidacy In Good Condition Byron Mauzy's candidacy is, fortunately, meeting with popular support that seems to augur well for his success against Crocker at the primary. Though Mr. Mauzy has stood consistently for the graft prosecution and for reform government, he has still a strong following among the rank and file of the regular organization, and this support is standing by him in the face of Crocker's candidacy. There are, indeed, three other candidates in the field against him: R. H. Countryman, D. J. Graumann, and Edward D. Keil; but no one seriously considers them.

Leland McNab's Mayoralty Choice It now seems certain that the McNab "regular" Democrats will be strong enough, as usual, to nominate Coroner T. B. W. Leland for mayor on the Democratic ticket. Supervisor Ralph McLeran has the support of the independent Democrats, but will probably fail to get the nomination. Former supervisor Edward R. Rock also has announced his candidacy for the Democratic nomination; but McNab's man for the place is still Leland.

The District Attorneyship The fight for district attorney seems to have simmered down to Charles M. Fickert (called "Cold Feet" Fickert at Stanford) as the representative of the "business" Republicans aforementioned. The Municipal League of Independent Republican Clubs left this place on the ticket vacant so as not to interfere with Henry's independent candidacy. Not so the "business" men. Gentlemen who own Spring Valley bonds, and who are business associates of S. P. attorneys, do not want to encourage Henry's candidacy, naturally enough. It "hurts business," they think.

"Miss Jeanette Alice Marie Evans of Topeka and Miss Katherine Catherwood Lane Jones of St. Joe are visiting Miss Louise Hyde-Brownfield Peats, at number seven hundred and thirty-four Lincoln street." The way it appears in the paper: "Misses Jennie Evans of Topeka and Kate Jones of St. Joe are visiting Miss Lou Peats."—Aitchison Globe.

ENGLAND'S BETTER CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

III. HOW THE JURY IS SELECTED IN ENGLAND.

Written for The California Weekly by An English Attorney.

[This article is the third of a series to be published in The California Weekly, contrasting the procedure in the criminal courts of England with the Californian procedure and showing why the English system results in a nearer approach to even handed justice without the expense and delay of the American system. The method of administering justice shortly before England discarded that method for a better one. America has duplicated a cumbersome system while England has simplified a better system. The reform of criminal procedure in California is the most urgent problem of the day, and this article, together with those to follow, will be illuminating to all readers. They have been prepared for The California Weekly by an eminent member of the English bar who now resides in San Francisco, and may be relied upon as an authoritative statement of the facts.—The Editor.]

Instead of pleading the general issue, the defendant may, after the indictment has been read to him, plead that he has been "formerly acquitted" of the same crime or that he has "formerly been convicted" of the same crime. These pleas are made orally and are proved by producing a certified copy of the record of acquittal or conviction. If this plea fails the prisoner is allowed to plead over in all felonies, not however in misdemeanors.

The only other two pleas allowed are a "demurrer" to the indictment or a "motion to quash" the same. These pleas are made for all defects apparent on the face of the indictment but they are now seldom resorted to as the defect be formal or not material to the merits of the case, and not prejudicial to the defendant, the indictment may be amended at once and the trial proceeds under the Act of the 7th of August, 1851.

Sweeping Aside Technicalities.

This Act provides that as offenders frequently escaped conviction on their trials by reason of the pleadings of the defense, criminal proceedings in matters not material to the merits of the case, and as such technical strictness could safely be relaxed so as to ensure the punishment of the guilty without depriving him of any just means of defense, and as a failure of justice often takes place by reason of variances between the statement in the indictment and proof of matters not material to the merits of the case, the court may amend the indictment and proceed with the trial where a variance appears in the names of counties, or persons, or persons, or bodies politic or corporate or in any description of the person whatever, or in the description of any matter or thing described in the indictment. Nor shall any indictment be insufficient for want of the averment of any matter unnecessary to be proved nor for omitting to state the time, if time is not the essence of the offense (as in burglary), nor the value or price of an article or thing if not of the essence.

Indictments Nearly Error-Proof.

No indictment is now held insufficient for want of such averments as "against the form of the statute," "with force and arms," "against the peace," etc. An indictment must, however, contain an averment of every fact necessary to constitute the criminal charge preferred by it, but if on the trial it appear from the evidence that the defendant did not complete the offense charged, the jury can return a verdict that he is guilty of an "attempt to commit" the offense, and, further, an accessory before the fact to any felony may be indicted in all respects as if he were a principal felon. If a person is indicted for "obtaining property by false pretenses" he may not be acquitted if the facts amount to larceny.

An indictment in the words of the statute is a good indictment and all unnecessary technical verbiage is to be avoided, nevertheless it sometimes occurs that indictments are, even now, prolix and redundant.

Pleas Delay by Demurrer.

Demurrers are seldom resorted to in criminal cases for the reason that a demurrer admits all the material facts charged against the prisoner in the indictment and relies alone upon the question of law whether the facts, as stated, constitute a crime. If the demurrer be overruled the judgment on the demurrer in misdemeanor is final, and "plea over" is allowed only by permission of the court; in felonies which are not capital (that is, punishable by death) it is doubtful whether even the court can permit the accused to plead over; in cases of capital felony, however, the accused may still plead not guilty after judgment against him on demurrer.

Where an indictment is so defective that in case of conviction no judgment could be given thereon, it may be "quashed," or the judge, upon without objection, may refuse to try an indictment which is clearly bad.

Demurrers being dangerous and amendments easy, the accused will, unless the indictment is plainly defective, usually plead not guilty. No objection to an indictment for a defect apparent on its face can be taken after the jury has been sworn.

Postponements of trials are seldom or never granted except in extreme or absolutely necessary cases.

Method of Challenging Jurors.

The judge having ordered a jury, the prisoner is informed by the officer of the court that the persons he is about to call will form the jury, and he is asked to try him, and that he is at liberty to challenge them, or any of them, as they come to be sworn and before they are sworn. Challenges may either be to the "array," that is the whole jury as it stands arrayed in the "panel," which is an oblong parchment upon which the jurors' names, addresses and occupations are written, or to the individual persons or heads in the "array." Challenges may be either peremptory or for cause.

Insuring Jury Service.

When the jury is called it has been already weeded out at petty sessions and those that are returned to the court are those who have been stricken from the panel. Not more than 144 jurors attend the assizes on their respective circuits, to serve indiscriminately in civil and criminal trials: these jurors have been divided into two sets, one of which is to attend at the beginning and the other at the end of the assizes, and the sheriff has informed each juror in his summons to which set he belongs and at what time his attendance will be required. Jurors not attending, without reasonable excuse, when summoned ten days before the trials, are fined by the court. Excuses in the courtroom on the ground of press of business, important family affairs, etc., are unknown. A copy of the panel containing the names, residences and occupations of the competent jurors is kept in the sheriff's office for the inspection of parties and their attorneys.

The names of the jurors summoned, having been written on tickets, are put into a box and, when each case is called, twelve of the persons, whose names are first drawn, are sworn on the jury unless absent, challenged or excused. A juror may be summoned by mail and the same jury may try several cases unless objected to by the judge, or by either of the parties, in which case a fresh jury is drawn from the names remaining in the box.

Challenges to the "Array" and "Poll."

A challenge to the "array" is an exception at once to the whole panel, which may be on the ground of partiality or default in the sheriff, or his deputies who arrayed the panel, such as kindred, affinity, or favor.

Challenges to the "poll" are exceptions to a particular juror and may be made on several accounts, as that he is not duly qualified according to the statute, or that he is infamous or degraded in law, etc. Challenges may be made for favor, as where the party has no direct cause of challenge but objects only on some suspicious circumstance such as intimate acquaintance, or the like.

Wherever a challenge either to the "array" or to the "poll" is made it must be decided by two "Triers" appointed by the court for that purpose, they must be two indifferent persons and are usually chosen from the attorneys, coroners, or jurors. If no juror has yet been sworn, the triers are appointed to hear the first challenge. The opposing party may demur to the challenge and the challenging side must make proof of the matter alleged as cause of challenge, by witnesses, to the satisfaction of the triers. Both sides to the challenge address the triers and call witnesses. The judge then sums up, that is delivers a charge, to the triers who thereupon decide upon the impartiality, or otherwise, of the juror objected to. Upon a challenge to another juror, any juror who has been passed and sworn, becomes a trier, taking the place as one of the triers of the first juror, and so each juror sworn becomes in turn a trier—sometimes the first two jurors sworn try all subsequent challenges.

There are but few challenges in English trials.

"Expression of Opinion" No Disqualification.

A juror challenged may himself be examined as to his qualifications, but he cannot be asked if he has not previously expressed himself hostilely to the prisoner, in order to found a challenge. That must be proved by some other evidence, and remarks by a juror concerning the accused or concerning the case must be more than an "expression of opinion" in order to constitute a cause of challenge; they must lead directly to the conclusion that the juror is not likely after he has heard the evidence to give an impartial verdict. In challenges it is not a question of whether or not the juror has formed an opinion, or given an opinion and would not be able to give an impartial verdict, but, whether, after he has heard all the evidence, he would be likely to act impartially, in other words, he may have come to a conclusion from reading or hearing distorted versions of the case, or he may have a little or no knowledge of the facts of the case, or of the evidence to be produced, and after hearing the sworn testimony of credible witnesses, and learning the true facts from proofs offered, or testimony given, he may be entirely capable of rendering an impartial verdict. Of course personal enmity to the prisoner would no doubt disqualify him as he would, perhaps unconsciously, be influenced by his feelings.

Lastly, a juror may challenge himself on the ground of his title, office, profession, or for some other cause of exemption, but exemption is a personal privilege and does not disqualify if not claimed.

Peremptory Challenges.

In trials of treason or felony a jury may be challenged by the prisoner without assigning any cause. This is an indulgence granted the accused in tenderness to those sudden impressions and unaccountable prejudices which persons are apt to conceive on the bare looks or gestures of a stranger; but to such capricious and unexplained ground of objection, a reasonable limit must be assigned. This is settled by the common law at thirty-five, that is to say, one less than the number of three full juries, but now by statute, no person arraigned for murder or felony has more than twenty peremptory challenges; in cases of treason, however, the prisoner is still allowed thirty-five peremptory challenges. If by means of challenges, or for any other cause, a sufficient number of unexceptional jurors have not been sworn, either party may pray "tales," in which case the sheriff adds to the names on the panel such proper persons as are qualified and are first found in the courtroom or neighborhood and these persons are also subject to challenge in the same way as the principal jurors.

The prosecution has the right to challenge but the attorney general may order any juror to "stand by" and is not obliged to challenge for cause unless a sufficient number of jurors cannot be obtained without including those so standing aside, in which case their names are called over again and he may challenge any, or all of them separately, for cause.

In addition to the common jury the special juries in England which were originally introduced in trials at law when the cases were of too great a nicety for the adjudication by ordinary freeholders. Either party is entitled, upon motion, to have a special jury on the trial of any case whether civil or criminal, excepting only cases of treason or felony; the party demanding this special jury pays the extra fees and expenses unless the judge certifies on the record that the cause required a special jury. Every man whose name is in the jury book and who is a person of the standing of merchant or banker, or similar or higher status, or who occupies a dwelling house, rated at not less than $500 or a farm rated at not less than $1,500, is qualified to serve on a special jury. It is possible by the mutual consent of the parties to nominate a special jury.

Angles. And it is equally safe to say that if office, or personal advantage, or political success, measured by current standards, was what he was after all he would have to do would be to go into the machine camp, where he would be welcomed with open arms. But he could no more do that than desert his charming young wife and children. Stimson belongs with the progressives; the fight to free our government from the grasp of a greedy plutocracy is part of his life and he would rather lose a thousand times on the side of right than succeed by the compromise of principle.

A Founder of Lincoln-Roosevelt League.

He was one of the mere handful of young fellows who organized the original non-partisan campaign for municipal offices in the fall of 1906, and who are primarily responsible for practically all that has been accomplished for reform in local and state politics in Los Angeles and Southern California.

He was one of the leading organizers of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League and of the City Club of Los Angeles, and is now a director of the Los Angeles chamber of commerce and a member of the executive committee of the Los Angeles Municipal League. He has been a delegate to conventions and a member of campaign executive committees too numerous to mention.

In appearance, Stimson is of medium height, slight build, and sharp featured, with any eye like an eagle and a chin that is a protuberance of determination.

When he goes into a campaign, he works so hard and is so intense that he is as like as not to wear himself to a frazzle, but he never quits as long as he has strength to keep going. He has been laid up for a month at a time with a severe illness as the result of too strenuous unselfish political activity. Though he is still a young man he has an old head on his shoulders. He is one of the few men who have lots of ideas and yet can sit still and listen to a discussion for an hour in an executive session without opening the mouth, but when he does speak his judgment, as might be expected, is all the better for not having gone off half-cocked, and he is listened to with all the more respect.

He is not an office-seeker, but has been induced as a matter of duty to make a try for the legislature on two occasions—once for the assembly and another time for the state senate. He was defeated for assemblyman by a few votes, running as a non-partisan in a strongly Republican district, because the machine refused to give him the Republican nomination, but chose instead one of the gang from the "bloody Eighth" ward who knew how to take orders. He was defeated for nomination for state senator because—well, to make a long story short—because the machine had more votes than the Lincoln-Roosevelt. He has come out of these contests stronger than ever, and probably no man in the reform forces in Los Angeles today stands higher, or is more highly respected than Marshall Stimson—more power to his elbow!

Gang Awa!

Prior to the earthquake and fire the California supreme court held its sessions in the Parrott building, except when, twice a year, the judges made their regular trips to Los Angeles and to Sacramento. Early on forenoon after a semi-annual visit to Los Angeles, Chief Justice Beatty presented himself at the elevator in the building named, when the brisk young elevator boy saluted him with a friendly, "Well, judge, back again! Are the rest of the gang with you?"

[We feel at liberty to publish Mr. Kent's intensely modern version of the Homeric story on our fiction page because, as Mr. Kent points out, the original is one of the finest pieces of story-writing ever done in any age, and further because, as we would point out, Mr. Kent has made the old story a genuine modern piece of adventurous fiction by the way he has retold it. The Editor.]

IN choosing a title "Some Sides of Homer," I am going to take up Homer from the standpoint of the every-day story reader. With all due appreciation of the loss he suffers who wandered into English, it is my purpose to deal with him, as we find him, in the prose translations of Lang and his conferees.

Lang's sonnet gives us a bold figure, descriptive and appreciative:

Homer, thy song men liken to the sea,
With every note of music in its tone,
With tales that wash the firm dominion
Of Hades, and light waves that laugh in glee
Around the isles enchanted: nay, to me
Thy verse seems as the River of source unknown
That glazes Egypt's temples overthrown.
In his sky-murals, and his sea-murals,
No wonder thy man men of heretofore
To find thy mystic fountains guarded fast;
Enough, thy tide, to reach our human shore.
As Nilus, Egypt, rolling down his vast,
His fertile wastes, murmuring evermore
Of gods, distressed, and empires of the Past.

Those who go down to that river with vessels fill them all, every one.

Some go down with trimbles and come back with their brimming over with "lost di gammas" that look like wigglers.

Pitchers come back laden with linguistic peculiarities and archaic forms that show the development of language.

Some there may be who, coming back, pour Homer out through the little holes of a sprinkling can, which they call scholarship. Then every traveler's yarn is an allegory, and they would rather have a drawing by some old barbarian who made his curves with a rule and his straight lines offhand, than such artistic portrayal as our best painters might give us.

Let us take down the family washbub, which we will borrow for the time. That is the way to take the family into English if we read no Greek, but undiluted, and all we can get.

We can conceive of men who, with a serene, scholastic lack of humor, laugh at Homer's one notorious pun, made to a poor, blind monster who could not see the point, argue at the same time that nothing funny in situations that are irresistible.

I trust that we may find some fun in our draught. Human old Homer would wish it. He is so true in his portrayals that if we look into our washbub with an appreciation of humor we are sure to find it there.

It is impossible to do the subject justice—most of all for a man who is no scholar. Matthew Arnold came nearest it. Read again his essay on translating Homer.

It is impossible to do the subject justice. It is a crime to do it injustice. Rather than accomplish the impossible I will commit the crime. And at the beginning and ending I apologize.

Here is a sketch of the Iliad:

There was a strong, simple brave man who had a grudge. He kept that grudge well tended and warm until a greater injury provoked a deeper enmity in which he forgot the lesser. He enters the book in a rage, he is angry all the way through, and we leave him at the end in a state of sorrow and wrath. He is what has been called an "even-tempered man—always mad."

He lived in a strong, simple time, when people were little troubled by complications of ethical codes, but much worried by a lot of dogs. Even as men are now pestered by mosquitoes.

The best man was the boldest man-slayer. There was no inherent disgrace in running away, but it was better to stay and kill. It was better to run away than to be killed. This is the cowardice of the American Indian. If people must fight, it seems like sense. If one were crafty, that too was a good thing. Man must keep faith with his comrades, be loyal to his chief, love his friends, and speak truthfully to them. He must honor his parents and his wife and care for his children. Beyond these things he made no account of his enemies, the whole wide field of ethics was open to him.

It is what has been called an unmoral state, yet so nobly simple, so nobly free from cant, that we follow along in the natural flow of the tale till our barbaric blood dims our cultured vision and we forget the ruthless slaughter, and come to love those old barbarians of the dying age of bronze.

Achilles was a man of no wiles at all. His only argument (the gods not preventing) was a spear thrust through the liver or a sword stroke which permitted the gentle oozing of the spinal marrow.

The glorious mendacity of Odysseus, which has met the approval of some twenty-five centuries, was beyond him. He was not "smooth" nor "forehanded," and could not be pacified by gifts. He may have considered mercy a good enough thing in its way, but a consistent state of righteous indignation, resulting in a systematic dismembering of his opponents, whether fighting or pleading, was more to his line.

He must have been kind to Briseis, for even after he had killed her husband and taken her captive she was fond of him, though she would have been pleased with a wedding ceremony, as she frankly states.

Thetis, his goddess mother, and he hold their own through the interview, and a man who will die to avenge a friend certainly knows what friendship is.

Agamemnon, the leader of the Greeks, is an excellent fighter, jealous of his station and his popularity and prowess of Achilles, and bitterly he repents stirring up the ire of that wrathful individual before he is done with it.

Menelaos, ex-husband of Helen, is his brother, and merely fights. Ajax and Diomed and another Ajax are others of the principal chiefs who fight and kill and run away.

Hector is the great figure on the Trojan side, showing in his domestic life lovely characteristics unseen in the others. Perhaps it is a good thing to have one's wife near at hand. His wife, Andromache, and Hecuba, his mother, shine as types of womanhood. Priam, the aged king, his father, a splendid, venerable pathetic figure, is of the strongest. Paris, the eloper, is a band-box sort of creation, who prances out into the field and gets himself saved just in time by some buzzing busybody, second-rate god that happens to be on hand.

Helen, his elopee, is beautiful. Sometimes she wants him and sometimes she wants Menelaos, and probably all the time she wants ten-button gloves and a box at the opera.

Odysseus in the Iliad appears as a hard fighter, a good runner, and when a caucus was held he was always in evidence. What a pity we have no account of an election in those days, for Odysseus was best fitted for politics of any man of his time, and a Homeric primary, with Odysseus at the ballot box and Achilles instructing the vote with his various weapons, would have been worth half a lifetime to a tough district "heeler."

Of the gods, the less said the better. They are just like the people, only not so dignified and not so respected. They have ichor in place of blood, and use ambrosia and nectar in place of meat and wine. They continually solicit bribes. They wrangle and squabble and tell tales to Father Zeus. They fight with men and with each other, and it is whispered on Olympus that the goddesses in their disturbances pull hair and scratch.

Zeus has the reputation of keeping his vows, which is his distinguishing characteristic, so that when a god appears with a label, "I keep my word," the people say "It must be Zeus."

But to take up the story: Cryses, the priest, comes to the Greek army to ransom his daughter whom Agamemnon holds captive. Not getting satisfaction, and being insulted in addition, he calls down, through the intervention of Apollo, a scourge upon the troops. The leaders decide that something is awry with the god, and force their leader to release the girl. Thereupon, being out of sorts with Achilles on account of some unpleasant personalities which had reached the press, he demands the meed of honor of Achilles, the lovely Briseis. To this Achilles objects, and would gladly fight, but the gods show him the sin of rebellion and he refrains. He then swears an oath not to fight for the Greeks, leaving the duration of the oath blank.

His goddess mother, Thetis, goes straight to Zeus, and gets a promise that not until Achilles is honored shall the Greeks succeed; and Zeus straightaway prepares troubles for them. Meanwhile Achilles sulks in his tent, at which practice he becomes more and more proficient as the days pass.

Zeus sends a bogus baneful dream to Agamemnon, promising him victory. This, however, is merely a ruse, and not a lie. The Greeks discount and copper the tip, notwithstanding its source, and debate as to going home. Odysseus, however, holds them back and gets them ready to fight some more, although they have done nothing else for nearly ten years.

It finally seems reasonable, for the first time in a decade, that Paris and Menelaos should cut their own differences; so a truce is made, and they dispute.

At the moment when Menelaos is victor, the goddess Aphrodite steps in and saves the highly perfumed life of Paris. The Greeks, very properly, claim the victory; but Athens and Hera mix in the matter, and induce the Trojan Pandaros to try a blow shot at Menelaos. He is hit, but not fatally, and the Greeks, enraged by violation of their truce, straightaway start the skirmishers, and we are told that "many Trojans that day and many Achaeans were laid side by side upon their faces in the dust."

Zeus continues to keep his word, and the Trojans press closer and closer until they drive the Greeks within a hastily constructed wall about their ships.

Then Agamemnon sends an embassy to Achilles to offer Briseis and many other inducements, if only he will take up the fight. It is all useless. An amusing feature of the interview is the relation by the aged Phoenix of an exactly parallel case, probably constructed on the spot, and the argument that it would be more honorable for Achilles to be forced into war than to be hired into it.

The Trojans keep a long lead, with the exception of a short time when Zeus is asleep; but when he wakes up he changes the odds again.

Patroclus, friend of Achilles, finally gets drawn into the fight. He puts on the expensive armor of Achilles, and spends an agreeable afternoon until he meets Hector, who extracts him from his valuable shell. After much disturbance, his body is saved by the Greeks and taken back to Achilles.

The death of his friend and the desire for vengeance cause Achilles to relent so that he accepts Briseis and sundry other women and horses and things, and goes back into the scrimmage knowing that he is to die, for he has his choice of a choice between fire and long life. His fighting qualities are terrible. As a brainsplitter, puncturer of lungs, breaver of lives and other essentials, he has no living equal. Finally he gets within hail of Hector, who runs away, but is finally induced by the tricky Athena to stand and fight. Hector is killed and dragged in triumph to the Greek camp.

Then a truce is ordered, allowing the Trojans nine days to prepare for Hector's funeral. Here ends the story.

Between this and the Odyssey occurred the death of Achilles by an arrow from the bow of Paris, the taking of Troy by the strategem of the wooden horse, and the departure of the ships.

These tales were embodied in a lost classic called the "Aethiopis" and are referred to in the Odyssey. Whether they were put in form by the same mighty author is not known. They are part of the same body of legend, and were afterwards transcribed by Homer's parody, one, Publius Vergilius Maro, of Rome, Italy.

Here are a few extracts from the Iliad that seem to me typical of the author, also of the translators. First, is a list of the good things of this life at a time when such things were not reduced to a common denominator of dollars; and next follows some simple philosophy according to Achilles:

"Lo now, hearken thou to me, and I will tell thee all the gifts that in his hut Agamemnon promised thee: seven tripods untouched of fire, and ten talents of gold and twenty gleaming cauldrons and twelve stalwart horses, winners in the race, that have taken prizes by their speed. No lack-will was the man, neither undowered of precious gold, whose substance was as great as the prizes Agamemnon's steeds have borne him off. And seven women will he give, skilled in excellent handiwork, Lesbians whom he chose him from the spoils the day when thou thyself tookest Lesbos, surpassing womankind in beauty. These he will give thee, and with them shall be she whom erst he took from thee, even the daughter of Briseis. . . .

"Many Achaian maidens are there throughout Hellas and Phthia, daughters of princes that ward their cities; whomsoever of these I wish I make my dear lady. Very often was my high soul moved to take me there a wedded wife, a helpmeet for me, and have joy of the possessions that the old man Peleus possesseth. Not of like worth with life hold I even all the wealth that men say was possessed by the well-peopled city of Ilios in days of peace gone by, before the sons of the Achaians came; neither all the treasure that the stone threshold of the archer Phoebeus Apollo encompassed, in rocky Pytho. For kind and goodly flocks are to be had for the harrying, and tripods and chestnut horses for the purchasing; but to bring back man's life, neither harrying nor earning availeth, when once it hath passed the barrier of his lips."

Here is a touch of childhood:

"Oea, I reared thee to this greatness, thou godlike Achilles, with my heart's love; for with none other wouldst thou go unto the feast, neither take meat in the hall, till that I had set thee upon my knees and stayed thee with the savory morsel cut first, for thee, and put the wine-cup to thy lips. Oft hast thou stained the doublet on my breast with sputtering of wine in thy sorry helplessness."

Next I will quote from Matthew Arnold's meter the scene between Hector and his wife before he goes forth to fight Achilles:

Woman, I too take thought for this; but then I but think me.
What the Trojans men and the Trojan women be magnan.
If like a coward I skulked behind, apart from the battle.

Nor would my own heart let me; my heart, which has but me be valiant Always, and always fighting among the first of the Trojans.
Bury for Priam's fame and my own, in spite of the future.

For that day will come, my soul is assured of its coming.

It will come, when sacred Troy shall go to destruction,
And warlike Priam too, and the people of Priam.
Nor yet art thou grief, which then will be of Trojans.
Moves me so much—nor Hecuba's grief, nor Priam's father's.

Nor my brethren's, men and brace, who then will be lying.

In the bloody dust, beneath the feet of their foemen—
As thy grief, when Priam's heart, when Priam's heart
Shall transport thee away, and the day of thy freedom be ended.

Then, perhaps, thou shalt work at the loom of another, of Menes.

Or thou shalt to the wall of Menes, or Hyperaea,
Smelt against the wall, be strong, necessity's order.

And some man, that says, as he looks and sees the tears falling:

See, the wife of Hector, that great prominent captain

Of the horsemen of Troy, in the day they fought for their city.

So some men will say; and then thy grief will redouble
At the sight of a man like me, to save thee from bondage.

But let me be dead, and the earth be moulded above me.
Ere I hear thy cries and thy captivity told of.

This rendition is much weaker than Lang's version in Biblical prose; at the same time it is so well done as to be almost alone in metrical translation.

Here is a little of the interview between Achilles and his mother, in Lang's version:

"Then answered unto him Thetis, shedding tears: 'Short-lived, I ween, must thou be then, my child, by what thou sayest, for straightway after Hector's is thy death appointed unto thee.'

"Then, mightily moved, spake unto her Achilles, fleet of foot: 'Straightway may I die, since I might not succor my comrade at his slaying. He hath fallen, afar from his country, and lacked my help in his sore need. Now, neither have I at all been succor to Patroclus, nor to my other comrades that have been slain by the noble Hector, but I sit beside my ships, a profitless burden of the earth, I, that in war am such an one as is none else of mail-clad Achaians, though in council are others better. But bygone will we let be, for all our pain, curbing the heart in our breast under necessity. Now I go forth, that I may light on the destroyer of him I loved, on Hector; then I will accept my death whensoever Zeus willeth to accomplish it.'"

(To be continued next week.)

THE GRAFT CASES.

Under Judge Lawlor's ruling, another trial of Patrick Calhoun will be begun next Monday, this time under an indictment charging him with offering a bribe of $4,000 to former-Supervisor John J. Furey to induce him to vote for the overhead-trolley franchise.

The decision in favor of a practically immediate trial was not obtained without the strenuous opposition of the defense. In the first place, it expressed the conviction, which was bolstered by affidavits—as heretofore detailed in The California Weekly—that Judge Lawlor was prejudiced against Mr. Calhoun, and that therefore there should be a change of venue. This conviction was offset by the contra-affidavits of Judge Lawlor, John O'Gara and William Otts, and the motion for a change of venue was denied.

Disposition of this matter having thus been made, the defense endeavored to secure a postponement of the trial. There is to be an election about four months from now, and Mr. Calhoun and his attorneys felt that the fact might prove an embarrassment to the trial, hence they asked for a prolonged postponement. Judge Lawlor failed to recognize the embarrassment, and, as has been said, next Monday was set for the beginning of the trial. At that time about twenty-five jurors from the last panel will be on hand, another panel probably will have been secured, and the public may expect to see another illustration of the scriptural saying that "many are called, but few are chosen."

District Attorney Langdon has filed in the supreme court a petition for a writ of mandate that Auditor Koster show cause why he should not pay the salaries of Special Agent Burns and his assistants. Koster having refused to do so. In the past the auditor has paid these salaries without protest, but for some unexplained reason his view of his right to do so has altered. The non-payment of these salaries is a great embarrassment to the prosecution, and the action herein indicated has been taken in the hope of being rid of it. It is not improbable that the supreme court may have acted on the petition by the time this paper reaches its readers.

Maude Adams' real name is Kiskadden.

James Lane Allen's new book is "The Bride of the Mistletoe." Its scene is Kentucky.

Sir Edwin Maunde Thompson has resigned his office as director and principal librarian of the British Museum, after forty-eight years of service.

The man who invented the bill-board method of advertising that has now become a national nuisance, died the other day in Flushing, Long Island, worth a million. His name was Alfred Van Buren.

When J. K. Barrie, author of Peter Pan, was offered the honor of a British knighthood said that he led to say was, "I don't go in for that sort of thing." And then the honor was conferred on Pinero, another playwright.

Gustav Kerker, the New York composer, whose "Upper Ten Thousand" is drawing crowded houses in Berlin, was ordered expelled from Germany as an army deserter, but has been officially relieved of the charge in recognition of his talent.

A. G. Vanderbilt's new houseboat on the Thames is the finest craft of the sort which ever floated on those historic waters. It is called the Venture, and it has such luxuries as mahogany paneling, bay windows, porcelain bath-tubs and electric pianos.

France has decided to recognize Jacques de Romas as the inventor of the lightning rod, claiming that he announced his discovery two years before Benjamin Franklin put forth the same idea. But this, in any event, cannot rob Franklin of the credit of discovering the identity of lightning and electricity.

The only man who ever swam the whirlpool rapids below Niagara Falls and came out alive is John W. Gilmartin, who accomplished the feat August 18, 1903. He was at that time a writer on the New York Telegraph. He has rescued more than 100 persons from drowning, and has received a medal from Congress for heroism.

Since the death of Peter Fenelon Collier, the entire Collier publishing business falls under the management of young "Robt" Collier, his only son. Collier's Weekly has always been his property, and the phenomenal success of it augurs well for the rest of the business now under his management. Robert Collier has chosen his editors wisely.

Congressman Fowler of New Jersey, who has been the chairman of the important committee on banking, is to be turned down by Speaker Cannon in the make-up of the new House, so it is said. The trouble appears to be that Fowler is such an ardent advocate of just one kind of currency reform, which is the kind that he happens to believe in, that he can't hold the scales even.

Ambassador Hill, who was on Emperor William's racing yacht when it was badly beaten recently, said: "Your Majesty, I'm afraid I've hoodooed you by the calming influence I exercise on the wind." And the Emperor, though not usually regarded as a wit, replied neatly: "That is what American diplomacy usually does." A little later another guest remarked that he might be the Jonah of the party, whereupon William retorted: "I don't see any whales about."

Books on the Roosevelt administration cannot now be so valuable as they would be if no more Roosevelt administrations were possibilities of the future. It is reported that James R. Garfield and Gifford Pinchot, who enjoyed an exceptional intimacy with the former president through the tennis cabinet, are to collaborate on a work of this character; but they won't dare to say things or tell secrets that might have the effect of making another Roosevelt regime the less probable.

SHEAR WIT

Two darkies were engaged in a lively dispute about the purchase of a mule. "Look hea, Mistah Johnson," exclaimed one, "you once told me, 'Iree weeks ago, dat mule was a young animal. He hain't got a toof in his head, he's so old.'" Mr. Johnson thoughtfully scratched his head and then replied: "Time shua does fly in dis hea 'country.'"—Success Magazine.

Rabbi Wise, of New York, not so very long ago went to Boston and delivered a lecture to some people who took the trouble to inform him that their rabbis were Lough at Bunker Hill. "And mine date back to Sinai," said the rabbi. His hearers also told him that their forefathers helped to frame the Constitution. "And mine drew up the Ten Commandments," said the rabbi.—Baltimore Star.

Mr. and Mrs. Married Bliss were both growing very plump, and every effort to reduce weight had proved fruitless, and their discontent with their failure was pathetic. "It's too bad," said a mutual friend to a sympathetic physician. "The Blisses are so fond of each other and used to be so graceful and slender when they first married." "Ah, well!" replied the physician. "Think how much more they are to each other now."—Life.

A Mohawk Valley train was sidetracked, awaiting the arrival and passing of another train, when an Italian walked through the coach, his hands crossed on his stomach. "What's the matter, John?" some one inquired. "Oh, me sick—me sick," replied the man. "Sick? Well, what have you been eating?" "Eata de chick witta de big eyes," responded John, referring to an owl he had caught the night before.—Yonkers Statesman.

The four-year-old embryo citizen who declined to attend Sunday school any more, because he heard "the same old thing" about Adam and Eve every Sunday and he was "sick and tired to death of it" was frank before he was critical. This same child a little later at once delighted his quick-witted parents and touched a deep truth in his unexpected rendition of the hymn line written: "Love is meek and think." "No wrong," "Love is weak and things go wrong," the piping treble invariably shrilled.

The charming child classic of the little girl who, upon being told of a new member of the family, inquired forthwith: "Does mamma know?" is matched by the true anecdote of a noted club and society woman's small daughter. "Mother," inquired the child, enjoying a rare chat with the maternal parent, "on what day of the week was I born?" "Thursday, dear," "Oh, mother," little hands clasped and bright eyes wide with satisfaction, "wasn't it fortunate the doctor brought me on your day at home?"—Chicago Record-Herald.

A farmer living in a wet and late district in the east of Scotland found times and seasons so against him that he decided not to renew his lease. Meeting his landlord the other day, he said: "I can make nothing of it, wet and sour land, and I'm no' goin' on 'w'ic, or I'll be ruined." "Well, John, tae time to think o' it," said the landlord; "no doubt we'll be able to come to terms. I might let you have the farm at a reduction on the acre." "Ah, laird," replied the farmer, "your land should be let by the gallon, no' by the acre!"

"Queer things happen at fires," said Lewis K. Jordan of Cleveland. "The other day the lace curtains caught on fire in an East Side home and there was some panic while the fire lasted, you bet. Everybody called for the 'spported cook out in the kitchen to hustle in with a dish pan or two of water. But she didn't arrive on the scene until someone had pulled down the curtains and trampled out the flames. 'Why didn't you hurry?' they asked her reproachfully. 'Hurry,' she repeated. 'Wasn't I hurryin' as fast as I could. I had hot water in the dish pan when you hollered at me and I had to throw out that and get some cold water. You didn't want me to come in and throw hot water on the fire and make it worse, did you?"—Washington Herald.

The Last of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States closes with Section 5, which reads as follows: "The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article."

Now that is just the one thing that the people of the United States, speaking in the majesty of a three-fourths vote of all the states, had not the power to give the American Congress—power to enforce the provisions of the fourteenth amendment. It may be doubted if all the resources of army and navy could have enforced them, or such among them as were repugnant to the convictions of the persons over whom the Congress was expected to exert its authority.

This brings us to a consideration of the proper functions of legislation. There runs in the popular mind a notion that legislatures and congresses are all powerful, that they have but to enact their wills into statutes to order the ways of men by millions as the legislators conceive that those ways should be ordered. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Only a despotism can impose upon any people any law obnoxious to the habits, customs and convictions of such people, and the contemporary history of Russia affords us an example of effects certain to result from the attempt, even when made by a despotism. The cost is expressed in terms of blood, wickedness and misery.

Napoleon made a better constitution for the government of Switzerland than the Swiss had made up to his day, and the Swiss made use of that constitution just as long as Napoleon maintained in Switzerland 60,000 of his best disciplined soldiery, but when his soldiers were ordered elsewhere the Napoleonic constitution was hurled down the mountains after them and the Swiss people reinstated a government of their own, not nearly so enlightened, but one that fitted their notions better.

Perhaps four-fifths of the titles to all laws enacted by all the legislative bodies in the world begin by reciting the new law to be "An act to amend an Act entitled an Act," etc., or else to repeal such act. Having proven a failure the statute is amended again and again, repealed, recast and re-enacted, times without number, in the hope of finally making the enactment so fit the needs of the people that they will accept it and use it and he governed by it.

As a general proposition legislation is effective, and has power for its enforcement, only as it undertakes to facilitate and reduce to orderly and concrete expression what the people as a whole, in their inchoate way, have sought to do of themselves.

Legislation is chiefly concerned with prescribing methods whereby the people may do what they want to do. There must be ways of doing things or they cannot be done, just as there must be streets in a city and roads to town. By law we lay out these streets and roads and provide for their maintenance, but if no one wishes to pass that way they will not be used, and, if there be better and shorter ways of getting there, they will not be used anyhow. It is so with our laws. Only so many and such parts of them are used as the people have use for and the rest are dead lumber fit only to pad the statutes.

The reconstruction history of the United States, following the Civil War, is the most inglorious of all chapters of our history. Had Abraham Lincoln lived he would have done his best to avert that humiliation, but it may be doubted if he could have stemmed the tide of congressional radicalism and if his fate would not have been as melancholy as that of Andrew Johnson. Congress believed in the power of legislation. Lincoln believed in the power of reconciliation with, and rehabilitation of, the Southern states, and he was not disposed to waste time and effort upon what he termed "pernicious abstractions." He would have accepted the oaths of allegiance of the Southern white men at par value and have thrown upon them, upon honor, the future of the freedmen with recommendations for their gradual enfranchisement and education. Radicalism sought to compel what he would have sought by persuasion. The attempt to compel failed, and, forty years after the fourteenth amendment was adopted, the black man of the South is not in the possession of a single right or privilege, guaranteed to him by the constitution, that the consciences of the white men of the South do not approve of his possessing. There are few more important lessons in citizenship to be learned than the limitations which human nature itself imposes upon the powers of legislation.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

Captain R. R. Hall, the oldest man in Santa Clara county, died at his home in Gilroy, last week, at the age of 100 years, 3 months and 29 days.

The Women's Improvement Club of Woodland has demonstrated its usefulness and local patriotism by donating that city a site for a public park.

A business deal of great import to the people of the Sacramento valley has just been terminated by the closing of negotiations for the purchase of the properties of the Central County Lands company, the Central County Power company and the Yolo Consolidated Water company by eastern capitalists. It is said that from $7,000,000 to $10,000,000 will be expended in developing the properties.

Work on the electric line between Colfax and Bath, Placer county, will be begun in the near future.

It is reported that the Western Pacific company will expend $700,000 in building its shops at Sacramento, and that the work soon will be begun.

The people of Placer county are to vote on a proposition to issue bonds to the amount of $125,000 for the purpose of improving roads.

A syndicate has purchased 5,100 acres of land lying between Oroville and Biggs for $153,000, and will plant the entire tract to eucalypts.

The doubt which has existed concerning the date of the opening of the deer season has been terminated by Attorney General Webb by a decision that July 15th is the day.

It is contended by residents of Lake county that the tree known as the "Woodridge oak," in that county, is the largest in the state. At six inches from the ground it is 36 feet, 4 inches, and at four feet from the ground 31 feet, 10 inches, in circumference.

By a vote of 306 to 99 citizens of Elmhurst, last Saturday, decided in favor of the issuance of $75,000 worth of sewer bonds.

The citizens of Redlands, in a recent election, negatived propositions for the issuance of bonds for a city hall and for the fire department.

It is reported that laborers on the Los Angeles aqueduct from Owens valley actually fight for the privilege of working on certain parts of the line because of the chance of striking a gold pocket. Patrick McCullum, one of their number, is said to have cleaned up $1,200 from such a pocket.

Plaint of the Workman.

The plaint made by workmen to an increasing degree that, out of their wages, they are able to save nothing for the rainy day, and that lack of employment of the head of the family means not alone poverty but indigence, has quite too much of foundation in fact, but wage-workers are not alone in this. The condition of salaried men is only one notch farther removed from possible penury. It is and ever has been true that a great portion of humanity lives within ninety days of a possible pauperism.

If a skilled mechanic lives unduly near to the poverty line the fault, or misfortune, is his own. He could have an anchor to windward if he would, but the unskilled man with a family must consume as he earns and all that he earns. His earning capacity must be and remain too low for saving, and yet maintain a standard of living that will keep him fit for his work.

We must all of us work or suffer our families to endure either hardship or the humiliation of eating the bread of dependence, or so nearly all of us as to make the exceptions negligible. The earning power of money is now become so low that one must reckon his savings by tens of thousands if he would live on the earnings of his investments. It is good that it should be so, for we ought all of us to work who can work and, that there may be work for us to do, there must be the largest liberty for the spirit of industrial and commercial enterprise consistent with justice, drawing the line on the safe side of rapacity. There is no other way, but let not the workman feel that his dependence is greater than that of others, for others there are as dependent as himself.

Further Evidence of Innocence.

Tremendous efforts have been made to show that Mr. Francis J. Heney has received some thousands of dollars from the United States government, since taking the graft prosecutions in San Francisco, without having rendered service therefor. The contention seems to be that if this were proven against Mr. Heney it would demonstrate the innocence of Mr. Calhoun and his associates under indictment. Also if it could be shown that, at the time the indictments were found, Mr. Heney was an officer of the United States government the innocence of Calhoun et al. would receive confirmation. The relevancy of this evidence may appear questionable to practical minds, but with persons whose opinions can be hired at so much per perspicacity becomes equal to every demand upon it. It may not be irrelevant to note that the moneys received since these prosecutions began by Mr. Heney from the government he has so well served were in payment of services long before rendered and that he has not been a United States officer for several years, having been merely retained for each case separately as occasion warranted. However, there is still a way open for Mr. Calhoun to convince the public of his innocence if innocent, and that is to tell what was done with that $200,000 and open wide the avenues for disclosing the truth. There is no other way under heaven, in the world and among men, whereby his guiltlessness may be established and, if that way will not serve, then there is no way open, and a hitherto honorable reputation must go down to posterity attained.

A Place for the Live Things.

The Board of Supervisors of Marin county have petitioned the Fish and Game commission of California for their aid in establishing a state game preserve on the slopes of Tamalpais. Where better should such a preserve be established? The wild things of this earth have not too many places of refuge and, not only does their well-being demand that they have more sanctuaries, but the humanities demand it also. We cannot be ruthless, even with them, and not suffer harm. The good offices of the Fish and Game commission should not be exercised on behalf of duck-hunters alone, but also on behalf of the hunted. By all means suffer the Tamalpais game preserve to become a fact.

A Gaiety of the Season.

Legal gentlemen may now appear in the courts of San Francisco without risk of tarnishing their wigs or gowns by brushing against the crocky personality of George D. Collins. He has been disbarred. He was not present to protest. Advantage appears to have been taken of his absence at a seaside resort, having more of notoriety than of attractiveness, where he is unavoidably detained, to push disbarment proceedings against him, for no such proceedings were instituted so long as he was present and participating. By immemorial custom it has been held in California that no person fit to remain outside of prison walls could be unfit to remain inside of a hall of justice, and the issue of fitness has been determined by whether or not such person were in prison or out. What a gaiety was this whole proceeding! The character of Collins has been an open book for years and his unfitness to practice law has been notorious. Is it any wonder that scoundrels gain admittance to the bar that they may practice rascality as a profession? Conduct unbefitting a gentleman should be held unbefitting an officer of the court, as certainly as of an officer in army or navy. In no department of our judicial system is there more need for reform than in purging the bar of men morally unfit to practice law.

Some Fundamental Differences.

In our fourth article upon "England's Better Criminal Procedure," to be found elsewhere in this paper, three or four important facts are succinctly set forth. One is that while we have followed the direction of least resistance, and suffered all who cared to escape jury duty to get off the panel, in England the duty of jury service has been exalted and law and public sentiment have combined to keep the best men on the panel.

Where we have, in many classes of cases, permitted juries to judge of both law and fact, in England the jury is held down to pure questions of fact without having minds muddled with questions of law the jurors are incompetent to decide.

In England the issues of fact are given to the jury and not to the public for decision, whereas we, in this country, in cases at all celebrated, first try the accused by newspaper and then await a verdict from the public before empaneling a jury, and, to this end, newspapers are as certainly retained by the parties litigant as are the lawyers.

Finally, in England, the trial judge is still endowed with power to administer justice, whereas, with us, he is reduced to an umpire important to guard the public weal whether disposed to do so or not. There cannot be two opinions as to which is the better way.

Bad Bankers Make Bad Banking.

Perhaps there is no way of keeping bad men out of banking. The plunger is never so happy as when he is getting his fingers upon other people's money, and always we may expect that the stability of character of bankers will afford the best guaranty of the character of banking institutions.

But betwixt the efforts of the banking fraternity and the state at least reasonable security should be afforded those who put their trust in banks. It is too soon to hold the new state bank inspection system responsible for the collapse of the Union State and State Savings banks, and the old system never did anything but politics that amounted to anything.

It does seem, however, as though the sound banking interests of San Francisco must have known the character of these institutions, and, knowing their characters, might have taken steps to prevent harm to banking interests. Our legitimate banks cannot too soon or too well learn that they must stand "all for one and one for all" for whatever shakes public confidence in banking hurts all banks more certainly than all are hurt in any other department of business.

Taft and the Tariff.

Just what is taking place at Washington in the tariff conference the outside public does not know and conjecture is not very enlightening. The President appears to be standing for free raw materials. This raises an issue new to this tariff discussion and raises it at a late hour. There are many raw materials that deserve protection as certainly as manufactured products, and it goes without saying that if raw materials are made free the products manufactured from them should suffer a corresponding reduction of tariff protection. The President may have his way yet. He can if he will, for politicians will hesitate to push their program to the limit of putting the party organization in open hostility to the President. The organization knows that it will be whipped if it forces that issue, for the nation will stand behind the executive in forcing such a reduction in tariffs as will eventuate in a reduction in the cost of living. Another week will doubtless enlighten us further.

The Battle of the States.

The income tax amendment is going to the states. It will give us not only battles within states but between states and nothing has occurred since the civil war so likely to stir up bad blood as this conflict. Twelve states can defeat the amendment, but woe to the twelve that do defeat it! They will be reckoned with in every piece of legislation that comes before congress ever after. And yet no one of the twelve may wish to defeat the amendment. It might carry in every one of them if submitted to the people. It will be a contest of the public against the "interests," a conflict of the spirit of democracy against Bourbonism, and Bourbonism never rides but to a fall. A national public sentiment may make itself all-compelling. That is the amendment's only chance and if it is to take that chance those who favor the amendment cannot too soon get busy creating a public sentiment that may make itself all-compelling. The necessity for an income tax is one thing. The power of a great government to impose one in time of need is another. On this point there never should have been any question.

LaFollette Stood Up.

The entire California delegation in congress went into the Aldrich camp in order to make sure of adequate protection for oranges, lemons, raisins and wines. No one has called the delegation seriously to account for it, and we all of us want all of these industries to have a fair chance with foreign productions in the markets of this country. Just what would have happened to these industries had our delegation stood out and stood up no one can assuredly determine, but Senator LaFollette took his chances with certain Wisconsin industries, notably paper-making, in which there are 25,000 persons engaged. He voted to cut their protection from $6 to $4, and he voted on every item of the tariff schedule from the national, rather than Wisconsin, point of view, and he was the only man in the senate who did follow that policy. What will Wisconsin do to LaFollette two years hence when he comes up for re-election to the United States Senate? We know what it ought to do. It ought to send him right back to the Senate and keep him there.

Economy of Going Without.

We are twice admonished from Washington. Once that the new tariff will give us an abundant revenue, and, second, that the revenue can only be abundant if we limit governmental expenditures to the most rigid economy. Which mainly means that Uncle Sam will economize by going without and by issuing bonds for the betterments he must make. That news is unwelcome and unsatisfactory. There is no need that the country should scrimp or that it should not, out of current revenues, carry forward internal improvements. The people complain of high prices, not of high taxes. They are willing enough to build the Panama canal out of current revenues, to erect public buildings at home and abroad, carry forward the reclamation service and enter upon a great system of construction of interior waterways and conservation of resources. All that the people ask is that the taxes be distributed equitably, that the whole cost be not saddled upon the consuming masses, that some part of the burden be apportioned according to ability to pay rather than upon necessity to consume, that a dollar's worth of efficiency result from each dollar of expenditure. The economy of going without ill becomes a "giant in swaddling clothes."

Centralization of Control.

That interstate commerce is destined to come under a more efficient control of the general government, or the general government under a more efficient control of interstate commerce, is seemingly inevitable. There are three principal roads to one of these goals being advocated. Mr. Bryan wanted a federal license imposed upon all corporations controlling 50 per cent of the production of any commodity in this country. Attorney General Wickersham wants all corporations engaging in interstate commerce to take out a federal license, an idea that President Roosevelt advanced tentatively, to be resorted to in the event that methods of control sought under the law as it stands failed of their purpose. President Taft's plan is the corporation tax, to become a part of the new tariff measure, which is expected to give federal control obliquely, so to speak, a main purpose sought under the guise of needful taxation. The President's plan has the merit of being on the eve of adoption, but if it leads to anything more important than raising a few millions of dollars additional revenue it will lead to the federal licensing of all interstate corporations with the view of controlling them. Then will come a mightier tug of war between corporations and people than we have ever had, the goal being the control of the government that controls the corporations. Nothing short of a popular election of United States senators will enable the people to win that contest.

The American Loan to China.

It is to be hoped that the announcement from Peking, that American financiers will be allowed to participate in the great international loan to China, will not lack confirmation. It is important that American money should participate on terms of equality with England, France and Germany in whatever constructive enterprises China undertakes on borrowed capital. The reader will understand this better if he will take down his map and take a look at the Yang-tse-Kiang valley, one of the greatest, richest and most populous in the world. Hankow sits at the head of deep-sea navigation of that river several hundred miles above its mouth. Above that city lies an enormous territory beyond the reach of certain, safe and constant navigation. A railroad system reaching Szechuen province, and tapping its great resources, is as needful as a railroad up the Sacramento or San Joaquin valleys in this state, except that these two valleys are unimportant by comparison. It will take something like $40,000,000 to construct this line of road, and a branch from another line reaching into Hunen, another important interior province. If America were left out of the loan America might also be left out of opportunity to trade on terms of equality with Europe in these far territories. Hence the insistence of our government upon a right of participation. Hence also the stirring up of American financiers by executive influence exerted from Washington. The Morgans, Kuhns and Loeb were manifestly asleep until awakened by the President. This is tremendously important to California and our commercial interests might well sit up and take note also. The possibilities of the Yang-tse valley are hardly second to those of the Mississippi or the Amazon and millions of consumers are already there awaiting opportunity to buy of us and sell to us. That makes business.

Telegraph to Telephone.

The trend of railroading is toward train dispatching by telephone instead of telegraph, in the interests of economy if not efficiency, and for the displacing of a thoroughly organized brotherhood of expert and generally reliable men by a disorganized and inexperienced body of employees without the intelligence and discipline that telegraphers have had to possess. This is only one more step in the direction of making a tool do the work, and take the place of a man, because the tool will be obedient and not stop to argue when somebody tells it to do something. The tool also has nothing to say about wages or hours. This movement, said to be headed by the Burlington road, is only another manifestation of a tendency inherent in human affairs and not to be worried over save as passengers on express trains may fortify their heirs with additional accident insurance in view of the possibility of a hello-girl doing the dispatching. What if she should give the wrong number?

Business Looking Up.

From every point of view business should be good and getting better. Crops are almost uniformly good the whole country over and the world's market for any surplus seems ample. The great railroads are placing big orders for new supplies and the banking centers have no end of money to lend at fair rates of interest on security reasonably sure. Our imports are increasing so rapidly as to leave no doubt of our national purchasing power and our customs dues, as they are, are cutting our treasury deficiency into shreds. Our per capita circulation is now thirty-five dollars with one cent to go on, ample for anything but a Populist, and should satisfy Mr. Bryan, if there be anything in the quantitative theory of money. Building in all the cities has enormously increased during the current year and the railroads have fewer idle cars than for more than two years. Why does not this procession start? What are we waiting for?

Of Debateable Advantage.

The Sacramento Bee has undertaken to develop the attitude of churches and church men on issues involved in the graft prosecutions in San Francisco. If the Bee is merely seeking information it may save itself trouble and expense by taking cognizance of the fact of division of sentiment within the churches without bothering to prove it. It exists. It always exists whenever a fundamental test is applied to it, and the test now being applied is fundamental. It is such a test as was applied when slavery was an issue and that issue cleft the church from top to bottom. It cut through the ministry and priesthood, through vestry and laity, through religious organizations of gentiles and Jews. Nor are those who fail to respond to a supreme test wholly without palliation for their shortcomings. Priests and pastors spend their lives in trying to save men from suffering the consequences of their own acts here and hereafter. They are a mellow fraternity, too, and easily mistake the sorrow of the sinner for his own predicament for sorrow for the sin. Besides, there is much that religion will not do for a man unless he is so saturated with it as to have become wholly forgetful of self, and not many pastors or communicants are saturated to that degree. The heart of the church in San Francisco is right, but there is an element in it that is on the wrong side. 'Twas ever thus.

Salaries of Wardens.

Inasmuch as the State Board of Prison Directors have so increased the salaries of prison wardens as to make the emoluments of these offices commensurate with the responsibilities and duties thereof it might be well for that board to go one step further and make the wardens commensurate with the salaries. It is almost as certainly out of the question for a man to go into a prison and become a good warden without previous training as to become a good lawyer, a good doctor or a good mechanic, and this, too, without conflicting with that other truth of equal validity that good wardens, like good hotel keepers, are born and not made. The material out of which to make a good warden must be there in the first place, but, being there, it must be given opportunity to learn the profession or it cannot practice it with success, and training in local politics affords inadequate preparation for the task. As well might we officer our army and navy with politicians, and hope to be successful in war, as to so officer our prisons and hope to redeem wayward men from lives of crime to good citizenship. In ninety cases out of the hundred that is the task to which the competent warden will address himself.

The Predatory in Us All.

It is a mistake to suppose that the predatory rich are essentially different from the rest of us. They are like us, we are only more so. It requires generations of good breeding to cultivate the predatory instincts out of us and the predatory rich, like the predatory poor, have had little of such breeding. Wealthy persons who would be democratic, and throw open their grounds to be enjoyed by the poor and the moderately circumstanced, are often requited shamefully. Their grounds are cluttered, their flowers snipped, the shrubs broken down and their lawns trodden over with as little heed as herds of cattle or mules would exhibit. This does not justify the predatory instinct whether exhibited by prince or pauper, by millionaire or man. It only tends to account for it wherever found on the ground of lack of good breeding, good fellowship, the softening influence of civilization, for robbers or pirates, in highways or byways, commercial or industrial, who are well bred have been few and far between.

The Open Shop in Indiana.

The simultaneity with which news concerning the growth of the open shop principle in Indiana percolates through the press suggests that there may be somebody behind it pushing it along, but, however that may be, it does seem to be true that unionism in that state has received a backset. The tendency toward the open shop principle has resulted from the tyranny of the unions, just as unionism itself resulted from the tyranny of the employers. So the pendulum will swing back and forth until each party to the conflict comes to conceive a respect for the other and to appreciate the other's point of view. What has been done in Indiana has been done under the shibboleth of "industrial freedom," which, being interpreted, means that collective bargaining will not be tolerated and the employer shall be free to take full advantage of the necessities of the worker in fixing hours, wages and conditions of payment. This also is tyranny. Collective bargaining is indispensable to the liberty, the uplifting and well-being of wage-workers; but when, upon that claim of right, unionism assumes to shut out of employment all who will not bargain that way one form of tyranny is substituted for another and humanity gains little. The industrial situation in Indiana has merely shifted its weight from one foot to the other and no step in advance has been taken. Until the right to bargain collectively, and not to bargain collectively, have equal recognition by capital and labor, progress cannot be reported.

The Dredgers.

Sooner or later the gold-mining dredgers of the Sacramento valley will have to submit to public regulation in the public interest, and that regulation should come sooner, and not later. This is said without antipathy to that industry. It is legitimate, it is profitable, and it has the need of its product, but it is not safe to leave dredger-mining to its own devices. Love of gain is too strong to be trusted with so great a responsibility. The crushing of the cobbles for road-making has helped to solve the problem of the heaps of ruin the dredgers leave in their wake, but has not done it wholly. There are places where dredgers may not work without doing harm to the rivers, and there are other places where the value of the soil to posterity vastly exceeds any possible profit to the world, payable in gold, that can result from dredger-mining. The need is for some person or commission, acting on behalf and in the name of the State of California, to represent the public interest in the prosecution of that industry and the state should not wait before taking action until an intolerable evil develops.

The Shake-up in France.

Such a shake-up as the government of France has just sustained would, in England, prove a serious matter, but the French do not take themselves so seriously. A diversion of the kind is, with them, of little more significance than going to the opera. But the incident goes far to reconcile us to our relatively unresponsive administration to public sentiment. We know that it is not parliament that correctly represents public sentiment. We look to the executive arm of government to do that. Our congress stands between the public and the realization of its demands and gives it time to think things over. In France, and other countries having a responsible ministry, they think quickly, act promptly and repent at leisure. The deliberateness of British political life makes a responsible ministry more tolerable than on the continent of Europe, where political hair-triggers are the fashion.

The Deeper Significance : : : of Living : : :

In shooting considerable distances the mark must be overshoot in order to be hit. It is so with the drama. The truth must be exaggerated in order to be seen. "The Servant in the House," is an exaggeration. There probably never was just such a person as the Bishop of Lancaster, but there has been many a bishop whose materialities dominated his spiritualities and made of him a dangerous hypocrite without half knowing it.

There has been many a vicar spiritually keelhaired betwixt the calling of his Master to work in his vineyard, making himself of no repute, and the enticements of a larger church with a more intelligent and influential congregation hanging breathlessly upon his words of intellectual eloquence. And there has been many a vicar's wife more ambitious for her husband than for his Lord, for social pleasures than for humble service. Yet both the vicar and his wife are no doubt many times magnified in this play.

So with the Bishop of Benares! There have been bishops without number forgetful of self, self possessed, sympathetic, steadfast, quick of wit and strong of will, but few that could come into a household in the early morning and, betwixt breakfast and luncheon, expose the hypocrite and cast him out, confirm the vicar in his purpose to walk humbly and serve sincerely, bring the wife to a sense of her sin of worldly standards for a heavenly commission, awaken the latent manhood in a brute of a sewer worker at war with the world, restore a daughter to her father and father to daughter, reunite in confidence and love an estranged family and ring the curtain down on a scene of love and confidence animated by high resolve and resolute will. Yet all these seeming impossibilities are accomplished in an evening. The stage, as naturally as day passes into twilight and twilight into darkness, and that again into dawn and dawn into day, without once straining at effect. Just a quiet, self forgetting, purposeful personality, simply and wonderfully attractive and owing its power to the subtle alchemy of love ordering its steps with wisdom and tact.

"The Servant in the House" has made a great hit all over the Christian world. It appeals to something understandable in the human heart. The audience never misses the point in any phrase, scene or situation. It recognizes the counterfeiter in the Bishop of Lancaster, the soul of manhood in the sewer cleaner, who unhesitatingly braves death at the call of his duty, feeling that that is his place and that that one thing he can do. And it knows the quiet Bishop of Benares, incognito to though he is, for what he is and loves him as heartily as it hates the other.

All of which shows that a theatre-going people at bottom hates sham and loves sincerity and never comes away from a play believing the wrong moral, or an immoral instead of a moral. Such an audience must choose the worse rather than the better, but it will at least know the better from the worse and will be under no hypocritical misapprehension as to which is which.

And here is the point of the play, and of this incident, deeper significance of living: Who can measure the power of an unselfish purpose, and who can measure the potentiality of a serene, self-mastered, calm, dignified, intelligent, wise personality? Around every such person there clings, as around the earth, an atmosphere, full of tonic, vivifying, disinfesting, inspiring, healing.

How can such a personality be acquired? By not trying to acquire it, but by trying instead to walk humbly, live prudently, acquire self mastery, yet go into the world to see it, know it, serve it, never by retiring from it or shunning its burdens, by bearing them instead, without hurry, without worry, living each day to the full, with hope and resignation. That way comes the Bishop of Benares with a fame that crosses oceans yet a "Servant in the House."

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Transcontinental South American Railway.

The government of Peru is about to undertake an enterprise which will be of no slight import to the people of the United States. This is the construction of a railroad from Paita, in northern Peru, to a navigable branch of the Amazon, a distance of about 400 miles. This will create a transcontinental route consisting of about 2,600 miles of water and 400 of rail, and will open up and develop a wonderfully fertile tract of country which heretofore has been all but inaccessible to the civilized world. The road will traverse one of the lowest passes in the Andes, and no unusual engineering skill will be required in its construction. But here is the point in connection with it which is of most interest to North Americans: It will reduce the time of transportation from Peru to New York from thirty to twelve days, and the time from many points of interior South America fully as much. Probably five years will be occupied in the construction of the road. It is understood that its Amazonian terminus will be at Iquitos.

A Paradise for Suffragettes.

It is announced by a French explorer who recently returned from an African expedition that he has found, among the Tuaregs, on the border of Sahara, such a paradise for suffragettes as they probably have not conceived to exist this side of the country where everything is made right. The male Tuaregs are not admirable, being brutal, treacherous and barbarous, but their women have their "rights," including some features that are not recognized as rights in this part of the world. Each one of them has a camel of her own, and her husband is not allowed to mount or dismount her without her consent. Their household duties are very few, their husbands doing most of that sort of manual labor. Each woman has a species of knight errand (other than her husband) who attends to her camel, runs her errands and, generally, makes himself useful to her, but if he shows a tendency to become too devoted, her husband is privileged to punish him. She is in no way compelled to serve the spouse who is not her "lord and master," for he is an illiterate and ignorant creature, while she can read. The latter fact, too, gives her the privilege of acting as judge when any difficult question of policy arises in connection with Tuareg affairs. So the French explorer reports, but his suggestion that suffragettes trek Saharaward has not resulted in action as yet.

Still No Remedy for Cancer.

It has been seven years since the Imperial Cancer Research Commission, of Great Britain, was organized to investigate and attempt to find a remedy for the most dread disease that afflicts humankind. The other day its annual meeting, at which the Prince of Wales presided, was held, and its report was rendered. Briefly summed, the report amounts to this: That all suggested remedies have been tested, and that none of them successfully combats the terrible disease. The number of such alleged remedies—some of them introduced with a fanfare of horns—is many, but the commission holds that the value of "cypripin" was the best of these to be tested, but with absolutely negative results. The result of these seven years of investigation, then, simply is a negation. The commission speaks hopefully of its final success, but it is difficult to comprehend on what hope is based, unless it be that large faith in man's capacity which holds that in time it may accomplish anything. Certainly the demonstration that thus far nothing has been found to cure cancer is poor basis for a belief that the remedy hereafter will be found. Nevertheless, there is none who will not hope that the commission's apparently groundless faith will be demonstrated to be based upon a firm foundation.

Progress of Public Education.

Elmer E. Brown, United States commissioner of education, has compiled some statistics relating to our public schools which are both interesting and significant. In so doing he compares the statistics of 1870 with those of 1907. In considering them it should constantly be remembered that the population of the country somewhat more than doubled during the designated time. In 1870 the number of children of school age was 12,055,443; in 1907 it had increased to 24,262,930, or just about proportionately to the increase in population. But in the former year the number of pupils enrolled was but 6,871,522, while in the latter year it was 16,890,818. That is, but 57 per cent of children of school age were enrolled in school in 1871, while 70 per cent were enrolled in 1907—a good showing, but that in relation to actual average attendance was better, for in 1870 but about 33 per cent. were in actual average attendance, while in 1907 the percentage was almost 50. In 1870 the number of male teachers employed was 77,529; in 1907 it was 104,414, an increase of less than 50 per cent, while the population was doubling. But this decrease was more than compensated by an increase of female teachers from 122,986 to 376,902, or more than 200 per cent. To sum up, while the population increased by 100 per cent, the total number of teachers increased by 140, which suggests that our school children do not appear to be neglected. It is in the value of public school property, however, that the greatest bound has been taken, or from $130,383,200 to $858,635,200. Our school property has increased in value nearly three times as fast as our population in number. The expenditure per capita in the earlier year was $1.64; in the latter year $3.90, while the expenditure per pupil was $15.55 and $28.25 respectively, the expenditure in the various states ranging from $6.37 in South Carolina to $72.15 in Nevada. California, with its $49.25, is exceeded by only Nevada, New York, with $51.50, and Montana, with $49.40. From all of which it may be gathered that, whether or not we sometimes are unwise in our educational methods, we cannot be charged with negligence in relation to them.

An Arabian Nights Tale.

Not long ago a number of Arabs, after wandering for some time on the desert of Sahara, reached Cairo, and there told the following story. They were smuggling goods across Tripoli, when they were discovered by coast guards and fled for their lives. Riding southward three days into the Sahara, they were lost and had almost given up hope when, in the distance, they saw a glittering something—they knew not what. They rode in its direction, and discovered it to be a deserted city built of copper. Not a sign of life was there, but they secured water at a spring, and later found their way to Cairo. This is their story, and it sounds sufficiently "fishy" to have Sinbad the Sailor for its hero. It certainly would not have been believed were it not in a degree indorsed by the fact that the Arabs brought with them several pieces of copper of fine workmanship and antique design which they claim to have found in the remarkable city, but this fact has caused so much credence to be given to the story that an expedition, composed of Europeans, is being fitted out to attempt to find a supply of the copper city. But, while this is the case, the general attitude of savants toward the story is one of incredulity.

First Jew in British Cabinet.

For the first time in the history of England a representative of the Jewish faith is a member of the British cabinet. The first Jew of Jewish birth—Benjamin Disraeli, for instance—have been in the cabinet heretofore, but not until after they had abjured the Jewish faith. The one thus honored is Herbert L. Samuel, who was promoted from Under Secretary of State for Home Affairs to the Chancellorship of the Duchy of Lancaster, which carries cabinet rank. Members of the Jewish community have held high place in parliament, but in Mr. Samuel the cabinet has the first representative of the faith.

A Bas the Large Intestine!

Professor Metchnikoff of the Pasteur Institute believes himself to have made a discovery which should interest not only the doctors who perform "successful operations," but also all persons who carry a lower large intestine about with them as a part of their life baggage. In the words of his assistant, Professor Metchnikoff "discovered that the intestines of the ordinary healthy man always contained a great number of varieties of bacteria. Some of these were found to be dangerous. In the lower large intestine it was found that the harmful germs greatly predominated. Professor Metchnikoff therefore concluded that if a man's large intestines were removed he would suffer less from the intestinal bacteria poisons." Having made this illuminating "discovery," Professor Metchnikoff at once proceeded to confirm it by prolonged investigations, which happily terminated in convincing him. So now, if we are not feeling well, we will know what, in all probability, ails us: It is our large intestine getting in its deadly work, and what really is needed is a "successful operation," which, as is well known, is the only kind that takes place. Thus has Science hung another star against the black firmament of our pains and aches. A bas the large lower intestine! Let it go to join the vermiform appendix!

WORTH KNOWING.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "grat" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Perry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in the store who would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

A LOST POEM BY KIPLING.

The Century Magazine some time ago published an article calling attention to a quotation from Kipling's verse with which Prof. Frederick Jackson Turner, of the University of Wisconsin, prefaced his well-known essay on "The Influence of the Frontier on History." A search of Kipling's collected works failed to reveal any such poem, and, though Kipling remembered having written it, he had no copy of it nor could he recollect the unpublished part of the poem. A reader of the Century, Blake D. Miller, a real estate dealer in Seattle, possessed a copy in a scrap book, and forwarded it at once to Professor Meany, of the Washington University, who wrote the Century article. Professor Meany believes that this poem was written by Kipling during his early residence in India, and was reprinted in American papers from its original publication in an Indian newspaper. The complete poem follows:

The Foreloper.

The gull shall whistle in his wake, the blind wave break in fire,
He shall fulfil God's utmost will unknowing
His desire;
And he shall see old planets pass and alien stars arise,
And give the gale his reckless sail in shadow of new skies.
Strong lust of gear shall drive him out and hunger arm his hand
To wring his food from a desert land, his foothold from the sand,
His neighbors' smoke shall vex his eyes, their voices break his rest.
He shall go forth till south lies north, sullen and dispossessed;
And he shall desire loneliness, and his desire shall bring him
Hard on his heels a thousand wheels, a people and a king;
And he shall come back in his own track, and by his scarce, cold camp,
There he shall meet the roaring street, the derrick and the stamp;
For he must blaze the nation's ways with hatchet and with brand
Till on his last won wilderness an empire's bulwarks stand.

TOO MUCH FICTION?

There was no touch of pessimism at the national book fair—or exhibition of things literary and bookish—which has just been held in this city, says the Chicago Record-Herald. The publishers, dealers, agents and printers who were present were confident that a veritable boom was coming and that authors will share the prosperity which is returning to the country as a whole. The best sellers always take care of themselves, but in a lean and poor year much excellent, honest, artistic work goes unrewarded.

Andrew Lang has been giving some peculiar advice to would-be writers in connection with this question of remunerative authorship. He finds that the departments of history, poetry, essays, literary criticism, anthropology and economics are particularly unprofitable, and he therefore unhesitatingly counsels those who would live by their pen to devote themselves to fiction, including, of course, plays. Mr. Lang will not be thanked for this advice by the novelists and dramatists already in the field. In fact, some of these have been carrying on a remarkable propaganda in favor of a suspension of production. The public, they say, is weary of fiction and threatens a boycott. To the making of the same kinds and styles of novels there is no end, and the general readers are bored and surfeited. Moreover, the publishers are beginning to complain of the pernicious activity of novelists, many of whom think nothing of turning out two books a year, and declare that there is simply no market for such wares. One popular author is reported as saying: "A fellow doesn't demand a book from me anxiously nowadays, and let me supply it gracefully: I must supply it without invitation and then jump on his back and cram it down his throat."

Critics, too, we are told, are striking, and their notices of new novels are becoming more and more laconic and perfunctory. They are unable to affect interest where they do not feel it, and much in plots and treatment appears flat and stale to them.

In these circumstances, say some of the more comfortable English novelists, the part of wisdom is to call a halt, cease writing and publishing fiction for a year. What a brilliant revival would follow the extraordinary suspension, and what vitality and freshness would be infused into the book trade! exclaim the advocates of the idea. It is not likely, however, that it will be tried in the near future, and certainly the news from Chicago and America will encourage the British novelists to persevere in spite of pessimism at home. Our consumptive capacity is apparently unlimited, and the demand is by no means confined to fiction.

HICHBORN'S STORY OF THE LEGISLATURE.

Generally speaking, the people will not elect their rascals to make their laws if they know that they are rascals, but rascality often wears a cloak of smiling plausibility, and so the people are betrayed. Granting that this is true, it is of far more than passing interest to obtain a book behind the scenes of the California legislature and form an accurate idea of the men who composed it. Such an opportunity is given to all in Franklin Hichborn's book, "The Story of the California Legislature of 1909," advance sheets of which we have in our hands. His writer yields no whitewash brush, nor does he dip his pen in venom. Calmly, impartially and painstakingly, he deals in facts, and facts, and yet more facts. Sometimes these facts condemn a legislator; again they laud another. Hichborn presents them without fear or favor; it is the fact that he presents, whether it bless or ban.

Taken as a whole, the book is an almost astounding revelation. There were "Honorable" legislators who voted for every vicious measure, and against every righteous measure, that was presented for their consideration; their every vote is recorded, and cries out against them. There were others who veered as the wind shifts, sometimes heeding the dictates of the "machine," again apparently wondering if it would not be policy to do as an awakened public conscience suggested; the fluctuating record is written in Hichborn's book. Yet others stood straightly for the right throughout the long struggle; the unembellished record is their wealth of laurel.

And through the entire session the "machine" was dominant. This is the sad moral of the detailed facts and figures. In but one instance—that of the anti-race track bill—was it entirely defeated, and no small share in this defeat was due to the opponents, rather than the proponents, of the measure.

All of these facts are impartially marshalled in this "Story of the Legislature of 1909," and they lead the reader to just the deeds of some law-makers or to condemn those of others. It is that which the man did that holds him up for opprobrium or applause. The whole story is told with that convincing force of which Mr. Hichborn is master, and the book ($1.25 will be its price) should be in the library of every man who cares to know what our legislative servants have done in the recent past and whether they may be trusted still to serve the public in the future.

A LITERARY ROUND ROBIN.

The most celebrated round robin in the English language is the one signed by Burke, Gibbon, Sir Joshua Reynolds and others, and sent to Dr. Samuel Johnson, requesting him to amend the epitaph to Oliver Goldsmith in Westminster Abbey, and suggesting that it be in English instead of Latin. Johnson accepted the round robin in good part, but told Sir Joshua Reynolds, the bearer of the note, that he would "never consent to disgrace the walls of Westminster Abbey with an English inscription."

WHAT ENGLAND THINKS OF US.

Thomas Nelson Page, who has spent all his vacations in Europe for the last twenty years, has been interviewed in London for the New York Times, and among the questions asked him was one concerning the reality of English friendship for Americans.

"I will answer that in this way," he replied. "You know, England has a great many people in it—some of the wisest and some of the most foolish; some of the most delightful and some of the dullest on earth. It is hard to generalize, but speaking generally, I think that Americans like the English better than the English like the Americans. Certainly the upper classes do. We have an idea of England created in our impressionable youth by reading the romantic stories of the past—which is our past as well as theirs. We come over by the tens of thousands to visit places hallowed to us by historical associations, and we tread softly to find that the Englishman regards us at best with a mild sort of humorous tolerance, and if we win a race, or a polo match, wonders how we did it. It appears to me that there has been a change in the sentiment of the English toward Americans since I began to come to England, twenty-odd years ago. Americans, I think, were at that time much more cordially received than they are now. For one thing, there were not so many of them. Of course there is a great deal of individual friendship between Englishmen and Americans, and no friend in the world can be a better friend than an Englishman—and he is the finest stock in the world for transplanting. But, speaking generally, I can't help feeling that the English have a much less cordial attitude toward Americans than they formerly had. The commercial classes are actually hostile. The tone of the English press is generally slurring and offensive toward America. It is a 'pin-prick' policy, perhaps, but it is a foolish one."

PERSONALIA.

Robert W. Chambers' annual fall novel will bear this year the title of "The Danger Mark."

David Graham Phillips' next novel, to be published this fall, will be called "The Hungry Heart."

An opera entitled "Poia," by the American composer, Arthur Nevin, is to be performed next season at the Berlin Opera House.

A new edition of "David Harum" has recently been published, bringing the sales of this book, since 1898, up to more than 1,000,000 copies.

George Van Haltren, who recently retired from the Oakland baseball team to private life, has been in the game for twenty-four years, which is almost a record-breaker for successful performance in the national game.

Anthony Hope has placed the manuscript of a new novel in the hands of his publishers for production this fall, but a reporter who interviewed him was so frustrated by seeing "Dolly" of the "Dialogues" when he left that he neglected to ask its name.

A short time ago, a tablet in memory of the famous English author, Pearl Mary-Teresa Craige (John Oliver Hobbes), was presented to Barnard College. The tablet, on which is a half-length portrait of Mrs. Craige and a short inscription, was presented in the name of her many friends by the Honorable Joseph H. Choate.

MEN WHO DO THINGS

MEYER LISSNER.

Mr. Meyer Lissner.

portion to the strength of work.

No more striking tribute or conclusive proof could be made of the real value of the work of Meyer Lissner in behalf of good government in Los Angeles than the bitterness with which he has been assailed by the adherents of the corrupt political machine which heretofore ruled the city. One and all, the purchasable newspapers, the vice-protected interests, the pampered office-holding favorite of the political machine, each in his own way has joined in the assault. Malicious cartoons, false statements, savage threats, and calumny of every kind have been heaped upon him. All the tricks by which it is sought to undo the influence with the people of any man who honestly tries to give them better government, have been tried. It seems ridiculous that good people will listen to such charges. No proof is ever given, but we all know how effective is the rumor started in some gossip club "that his motives are deeper than they seem," "that he wishes to make himself a boss."

In the case of Mr. Lissner it is said that he was made the object of an attack by one of the good little boys of the Southern Pacific machine (he is now a federal officeholder by grace of the junior senator from California) in the course of which this machine mouthpiece tried to influence the minds of an audience composed of alert and intelligent club women, by an appeal founded on the tears which he alleged "he had wiped from a widow's eyes." Here at least one attack failed for it is chronicled that the orator's highest flights excited only thinly veiled amusement. So it has gone on; the machine has recognized that Lissner and the reforms he has introduced in Los Angeles bid fair to come between them and the public whom they have so long enjoyed the privilege of plucking, and the word has gone out that he must be destroyed.

What Has He Done?

Meyer Lissner entered the ranks of the progressives of Los Angeles soon after they had begun the work of bettering political conditions in that city. The non-partisan school board and a non-political board of public works had been established, a beginning had been made, but if the ground gained was to be held and further advances made, the forces of good government must be organized. Lissner had been an active Republican, secretary of one of the executive committees in one of the general elections, and he understood the value of united work.

A careful study of the Republican and Democratic organizations showed him that they were absolutely controlled by one man and their complete non-partisanship—for revenue only. Lissner realized the absurdity in supporting a man for a municipal office on account of any view he might have on the tariff. Early in the year 1906 he conceived the idea of introducing non-partisanship in the city of Los Angeles, and in conjunction with four other men he brought forth the non-partisan movement. He directed the campaign which resulted in placing nine out of sixteen elective offices on a non-partisan basis.

Immediately following, he founded the City Club which holds a meeting every Saturday noon and is a forum for the discussion of city problems. The club now has a membership of nearly 1,000 of the best citizens and leading business men. Nearly all of the men prominent in civic, educational and national affairs who visit Los Angeles address the club.

Roosevelt Leaguer and Taft Supporter.

During the years 1907-8, he was actively engaged in the formation of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, a state-wide movement against the Southern Pacific political machine which was in almost complete control of the party organization, dictating nearly all nominations from supreme court judges down to constables.

He was a strong supporter and admirer of President Taft, believing in his grand training for the office of president and in his honesty and integrity of purpose to protect the interests of the people while in that office. It was largely through his efforts that the Lincoln-Roosevelt League endorsed Taft's candidacy, the first to do so in California, and stirred up so strong a sentiment among the Republican voters that the machine was obliged to reluctantly come out in his favor.

In the spring of 1909 he organized the forces behind George Alexander, which carried him to victory in the recall election.

Founder of Good Government Fund.

The need of money to furnish the necessary publicity for good government campaigns and the difficulty of raising it, had met him in each movement, and in casting about for a remedy he evolved the idea of the "Good Government Fund." Yearly subscriptions are made to this fund, which is managed by a board of trustees of the highest standing.

In this brief sketch it is impossible to get into the details of his work, to set forth the difficulties he has successfully surmounted, the tireless patience he has put into the work, the unselfishness and good nature which he has displayed in taking positions of more importance than prominence. His friends in Los Angeles say that the test which he applies to all his work is: "Is it right? Is it really in the interests of good government?" He has great confidence in the ultimate judgment of the people and all of his campaigns have been conducted on the idea of keeping the public informed of every step of the work.

A Native Californian.

Mr. Lissner is a native Californian, born in San Francisco in 1871. He knows and understands the needs of this state and we may rest assured that he will bring to their fulfillment the most that a vigorous physique, true courage, honesty of purpose, a clear thinking brain and deep interest in the problems of popular government can give.

CALIFORNIA POETS' CORNER.

THE WILL OF GOD IS ACCOMPLISHED:
AMEN.

By Charles Warren Stoddard.

"There is a city beyond the sea,
With the gates of pearl and the pave of gold;
Out of the night of gloom are we,
Out of the mist of tears:
Captain, I leave the ship with thee,
For the holy breath of God will fold
The ripples before thee. Seek the gate
That is formed of a single pearl, and wait
The angel that beareth the golden key;

Not an evil thing shall pass with thee,
Never a thought of fears.

"You cannot miss the haven of hope,
With God at the helm, and angel's wings
Puffing the sails with their flutterings,
And a loyal soul at every rope.

"God be with you, captain and crew!"
Said the pilot kindly. Every one Cried "Amen, pilot! God bless you!
A prosperous voyage has just begun;
I have another work to do;
God be with you!" Then like a light,
The pilot's soul went out with the night.
We were alone, but our chart was true.
On we sped with the rising sun.
Why did the pilot's guiding cease?
He had found Heaven: we had found peace.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Race of the Dreamers.

Race of the dreamers, one and all,
Rise from the graves where you do not sleep,
Teach us the magic that held you thrall,
Give us our share in your visions deep,
For the world has gone mad in its hungry
greed,
Ever men struggle and plot and scheme—
Race of the dreamers, to thee we plead,
Give us a part in your wondrous dream.

Shakespeare, king of the dreaming host,
Have we no power to dream with thee?
While of our dollars we prate and boast,
Aye on our souls have we turned the key?
Nay, we have wandered and blindly strayed,
Worshipping Mammon, as we confess,
Yet would we walk with thee, unafraid,
Into the vale where the visions press.

Old Sam Johnson, dreaming his dream;
Burns and Chatterton, Keats and Poe,
Drinking with gods of their nectar's stream,
Supping with poverty, ill and woe;
Little they heeded, and little they cared,
Walking in loneliness, each as a god—
We do serve Mammon, by folly ensnared,
But, oh, for the grace of the way that they trod!

Race of the dreamers; kingly are they,
Monarchs enthroned in the Kingdom of Thought.
All of the ages acknowledge their sway;
Out of their wisdom our knowledge is wrought.
Ay, we are sadden and sadly unwise,
Yet, as we grasp at the things we shall rue,
Teach us, ye dreamers, how rare were the prize
Could we but share in the dreams that ye knew.

Here's Your Chance for a Title.

Heretofore it has been the custom among a certain class of un-American Americans to secure an European title by paying munificently for it, and then throwing in a bit of rare or overdone American femininity by way of good measure. It is, therefore, to be able to announce that hereafter it may not be necessary to throw in the femininity.

The "Marquise de la Rochebryant," who claims to be the honored possessor of twenty-nine titles, all in good condition and very slightly showprow, now is in New York, and there offers for sale any or all of her titles (presumably reserving one for use about her kitchen at home) to anyone who will pay her price, which in the case of the "Countess d'Autier" title is $1,000,000, she already having refused $500,000 for it. The "Marquise" says: "I can see nothing dishonorable in trying to sell some of my titles. I'm twenty-nine, and I want cash for some of them."

Sure, there is nothing dishonorable about it. To take advantage of fools long has been recognized as a feature of certain business operations, and we have some over here who could jump at such a chance as the "Marquise" offers. Here is one, John K. Nurich, for instance, who feels that his life cannot move along like a grand, sweet song until he has a title in the family. Would it not be better for him to buy an unembellished one than to pay a big price for one with a cash-hunting what-is-it? attached to it? Would it not be better to buy it outright, keep his daughter at home and thus head off an international divorce? Any American citizen whose brain has passed the rudimentary stage where the acquisition of dollars is possible should answer these questions in the affirmative. The "Marquise de la Rochebryant" (whatever her name when she is at home) is opening up a bright vista of hope for a certain type of American. There is a prospect that he may be able to buy his title without paying for any dead timber.

The Opinions of Rufus.

Honesty's the best policy, but I understand that the Recordin' Angel writes the kind that's only policy on the debit side of his big book.

Oh, my brethren an' sisters, what a soothin' world to live in this would be if none but them that ain't sinners threw stones at them that are!

If the Lord 'll help me to endure the worries that don't arrive, I have an abidin' conviction that I can stand them that do. I notice it's the first kind that's wearin' me all out.

Probly you're right in claimin' all souls 'll be saved some day, but I can't help wond'rin' what there is 'bout some I've known that 'll make it wuth while.

Like es not Paul was right in sayin' women should keep silence in the churches, but they's a unerminity of theological 'pinion that they's no scripcherl injunction 'gainst their contributin' to the good of the cause.

I've heered men brag of bein' self-made, when their wives admitted the fact with humiliation.

How beautiful livin' in this world would be if tariff walls were torn down an' free trade prevaid—all capt in beams, I'm raisin' beans.

When a person gits so they's none of the look-at-me feelin' in him I don't b'lieve it's much use to hold onto hopes for his future.

A early bird ketches the worm, but 'fore you git up you'd better make sure you're the bird.

I s'posed you're the worm!
I read that man cannot serve both God an' mammon, an' it 'sprised me, but I noticed that the book was written 'fore John D. Rockefeller made sech a gratifyin' success of prayin' an' preycin', an' then, o' course, I understood.

We can't be too careful not to read books that are out o' date.

It Followed Him Still.

First that I knew him he cut some wide swath
Kind of a feller we "point with pride,"

Judgin' him likely to win renown;
Affable chap as you're apt to meet,

Smilin' on all in the hustlin' crowd,
An' the crowd smiled back in a manner neat—

An' his mother was proud.

Next thing I knew he had tried a bout
With Old John Barleycorn—Plexus blow

Was what he received, an' it knocked him out.
Same as it has some lads I know.

Worse than the Prodigal Son, I say,
For even his husks were about fourth grade;
So the crowd that had smiled, it backed away—
But his mother stayed.

His mother, she stayed. She said she knew
That her boy wasn't bad in the heart of him,

An' she prayed for him, like she used to do 'Fore her hair was gray an' her eyes were dim;

An' she whispered hope, an' she whispered cheer.

With tender kisses on brow and hair,
Till he murmured such promise as angels hear
To his mother there.

Last that I heard he was standin' straight,
Honored, respected in that small town;

"Prominent citizen," papers relate;
Errors of youth, he had lived 'em down;

An' some folks said 'twas his mighty will,
An' some remarked it was grace from above.

But I've always held, an' am holdin' still,
'Twas his mother's love.

We walk in the desert of doubt and sin,
When over the hills are the valleys fair;

We lose the friends whom we hoped to win,
For they follow us not to our folly's lair;

But the love of a mother, 'tis given by God
To be taken us e'er to the upward hill;
Though we wander in deserts where Shame has
trod,
It follows us still.

Thoughtful Man on Local Events.

"I regret to observe," said the Thoughtful Man, "that The California Weekly has thrown a bouquet, skillfully and effectively disguised as a brickbat, at my friend I. W. Hellman for his financial connection with the Corkins Swindlecase, more commonly but less descriptively known as the Calkins Syndicate. 'Twas an injustice to a noble and gilded man which you will appreciate if you will, with me, review the preliminary circumstances."

"There had been a saturnalia of hold-ups. Mr. Calhoun—to use his case as an illustration—was out walking one dark evening, when Abe Ruef, wearing the complete disguise of an honest look on his countenance, stopped him. "Is this a hold-up?" says my friend Calhoun.

"It is," says Abe, "but don't tremble so, man." "Joy always affects me in that way," says Ruef's victim. "I've been held up before, you know. How much is there in it for me, Abe—I mean, unknown villain?"

"Didn't our experts estimate that there would be several million dollars in it for you?" says Abe. "Then what are you hesitating about? Hand over that two hundred thou you promised."

"Here it is, villain, outlaw, assassin!" says my friend Calhoun. "Oh, if I only knew who you are, Abe, I would denounce you to the public prosecutor—that is, I would if he would divorce himself from the odious Heney."

"Thus was that noble man and patriotic citizen held up, outraged, robbed by an unknown desperado, and something had to be done about it, something to make the dear people realize the shameful and mortifying facts. Under these circumstances Calkins was hired, that being his specialty."

"Now," says the held-up patriots, "the public will learn to sympathize with us."

"The public did. The Calkins publications had not been a month in full blast before the people began to say as with one voice, 'Well, of all the congenital asses that ever made the welkin ring, I suppose that those who would pay for this kind of advertisement must be the most congenital.' As a sympathy-awakener it was a glittering success, but it was not exactly the variety of sympathy that had been foreseen. So Calkins was dropped. Anyway, the Globe, the Oakland Tribune, the Los Angeles Times and the subterranean weekly press do just as well, and their charges are even more reasonable."

"What has all this to do with Mr. Hellman, do you ask? Well, an ass must have its bray; Calkins was the bray. It must have saliva to moisten its tongue or it cannot bray; thus you see how useful Hellman was. As for the grass on which it feeds—that is, one of the dear people, of course you know all about that."

"Did Hellman lose anything by the syndicate's bankruptcy?" said I.

"Oh, you're joshing," the Thoughtful Man replied, "or perhaps you don't know Hellman; but it's different about the schoolmams and the rest of them."

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

Something was "doing" in the line of freak weddings up at Shasta Retreat the other day. Miss Violet Pert and W. N. Lynch, both of Oakland, waded up to their necks in the Sacramento river, were joined (at the same depth) by a Methodist clergyman, and under these circumstances were united in holy but damp matrimony. Newspaper reports of the interesting event did not mention what the participants took for their colds.

The Morning Enterprise of Riverside has changed its name to The Morning Mission, and is printed on yellowish brown paper, which might suggest either early mission days or a lack of water in the place of publication.

The organized grape-growers of California, at a recent meeting, adopted resolutions requesting county boards of supervisors to place a merely nominal license fee on the sale of wines by restaurants.

Fairfield, Solano county, which not long ago was nearly destroyed by fire, is to be rebuilt, largely with modern, fireproof buildings.

The supervisors of Shasta county have adopted an ordinance doubling the cost of liquor licenses, requiring saloons to close at midnight, prohibiting gambling, and otherwise more stringently regulating the traffic in alcoholic liquors.

Joseph Hall, a Woodland teacher, has purchased the Arbuckle Planter, and will transfer his educational energies to the field of type and white paper.

The old, thoroughly established bank of San Bernardino has ceased taking deposits and is going out of business, the manager having found himself in failing health. Depositors will be paid in full.

G. M. Francis, postmaster at Napa during the last 11 years, has resigned his position. C. R. Smith, his assistant, is a candidate to succeed him.

The work of construction of the interurban line from Stockton to Lodi and Sacramento is in progress in the latter city.

A factory for the manufacture of grape juice is to be established at St. Helena.

Notwithstanding the popular impression that times are rather quiet at present, more buildings now are being erected in Sacramento than at any time in recent years.

Alturas, the county seat, now is the only place in Modoc county where the saloon is legalized.

NOTES ON AUTHORS.

Richard Le Gallienne has completed his version of Orestes which William Faversham and Walter Damrosch in conjunction with the New York Symphony orchestra will present in New York next season. Only a few performances of Orestes will be given, and these at matinees during Mr. Faversham's season in Herod.

A new magazine called Vagabondia, edited by Everett Lloyd to be devoted exclusively to people who write and draw—authors, playwrights and illustrators—has made its appearance in Chicago.

Mark Twain continues to enjoy his seclusion in his home in the Connecticut hills, where summer is scarcely less quiet than winter, since there is no actual summer colony in that region. Here he simplifies business and social labor with the friendly services of his daughter, Miss Clara Clemens, and Albert Bigelow Paine. It is Miss Clemens who sifts her father's correspondence, which is probably as varied and amusing as that of any writer in the land, while Mr. Paine is in charge of many of the business affairs which surround the literary properties of Mr. Clemens.

Harper & Bros. are issuing a luxurious edition in seven volumes of the works of the sisters Bronte. Features of the work are: "An Introduction to Each Novel," by Mrs. Humphry Ward; "The Life of Charlotte Bronte," by Mrs. Gaskell, and "An Introduction to the Life," by Clement K. Shorter.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

No Political Bristow For Senator Pistle

There are sore spots in the Kansas body politic, and among the Kansas "Square Deal" Republican contingent, headed by Governor Stubbs and Senator Bristow, and for the reason that Senator Curtis appears to have the inside track on appointments in the sunflower state. Senator Bristow has stood for the things that President Taft has stood for, and the junior Kansas senator went before the people, made his campaign for the United States senate, and won out on those very issues. It is hard to understand, at this distance, why Bristow and the square dealers should have slim pickings while Curtis and his stand-pat contingent should roll in fatness unless it is that Curtis, being part Indian, is the better hustler of the two.

Nebraska Non-Partisan Decision Explained

As stated in this paper last week, the telegraphic report of the decision of the supreme court of Nebraska, invalidating the non-partisan judiciary election law, left too much to be inferred. An Omaha paper explains that the Nebraska legislature was not content with merely enabling non-partisan judicial nominations for office to be made, but forbade political parties making party nominations at all or endorsing, or condemning, any nomination either for a judicial position or for membership of the board of regents of the state university or for or against a candidate for county superintendent for schools. Some of the reasons advanced by the court for invalidating the law seem rather far fetched, and the court was much divided on some of the minor points argued pro and con. Nevertheless, the statute appears to have been more comprehensive than needful and most drastic than wise. Nebraska should try again and, at one time, devote one statute to providing for non-partisan nominations for judicial positions, leaving it to the voters to make what they will of their opportunity. They will do the rest.

Langdon No doubt members of the Good For Mayor

Government League will do all they can for Byron Mauzy at the Republican primaries. As many as are Republicans certainly should. He deserves to be nominated and, if nominated, there will be no good reason for injecting any other good man into the contest; but if the lethargy of Republican voters should unhappily permit the Hellman House-That-Jack-Built ticket to win at the preliminary election the Good Government League will do well to be ready for the emergency. A ticket headed by Langdon and Heney would have the merit of putting the issue up to the people with an unmistakable certainty as to what that issue means to San Francisco, the state and the vindication of the law. It will do no hurt to have a second string for so good a bow, although the chances are that it will not be needed. This paper is counting on the Republicans of San Francisco maintaining the city's honor at the primary election by nominating Byron Mauzy for mayor. That should settle it.

Why Bob Devlin United States Attorney Does Not Worry

Robert Devlin does not worry over the delay in confirming his reappointment to the office he so acceptably fills. He knows that the "political powers that be" in California have no cause for going back on him and are not likely to do so. He has never proven disobedient, and if he can prove convenient as a shield behind which the enemies of Heney and Burns may stand secure while applying the lash to those gentlemen, why should he be less than obliging? If the President should come to understand the true status of the case he might withdraw the appointment. That is the only risk Mr. Devlin is running, and that is not great, seeing that he has two United States senators for him and none against.

Where Does the Governor Get His Authority?

Santa Barbara speech on the $18,000,000 road bond issue continues to be a subject of discussion, as it meet and proper, because, as The California Weekly has said more than once, all the ins and outs of that big project should be thoroughly explored. In Los Angeles county, where a large road bond issue was voted not long since, some opposition to the state bonds is developing, and this the governor sought to allay by saying, in effect, that the State would take over the Los Angeles roads and pay the county what they cost. That would seem to be a very fair arrangement, if all the details could be satisfactorily adjusted; but where does Governor Gillett find warrant of authority in the act of 1907 for doing the thing he proposes to do? There are just two sentences in the act which might be claimed to have a bearing on the point, but the Watchman is unable to see that either of them very strongly favors the governor's plan.

Not so Nominated In the Statute

The first of the two sentences reads as follows: "The moneys placed in the State highway fund, pursuant to the provisions of this section, shall be used exclusively for the acquisition of right of way for and the acquisition and construction of said system of State highways." That comes the nearest of anything in the law to what the governor proposes, but it falls a long way short of being a distinct authorization to pay back to counties the amounts they have expended in good road construction. The second provision reads: "The department of engineering shall have full power and authority to purchase all supplies, material, machinery, and to do all other things necessary or proper in the construction and maintenance of said State highway, with the exception of said public highways which have been permanently improved under county or permanent road division bond issues within three years prior to the adoption of this act; all public highways within this State lying within the right-of-way of said State highway as determined and adopted by the department of engineering, shall be and the same shall become a part of the right-of-way of said State highway, without compensation being paid therefor."

Does He Hang His Policy On Transplanting a Semicolon?

Note the punctuation of this last sentence. Divided as it is by a semicolon following the word "act," it seems to be deprived, in large part, of any intelligible meaning, or if it has one its distinction negatives what the governor proposes to do. Possibly a court, working on the theory that the legislature would not pass a law any part of which would be meaningless, might move the semicolon forward and place it after the word "highway" and immediately preceding the words "with the exception of." That would make the sentence intelligible and consistent, but even that change would not clearly authorize the State to recoup the counties for their recently made good roads, it would merely except the latter from the general decree of confiscation issued against all other county roads. Only through additional legislation the Watchman is disposed to think, could the governor's plan be carried out. In this respect, as in quite a number of other ways, the law of 1907 is incomplete or defective.

An Incident At Orange

Republicans of Orange county are free men. The party organization in that county is Herinized. Lately a supervisor concluded to resign his office. There were two aspirants for the place thus vacated. Governor Gillett early notified those interested that, in filling the vacancy, he would be governed by the recommendation of the Republican County Central Committee. One of the aspirants started out petitions to be circulated among the residents of the district, asking the county committee to convene and, after considering the matter, to appoint aspirant No. 1. Aspirant No. 2 did not go to as that trouble. He went to the party boss in Orange county and, while aspirant No. 1 was signing up practically the whole Republican constituency of the supervisorial district directly interested, the boss got into his automobile, skurried around and signed up the members of the County Central Committee individually. The "push" declares the incident closed. The people rage and imagine a vain thing—to wit, that they govern. They will forget it. The boss knows it. The incident is closed. The people govern only when they read the riot act to the bosses and will not have things any other way. Orange county Republicans have not reached that state of mind as yet, but the sooner they reach it the better.

Interesting Situation At The State Capital

Former Mayor Beard of Sacramento desires to be mayor of that city again. In fact he would like to be mayor of it always. He hasn't any other real good job and, with one limitation, he made a good mayor. He stood for right things in the general life of the city, gave his time to his task and made good with one exception. That exception was that he turned over the police department to the political boss who made him mayor and washed his hands of that department of the city government. The boss who made Beard mayor has no conscientious scruples against other folk's gambling. That is the lookout and his chief of police made his men know that they were not to bother themselves with looking out for any of the games that might chance to be running. This made Sacramento a wide-open town and very satisfactory to gentlemen who make their living by going through other men's pockets when heavy with beer. As mayor Mr. Beard did not make that concession because he wanted to. His impulses were all against that sort of thing, but he had to pay the price or go without the office. So he paid the price. That was the issue upon which he made his campaign for re-election and he was beaten by Clinton L. White, who signalized his victory by appointing as chief of police one Sullivan, who straightway drove the gamblers over into Yolo county. Former Mayor Beard has entered the lists again with the same identical issue uppermost, save that instead of running against Clinton L. White he is running against Chief Sullivan, who drove the gamblers out. The issue is "lid on or lid off." It will be as the men of Sacramento say. The State should watch. The State capital will be watching.

The San Francisco Primary Sweepstakes "They're off!" in the primary election race in San Francisco.

A motley field it is. The Republican stable has a lot of entries all wearing its colors, but the jockeys and horses are what make the difference. William H. Crocker is riding "Old Regular," the organization horse, especially decorated with trimmings from the Red Room at the St. Francis, supplied through the courtesy of the Four Hundred—no, committee of Two Hundred, it is, that is to say, two hundred Business Men of the Four Hundred—bah! Jove! courtesy of Hellman, Jr., no less. Jockey Crocker's mascot is Charles M. Fickert, and for a straight tip on the race, take this: Fickert is against the prosecution of the Calhoun type of gentleman, and the Hellman type of gentleman is the Calhoun type of blood, and so Fickert—but the conclusion of the syllogism is obvious. Byron Mauzy rides "Municipal League," a pedigreed thoroughbred sired by Lincoln Roosevelt, one-year-old but a likely looker and a shade the favorite on the books. Three other jockeys, Countryman, Graumann, and Keil, are riding dark horses wearing the Republican colors, but it's likely the steeds are so dark that they will never get into the home stretch.

Other Entries "Union Labor," owner McCarthy up, has a rival "Union Laborer," owned, ridden, and backed by Frank J. O'Sullivan, formerly hostler in the Democratic stable. This race promises to show some class, but McCarthy money is going begging at long odds. "Bourbon XXX," by the way, the old Democratic favorite, isn't entered at all, though Joe Nash has passed the tip that a ringer, ridden by Leland, is fixed to come under the wire.

What is it that makes some candy taste SO good.

It's the quality of the material that goes into it.

Some candy makers continually figure and scheme and contrive to increase profits by decreasing cost.

Quality then has to suffer.

Lehnhardt continually figures and tries to increase profits by making better candies.

Lehnhardt's way costs more per pound but he sells more pounds.

Which is better—to sell 1,000 pounds at a profit of 10¢ a pound or to sell 100 pounds at a profit of 25¢ a pound?

Lehnhardt prefers the former. Makes more money and more friends.

Think it over.

The Strengthening of the Municipal League

The hopeful sign in the primary fight is the strength of the Municipal League of Independent Republican Clubs. The registration indicates that this is the Republican year in San Francisco. The Municipal League has nominated a clean ticket and has come out squarely for Heney and the graft prosecution and has left the district attorney nomination blank to encourage Heney's candidacy. The Crocker "regulars" are by personnel and association anti-prosecution; they have nominated a political adventurer and legal non-entity for district attorney, and they intend to use every effort to defeat Heney. Hence it is encouraging to note that the petitions for places on the primary ballot for candidates nominated by the Municipal League were signed up en bloc in less than a week, mainly by people who went to the League's headquarters without solicitation, and that these petitions were the cleanest, in respect to unchallengeable signatures, of all the petitions filed.

THE GRAFT CASES.

The trial of Patrick Calhoun on the charge of bribing former-Supervisor John J. Furey is under way, but it is a slow way and three days of it have resulted in scarcely perceptible progress, and it will be many a weary day before a jury again is given opportunity to express its opinion of the guilt or innocence of Patrick Calhoun.

There are indications that the case against Theodore V. Halsey, charged with bribing former supervisors in behalf of the Pacific States Telephone company, may be brought to trial before long. That is, it may be brought to trial if the health of Mr. Halsey will permit. The case was called in Judge Dunne's court last Saturday, and Assistant District Attorney Ward announced that the prosecution desired to have the case tried as speedily as possible. It is understood that Judge Dunne will set the case for trial tomorrow. Mr. Halsey has been in ill health for a long time, and, although it is announced that he now is better, there still may be a question whether he will be able to endure the strain of a trial.

Last Monday the case against Louis Glass was submitted to the supreme court for its decision, the appellate court having nullified Glass' conviction in Judge Lawlor's court. The appellate court held that Judge Lawlor erred in admitting evidence relating to similar franchise negotiations in Oakland, and also in not instructing the jury that no implication concerning defendant's guilt should be based on E. J. Zimmer's refusal to testify during the trial. These points were argued by Assistant District Attorneys Cook and O'Gara, for the prosecution, and by Attorneys T. C. Coogan and C. W. Cross, for the defendant. The attorneys were given ten days in which to file printed arguments, and after that the case will be with the supreme court, to do with it as it will.

"No, sir," answered the farmer, "but I'm detective enough to know that you're not a very good judge of human nature. You took me for an ignoramus because I've got my old working duds on. I'm Sherlock Holmes enough to look at a man's face and eyes before I size him up, as you say. Send me mail for me? Thanks."—Youth's Companion.

ENGLAND'S BETTER CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

IV. THE TRIAL.

Written for The California Weekly by An English Attorney.

[This article is the fourth of a series arranged for The California Weekly, contrasting the procedure in the criminal courts of England with the Californian procedure and showing why the English system results in a nearer approach to even-handed justice without expediting delay, and why the English method of administering justice shortly before England discarded that method for a better one. The English method is a cumbersome system while England has simplified a better system. The reform of criminal procedure in California is the most urgent problem of the day, and this article, together with those to follow, will be illuminating to all readers. They have been prepared for The California Weekly by an eminent member of the English bar who now resides in San Francisco, and may be relied upon as an authoritative statement of the subject.]

The trial by jury is in England deemed one of the most ancient and salutary institutions for the preservation of the persons, property and liberties of the people. It seems the jury system came to England with the Normans and jurors were "freemen," freeholders, bound by oath faithfully to discharge their duties and to answer from the evidence of the facts laid before them whether or not the accused be guilty of the crime of which he was suspected. It is the badge of the common law and, in spite of its imperfections, is considered the best means of eliciting the truth and of dealing out due punishment to the felon.

Although serving on a jury has everywhere and always been considered a burden, it is one of the highest functions of a citizen to sit in judgment upon his neighbors. The people themselves make the laws through parliament and will not entrust to any arbitrary power the right to judge those who break them.

The Dignity of Jury Service.

To decide upon the guilt or innocence, to convict, imprison, or possibly to hang, to acquit, to acquiesce and thereby to save the lives, liberty and reputation of his fellowmen, is considered the most serious and important duty of a citizen which none should, from personal motives, refuse to exercise and which should not be delegated to the less intelligent. One educated to possibly less worthy, to the community, after first excusing and carefully eliminating the more intelligent and responsible classes. Magna Charta guarantees to every man the right to be judged by his peers, not by "viles et inopes personae," such as disturb the peace, "sleep by day, wake by night, eat and drink well and have nothing." If the solemn judicial functions of jurors, with power over life and death, are allowed to fall into the hands of the less worthy, the jury system will decay and perhaps some day we may mournfully return to the tyrannous methods of despots.

In Great Britain the jury only finds the facts, and only such facts as are in issue can be decided by them, and those facts must be decided on the evidence. The judge alone is competent to decide upon the law and they must take that from him. He also decides questions of fact arising on the trial; for example, the due service of process; he also takes cognizance of facts of which he has proof by the evidence of his senses.

Punishing Unworthy Jurors.

Formerly if the jury was corrupted, misbehaved or brought in a false verdict, a writ of attaint was granted and the first jury was tried by a second jury and if convicted the members of the first jury were declared infamous, imprisoned for one year, forfeited all their personal property, their lands were wasted and their children and wives ousted therefrom. As manners became milder this punishment was changed to fine and imprisonment and later even these were abolished, leaving the courts now without means of controlling the jury. The right of judges to set aside the verdict is asserted but still doubtful. The court may, however, direct an acquittal if there is no evidence against the prisoner, and it may also refuse to receive a verdict and order the jury to consider it, but if the jury insists upon having it recorded, that must be done.

After a juror is sworn, he must not go out of the box until the evidence is given, for any cause whatever without leave of court, but, in the discretion of the judge, jurors may be allowed, when out of court, reasonable refreshments at their own expense and the use of a fire. Formerly they were kept without food, drink, light or fire until they agreed upon a verdict.

If, after the jury have withdrawn from the box to consider their verdict, they have meat, drink, light or light without the consent of the court and before verdict, they are liable to be fined. And if they speak with either of the parties or with their agents, or if, to prevent dispute and argument, they cast lots for which side they shall find, the verdict will be set aside and the jury fined. Having left the box no new evidence can be adduced nor any witness recalled to repeat his evidence, but the jury may have a witness recalled to repeat his evidence in open court.

Power to Discharge Jury.

When a criminal trial runs to such a length that it cannot be concluded in one day, the court by its own authority may adjourn until the next morning and the jury are then kept together having no communication but with each other. In treason or felony the jury is usually permitted to retire in the custody of the sheriff and his officers, who are sworn not to speak to them on matters relating to the trial; in misdemeanors, however, the jurors may be allowed to go home upon undertaking not to speak, nor allow themselves to be spoken to, on the subject of the trial. If a jury cannot agree in a criminal case, the judge has the power to discharge it; also when a material witness is absent.

In cases where the evidence shows that a higher offense has been committed than the one of which the prisoner is charged and for which he was indicted, the court may discharge the jury, in order that the defendant may be indicted for the higher crime, and where an indictment is clearly bad on its face, the jury may be discharged.

Newspaper Comment is Contempt.

It is seldom in England that jurors are challenged for bias or prejudice and this is owing to a great extent to the stringent laws of contempt and the severity and certainty with which they are enforced. Comments on pending proceedings by writings or speeches are not permitted. Hardwick, C. J., is quoted as saying: "There can be nothing of greater consequence than to keep the streams of justice clear and pure so that parties may proceed with safety both to themselves and to their character. Nothing is of more pernicious consequence than to publish to the minds of the public for or against persons before the cause is finally determined." Newspaper comments on pending criminal proceedings, whether in editorials or in news columns, are contempt of court and punished by heavy fines or imprisonment, the question not being whether or not they interfere with the administration of justice but whether they tend to interfere therewith and are of a mischievous character. It is even contempt of court to comment on a case after the jury has disagreed and been discharged, or to publish copies of evidence and pleadings, or to attack the court itself, abuse the parties to the action, prejudice the public against the judge, lower his authority, abuse counsel on either side, misreport or misconstrue words or acts through malice, and generally denigrate or misrepresent, obstruct, obstructing or tending to obstruct the due course of justice.

It is seldom that in Great Britain newspapers expose themselves to the danger of citation for contempt and heavy penalties, by commenting on any trial which is pending, and therefore jurors go into court without bias or prejudice for or against the parties and without much knowledge of the alleged facts of the case. This undoubtedly tends to a quicker selection of jurors, and obviates much delay in the conduct of trials. Whether it is better in the interest of justice I leave to others to decide. The publicity given by newspapers in criminal cases may tend to establish the guilt or innocence of the parties accused, may tend to the discovery of criminals and of much evidence for or in favor of the prisoner; on the other hand it keeps the criminal informed of the steps taken to discover and arrest him and aids him, perhaps, in throwing suspicion upon innocent persons.

Causes of Rapid Procedure.

When the jury is sworn, if it be a cause of any consequence, the indictment is "opened." As said before, it is not necessary in an indictment in England to set forth anything but the substance of the offense; for example, in murder it is sufficient to charge that the defendant did feloniously, wilfully and with malice aforethought kill and murder the deceased, and it is not necessary to set forth the manner in which, or the means by which, death was caused. Neither is an indictment insufficient for want of proper or perfect venue, nor is a variance between a statement in the indictment and in the proof fatal, if the defendant is not prejudiced in his defense, and the court may wherever necessary order the indictment amended to accord with the proof, and then proceed with the trial. Any document may be described by the name it is usually known by, or by the purport thereof. Bank notes, etc., may be described as money; and formal wordings omitted, or unnecessary words inserted, are not considered. There are in England now no bills of exception at the trial, and writs of error and new trials are abolished; the trial therefore proceeds rapidly.

Counsel for the prosecution opens the case to the jury, stating what he expects to prove and nothing more; even of confession he only states the substance. It would be considered as a grave offense to state in an opening anything of which it was not intended to produce some evidence. After the opening the evidence is arraigned, witnesses called, examined, cross-examined and if necessary re-examined. The direct examination is conducted strictly in accordance with the rules of evidence and counsel would earn the reprobation of the court and the contempt of his fellows if he asked incompetent questions for the purpose of bringing irrelevant facts or statements to the knowledge of the jurors.

Few objections to testimony are taken at the trial for the reason that the judge is usually an old, experienced and able lawyer and immediately interferes to control improper examination.

When the case of the prosecution is closed, the counsel for the prisoner addresses the jury and examines witnesses for the defense; the prosecuting counsel has then the right of addressing the jury in reply. The right can always be exercised by the attorney general even though no witnesses are called for the defense, but in cases of private prosecution, that is, prosecution by the person injured, which in England is permitted, the prosecuting counsel has the right of reply only if no witnesses have been called for the defense or only witnesses to the prisoner's good character, for, if the defense rests entirely on character and cross-examination of prosecutor's witnesses, the prisoner or his counsel has the last word.

Judge's Latitude in Summing Up.

The evidence on both sides being closed the judge then sums up. He is given much more latitude in English courts than here. He states the substance of the charge, he explains the law, reads evidence in support of the charge, comments on it and gives his own opinion of it. Then he states the defense, reads evidence in support thereof, comments on that and gives his own opinion of it. The judge having summed up and having perhaps explained the test to be applied to witnesses, to-wit, (1) knowledge of the facts and means of knowledge, (2) their disinterestedness or otherwise, (3) their integrity or want of it, (4) their veracity or the opposite, and (5) their regard for the sanctity of an oath, the jury retire to deliberate on their verdict and, unless unable to agree, they cannot be discharged until a verdict is given. If they find the prisoner not guilty, he is at once liberated; if they find him guilty, two collateral circumstances immediately arise: (1) On conviction or even upon acquittal, when there was sufficient grounds to prosecute, the reasonable expenses of the prosecutor are allowed out of the county's stock, if petitioned for, and witnesses are also entitled to their expenses and a compensation for loss of time, (2) on a conviction of larceny the prosecutor has restitution of his goods, which the judge usually orders be immediately carried into effect with respect to such goods as have been brought into court.

A COMMENT ON ENGLISH JUDICIARY.

The California Weekly.

The articles in your columns on English criminal procedure recall the Reminiscences of Sergeant Balentine. He was the most noted English criminal lawyer of the last half century. About thirty years ago he published his reminiscences.

I can only quote them from memory, for some unthoughtful villain stole my copy. He says the argument is often made to the jury: "Remember, gentlemen, your verdict is final. If you make a mistake, there is no remedy; for there is no appeal."

The Sergeant thinks juries would more often convict if the defendant had the right of appeal. He says to be sure the defendant may remove the cause from the court in which it is brought to another from which an appeal may be taken, "but the process is expensive and is open to the objection of there being one law for the poor and another for the rich."

What the Sergeant criticises is less striking than what he mentions incidentally, and treats as matters of course, not worthy of comment.

His father was a police magistrate in a Times district, where his surroundings were unwholesome and his health suffered.

In some matter he differed from the Home Secretary. Soon after a place fell vacant to which, by the ordinary rules of the service, he was entitled, and he applied for the appointment, but "was told that his services were too valuable where he was to be spared."

His health did not permit of his remaining there and he resigned. Thus he was forced from the bench for his independence, for failing to do what the appointing power wished. His son treats the thing as a matter of course, mentions it incidentally as he might name the school to which he was sent.

He had not been permitted of his remaining there and he resigned. Thus he was forced from the bench for his independence, for failing to do what the appointing power wished. His son treats the thing as a matter of course, mentions it incidentally as he might name the school to which he was sent.

The book names many of the judges and the decisions they made. Of one judge it says, "His action in this matter was displeasing to the Home Office, and it was intimated to him that he had better retire on his pension. So and so was appointed his successor." The names have escaped me.

The striking thing is that Sergeant Balentine thinks, of course, the judge would retire when the Home Office intimated he had better.

Pensions may be good, but they do not always promote independence. In the case cited one was used to get rid of an objectionable judge. But for that he would have remained a thorn in the side of the Home Office.

A California judge may be retired by the people, but his case is heard in public.

A charming girl of eighteen, the daughter of a western publisher and quite a society queen in her own city, had been brought to Washington by her father, and at one of the White House receptions was presented to President Roosevelt. "Hush, mon," said McGregor, looking hurt. "This a' i' th' will. First, I'm aye in the lawful debts were to be paid, which was onnaisceary under law. NEXT let us turn to the Odyssey, that greatest of all stories:

Of all the ganey, unconquerable souls of life or literature, Odysseus of old is easily first. That the world loves a true sport is almost a platitude, but to those unfamiliar with race history, it is inspiring to find this feeling as strong three thousand years ago as it is to-day. Was Homer preaching the doctrine of the survival of the fittest? No, Homer was telling a story. The tale of a steadfast man, a stayer, though in awful luck for years, who never failed to put up his last chip and call for cards.

A tale of thrilling adventure and never flagging interest, into which are woven the finest emotions of life without ever checking the free, bold action of the theme.

A storehouse of human nature, a cyclopaedia of manners and customs, with never a hint of the didactic.

A marvellous tale in its structure, where are told the sufferings, the toils, and the adventures of ten long years in such a way that the continuity of action is never destroyed. No cheap asterisks are followed by the statement "that years have flown by, silvering the hero's hair, and still Penelope tends her knitting."

The simple device of allowing Odysseus to tell much of his own story adds force to the narrative and dispenses with stage machinery.

When the scene shifts, it has reason for shifting, and the curtain is never perceptibly down, nor is there need of orchestra or chorus.

Never was better brew than the old seasoned punch that "maketh glad the hearts of men." Never were better ingredients brought together. We do not care whether Homer raised his own lemons or collected bounty on home grown sugar. We do not ask whether the liquor paid import duty or revenue tax, or whether it was good old contraband "moonshine." Homer mixed it. Blessed be Homer!

The story opens in Heaven; that is, we will call it Heaven.

A grand, whole cloth, unverifiable hypothesis, so to designate it, will put it down as Heaven. A poetic license was the telescope through which blind old Homer saw his Heaven—a more satisfactory medium than the more recent clerical license.

Athen remarked that her client, in her opinion, had had the worst of it long enough, besides Poseidon was now away, watching the squirming boundary lines of Africa. Poseidon, be it remembered, was prejudiced against Odysseus, on account of a practical joke on Poseidon, Jr., one Polyphemus, by which he lost his only eye, and a pun which almost ruined his mind.

Her argument prevailed; and Calypso, a "strong-arm" goddess of those days, was informed that it would be well to return the clothing of Odysseus and release him from the house, seven years of steady company being adjudged sufficient.

So our hero chopped him trees and spiked together a raft, and Calypso, having provided him with food and drink, waved her kerchief from the dock as he sailed away.

Meanwhile we are told of the doings at home in rugged Ithaca, an island whose "steep lean against the sea," the smoke from whose dwellings Odysseus ever prayed to see again.

It transpires that Penelope, wife of the wanderer, was generally regarded as a widow of much substance and of peculiar eligibility. While loyal to her absent spouse, she was not slow to machine attentions. The mental process by which she reached this strange attitude is beyond the ken of all psychology. But Homer was an artist and not an anatomist, and did not worry over the inexplicable. He merely depicted a state of fact which one or two or a few hundred million women have since vindicated.

So it came about that Penelope had in her train some forty scions of the best families, who pressed their suit in a businesslike way, and made themselves entirely at home, at the expense of the Odysseus Estate.

After two or three years of steady eating at the herds of "shambling kine that trailed their feet," and after an equal length of time at the wine jars, the wise Telemachus, son and heir, began to protest. Not at all because there was an abridgment of his rights, but because his substance was being wasted. Just as if a man should object to a highwayman because he took too much! Still Penelope dangled them along.

Then tells the tale how Telemachus set sail to get news of his father. Nestor and Menelaos were visited, and many the yarns they spun of the old time, when high-walled Troy. Menelaos had news of Odysseus, which inspired new courage in his son. Helen put on her best clothes and set about to be captivating. Homer was not so blind after all; he had seen handsome women pass their youth as eager for new conquests as when they attended their first promenade.

Meanwhile the boarders at Ithaca fitted out a ship for the cheerful mission of murdering their host. Even Penelope lost her patience at this, and it is doubtful if the forty suitors ever again regained their former standing in her capacious heart. Finally she was comforted by a vision from Athens, and the tale goes back to Odysseus.

He sailed on his raft through calm and storm.

"Even though some god shall wreck me in the wine dark deep, even though I will endure with a heart within me of patient affliction. For already I have suffered full much, and much have I toiled in perils of waves and winds. Let this be added to the tale of those."

This is the kind of thing that makes a man, and it is merely a minor chord in the narrative of manly old Homer.

After enumerating his many trials, Kipling's returning soldier remarks:

The things that was, which I 'ave seen
In barrick, camp, and action, too,
Tells them over by myself,
An' sometimes wonders if they're true:
For they was odd, most awful odd,
But all the same, now they are over,
There must be 'eaps of plenty such,
An' if I want I'll see some more.

Here is another dead game sport, of modern times.

Doesn't he had a last fling at him. He had destroyed his last ship and his last companion; unable to take his life, he took his clothes. "Therewith he lashed his steeds of the flowing manes and came to Aegae, where is his lofty home." Exit Poseidon.

The marine views in this episode are grandly done. How Homer loved his ocean—"the deep-dived, the many-toned, the gray, unharvested sea."

Next follows the lovely idyll of the rescue of battered, naked Odysseus by Nausicaa. It is as complete as a sonnet in itself; it cannot be paraphrased nor extracts given from it.

The daughter of Alcinoos of Phaeacia was Homer's Portia—a perfect blending of all the charms of modest, lovely maidenhood, with strength of character and dominating sense. Read again that sixth book, telling how Odysseus came to the hospitable house of Alcinous. There are no extracts given from it, presumed to be the truth about himself and his wanderings. No common occasion could have evoked that.

Of all his adventures, the Cyclop's experience was the most serious in its immediate danger and its consequences.

A disagreeable individual this Polyphemus, with a taste for unsalted, unsmoked sailor men and the crudest views of entertainment. But Odysseus rises to the occasion, and finding the weak spot in his armor, produces a bottle. And what delicacy is used in describing this divine liquor. It was so good that Maron, who gave it to Odysseus, let no one, save his wife and one house-dame, into the secret of its existence. It would seem that the cook's friends and the customers produce for flavor puddings were as much a menace to the "best" then as they are now.

And as often as they drank of that red wine, honey sweet, he would fill one cup and pour into it twenty measures of water, and a marvellous sweet smell went up from the mingling bowl. True, truly, it was no pleasure to refrain.

No, indeed.

Polyphemus took it straight, and overdid it. Odysseus will tell you what happened next.

Therewith he sank backwards and fell with face upturned, and there he lay with his great neck bent round, and sleep, that conquers all men, overcame him. And the wine and the fragments of men's flesh issued forth, and the smoke of the hearth flew down, and the flames of the fire. Then I thrust in that stake under the deep ashes, until it should grow hot, and I spoke to my companions, comparable words, that I might have fellows to my fear. But when the bar of olive wood was just about to catch fire in the flame, green though it was, and began to glow, suddenly, even though I came near, and drew from the coals, and my fellows gathered about me, and some god leapt into a great confusion into us. For their part, they saved the bar of olive wood, that was sharpened at the point, and thrust it into his eye, while I from my place aloft turned it about, as when a man loses a shoe, and with a drill whirled his fellow's spin it with a strap, which they held at either end, and the auger runs down continually. Even so did we seize the fiery-pointed brand and whirled it round in his eye, and the blood flowed about the heated bar. And the breath of the flame singed his eyelids and brows; all about as the ball of the eye burst away, and the roots thereof cracked in the flame. And as when a smith dips an axe or a file in chill water with great hissing when he would temper it—for hereby anon comes the strength of iron—even so did his eye hiss round the stake of olive, and he raised a great and terrible cry, so that the rock rang round, and we fled away in fear, while he clucked forth from his eye the brand bedded in much blood. Then I, that I might have pain, he cast it from him with his hands, and called with a loud voice the Cyclopes, that he might have slaves about him, and the windy heights. And they heard the cry and flocked together from every side, and gathering round the cave, asked him what he had done.

"What hath so distressed thee, Polyphemus, that thou cryest thus aloud through the immortal night, and makest us sleepless? Surely no mortal hath done thee wrong, the flocks against thy will; surely none slayeth thyself by force of craft?"

And the strong Polyphemus spoke to them again from out the cave: "My friends, 'Noman' is slaying me by guile, not by force."

(Odysseus had given "Noman" as his name.)

And they answered and spoke winged words: "If then no man is violently handling thee in thy solitude, it can no wise be that thou endurest the sickness, and by mighty Zeus, Nay, pray thou to thy father, the lord Poseidon."

After an agreeable and restful year with Circe, who, with all her peculiarities, seemed to have had a warm heart, Odysseus went on a journey to Hades, to consult Teiresias, the soothsayer of Oedipus, as to the future. A vivid picture of the after life comes upon the scene. The "gibbering strengthless spirit of the dead" is the motive. To the robust materialism of Homer, life of the soul as apart from the body, benefit of sturdy time and brave digestion, could not have appeared attractive. And yet his shades preserved their individuality, they lived in memory of what they had done when they had a chance. They were hungry for news of what living men were doing. It is not for the old conventional Christian angel to hurl spectre bricks at these poor spirits. For these ancient angels are a lot of colorless synonyms, and monotonous "hallooing" is as bad as "gibbering."

This sketch of Hades is a grand chance to make bold to say that the old style of narrative, which is improved to the utmost.

Teiresias promises a "home coming" and a peaceful after-life. Then follows the final disaster to the sacrilegious crew of his last vessel off the island of Trinacria.

The seven years of pawn with Calypso completes the tale of Odysseus, his life, his death, and on the following day a swift ship bore him with great gifts to Ithaca.

So soon as rowers leaped and tossed the sea water with the oar blade, a deep sleep fell upon his eyelids, very sweet and next akin to death.

The first person seen by the awakening Odysseus was his patroness, Athena, in the guise of a herdsman. Straightway, as his custom was (for if silence he deemed golden, falsehood was diamonds), he embarked on a magnificent stream of mendacity as to his past; and here, to my mind, is the most delicious humor of the book.

So he spake, and the goddess, gray-eyed Athena, smiled and covered him with her hand; and straightway she changed to the semblance of a woman, fair and tall, and skilled in spinning and weaving, and gave him voice she said unto him winged words:

"Crafty must he be and knowish, who would outdo thee in all manner of guile, even if it were a god encounter thee. Hardly man, subtle of wit, of guile inattentive, so thou wast not even in thine own country to cease from thy slights and knavish words, which thou lovest from the bottom of thine heart. But come, no more let us tell of these things, being both of us practiced in deceptions; for that thou art of all men the first in counsel and in discourse, and I, in the company of all the gods, win renown for my wit and wiles. Yet thou knowest not me, Pallas Athena, daughter of Zeus, who am always by thee and guard thee in all adventures."

How delicately Athena points out to him that, though she feels the deepest pride in his accomplishments, he must not commit the folly of going into competition out of his class.

The next encounter is with Eumæus, the loyal swineherd, who tells of the doings of the suitors. Here the foundation is laid for the final scene of vengeance. They have consumed his property, they have seduced his servants, they have tried to murder his son, and they have coveted his wife. Really, he cannot blame him in his conclusion that they have gone too far. Telemachus, however, is saved, and Odysseus, in the guise of a beggar, goes to his home only to receive insult and abuse at the hands of his unwitting guests. Verily his patience was tried.

Now, we come to the scene that might have been written yesterday: it shows a refined athletic entertainment between our hero and the beggar Irus.

It appears that Irus maintained a monopoly of the begging privilege, and whenever a few bones or entrails were carelessly thrown toward the door, they were for Irus, if the other beggaristic animals were not quick in their motions. Odysseus mildly suggests that there are dainties enough for both, but the haughty pride of Irus will not brook opposition. Let Homer tell what followed.

Note the culmination of defiant verbiage, and compare it with the preliminaries of modern pugilism:

So now he came, and would have driven Odysseus from his own house, and began reviling him, and spake winged words:

"Get thee hence, old man, from the doorway, lest thou be even haled out soon by foot. Seest thou not that all are now giving me the wink and bidding me drag thee forth? Nevertheless, I feel shame of the tale. Nay, get thee up, lest our quarrel soon pass even to blows."

Then Odysseus of many counsels looked upon him, and spake, saying:

"Sir, neither in deed nor word do I harm thee, nor do I grudge that any should give thee, yea, though it were a good handout. But this threshold will hold us both, and thou art needed to bealous for the sake of other men's goods. Thou seemest to me to be a wanderer, even as I am, and the gods it is that are like dogs, who provoke me not over the words of a huffing, lest thou anger me, and old thought I. I define thy breast and lips with blood. Thereby should I have the greater pleasure to-morrow, for methinks that thou shalt never again come to the Hall of Odysseus, son of Laertes."

Then the beggar Irus spake unto him in anger:

"Lo, now how trippingly, and like an old cinder-wife this glutton speaks, on whom I will work my evil will, and smite him right and left, and drive all the dogs from his jaws to the ground, like the tusks of a swine from the spoils the hunter. And myself now, that these men all may know our mettle in fight. Nay, how shouldst thou do battle with a younger man than thou? Did they did they catch other's rage right merrily before the lofty doors upon the polished threshold."

When Irus, out-classed in bluffing, shows fright,

Autumnus chid him, and spake, and bailed him: "Thou braugant, better for thee that thou wert not now, nor hadst been born hadst been born. But we tell thee plainly, and I shall surely be accomplished. If this man prove thy master, I will cast thee into a black ship, and send thee to the marshes, to the king's edicts, the king's main, marking, who will cut off thy ears and ears with the pitiless steel, and draw out thy vitals and give them raw to dogs to rend."

So he spake, and yet greater fear got hold of the limbs of Irus, and they led him into the ring, and the two men put on their loins. Then the victor, Odysseus, mused in himself whether he should smite him with his hands, or whether he should leave his body, even where he fell, or whether he should strike him lightly, and stretch him on the earth. And as he thought thereon, this seemed to him the better way: to strike lightly, that the Laertes might not know him, who he was. Then the twin put up their hands, and Irus struck at the right shoulder, but the other smote him but with his knuckles, and the straightway the red blood gushed up through his mouth, and with a moan he fell in the dust and drove together his teeth as he checked the ground. But the ground women threw up their hands, and died outright for laughter. Then Odysseus seized him by the foot, and dragged him forth through the doorway, till he came to the courtyard and the gates of the corridor, and he set him down and rested him against the courtyard walls, and put his staff in his hands, and uttering his voice spake to him winged words:

"And thou there, now, and scare off swine and dogs, and let not such an one as thou be lord over strangers and beggars, pitiful as thou art, lest haply some worse things befall thee."

Sitting against the courtyard wall, we leave Irus.

Were his misadventures the usual excuses and a bluff for a return bout?

On runs the tale, with sketches by the way-side, showing the grasp of the old balladist, who interwove these brilliant figures while carrying in his mind the marvellous synthesis of his fabric.

Penelope finally promised to accept the best man among the suitors, and the best man was to be the man of greatest strength and truest eye; the man who could bend and shoot straight the great bow of Odysseus. We can hardly believe that Penelope meant to fulfil her promise, but then she was a woman in search of scalps, and such are beyond all analysis.

The suitors fail in the attempt, and Odysseus is given a chance to try, though he is barred from the prize. Arms have been removed from the hall by Telemachus, the doors of the abattoir are closed, and Odysseus gets a pace that even Mr. Armour, in his young days, might have envied.

Then Odysseus, of many counsels, stripped him of his rags and leaped into the great threshold with his bow and quiver full of arrows, and poured forth all his shafts there before his feet and spake among the woosers:

"Lo, now is this terrible trial ended at last; and now will I make for ever and never yet man smitten, if perchance I may strike it and Apollo grant me renown."

With that he pointed the bitter arrow at Antinous. Now, he was about raising to his lips a fair, two-eared chalice of gold, and behold, he was handing it to drink the wine, and death was far from his thoughts. For, who among men at feast, would deem that one man amongst so many, how hard soever he were, would bring on his foul death and black fate? But Odysseus aimed and smote him with the arrow in the throat, and the point passed clean, out through the delicate neck, and he fell back and the cup dropped from his hand as he was smitten, and at once through his nostrils there came up a jet of stain man's blood, and quickly he spurned the table from his with his foot, and spilt the food on the ground, and the bread and the roast flesh were defiled. Then the woosers raised a clamor through the halls when they saw the man fallen, and they leaped from the high seats, as men, stirred by fear, all through the hall, peering everywhere along the well-built walls, and nowhere was there a shield or mighty spear to lay hold on. Then they reviled Odysseus with angry words.

But Odysseus could talk as well as act, and he replied:

"Ye dogs, ye said in your hearts that I should never come home from the land of the Trojans, in that ye wasted my house, and lay with the maid-servants by force, and traitorously wooed my wife while I was yet alive, and ye had no fear of the gods, that hold the wide heaven, nor of the indignation of men hereat. But now the bands of death have been made fast upon you, one and all."

But Eurymachus alone answered him, and spake: "If thou art Odysseus of Ithaca, come home again, with right thou speakest thus of all that the Achæans have wrought many inhuman deeds in thy halls and many in the field. Howbeit, he now lies dead that is to blame for all."

But Odysseus continues to carry out the programme.

Goodly Odysseus shot the arrow forth and struck him on the breast by the pap, and drove the swift shaft into his liver. So he let the sword fall from his hand, and grovelling under the table, he bowed and fell, and split the food and the double cup on the floor. And in his agony he smote the ground with his brow, and spurning with both his feet he struck the high seat, and the mist of death was shed upon his eyes.

Finally comes the treachery of one of his servants.

Therewith Melanthius, the goatherd, climbed up by the cleftwork of the hall to the inner chambers of Odysseus, whence he took twelve shields and as many spears, and as many helmets of bronze with thick plumes of horse hair, and he came forth and brought them speedily, and gave them to the woosers.

And Melanthius, the goatherd, went again to the chamber to bring the fair armor.

But the traitor was "come up with."

And they made fast to his body a twisted rope, and dragged him up the lofty pillar till he came near the roof beams. Then didst thou speak to him and gird at him, swineherd Eumæus.

Now, in good truth Melanthius, shalt thou watch all day long lying on a soft bed as beseech thee, nor shall the early-born dawn escape thy ken, when she comes forth from the streams of Ocean, on her golden throne, in the hour when thou art wont to drive the goats for the woosers, to prepare a feast in the halls."

The Last Amendment.

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state, on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

So reads the latest amendment to the Constitution of the United States, proposed to the people for adoption more than forty years ago and ratified by thirty-seven states within the succeeding year. Were the process of amending the constitution easier doubtless it would have been amended many times during the last forty years, but that process is so difficult that reformers have been loth to make the attempt. Nothing short of a revolution, peaceful or vi et armis, it has been believed, could result in arousing so many millions of people to the need for amending their organic law. In the republic of France the constitution may be amended almost any day by both houses sitting in joint session for that purpose. Perhaps the French amendment too easy. Our method is certainly too difficult and forces amendment by indirection, as by putting necessary but originally undreamed of constructions upon words and phrases found in the document.

It will be noted that this amendment has to do with the rights of "citizens" to vote and it will be remembered that the amendment just previously adopted declared "all persons born or naturalized in the United States" to be citizens. This makes citizens of Chinese, Japanese, negroes, or what not, so that they were born in this country.

While this amendment forbids the denial or abridgment of the right to vote on account of "race, color or previous condition of servitude," that is as far as it does go. The right to vote is denied and abridged on several other grounds and may be so. Doubtless the courts would look askance upon a state constitution limiting the right of suffrage to persons who stand six feet or over in their stockings, but so far as the national constitution is concerned it is not forbidden. In fact the constitution has permitted the states large liberty in this matter. In some states women vote, in most of them not, but the right to abridge is not violated by denying suffrage to half the citizenship of the country.

In nearly all states conviction for an infamous crime works a forfeiture of the right of suffrage, unless civil rights are restored at the conclusion of penal servitude, which is usually granted. Property tests are not unconstitutional and, if the test be reasonable, not very undesirable. There are many who believe that a bounty should be put upon thrift by limiting suffrage to those whose names get on the tax roll.

Another limitation placed by some states upon suffrage is that of having paid a poll tax. The poll tax generally goes to the school fund, yet there are many who resent the imposition of that tax, holding that one who acquires no property should be submitted to no cost, either for education or for the support of government, thus putting a premium upon shiftlessness rather than upon thrift. Limitations as to residence within a state county, city, ward, precinct, are uniformly imposed.

There is a feeling throughout the southern states of the union that the adoption of this amendment was a mistake and that the Constitution should be amended again by striking the obnoxious provision out. Frankly, they desire to exclude black folks from the franchise merely because they are black folks and, on this coast, there is a similar sentiment toward the yellow races merely because they are yellow. This is a racial instinct little to be reasoned with, but it may be doubted if a retrograde movement as to this amendment will ever become a factor in American history.

It is remarkable that a privilege which the law has so exalted all through the course of history should nevertheless be so little regarded as to cause thousands of citizens, entitled to the suffrage, to disqualify themselves as they do through neglecting to register, neglecting to vote, neglecting to perform any of their civic duties year after year.

One way of looking at this form of neglect is that those thus neglectful are entitled to such a government as those who do vote see fit to give them and to nothing more, that if that government be extravagant or dishonest it is of no concern to the neglectful non-voter, he having no right to be heard.

Another view is that voting is a civic duty as much as jury service, service in the militia or at the call of a sheriff to apprehend a dangerous criminal, and that the non-performance of that duty should be punishable by fine, imprisonment or the deprivation of civic rights of certain kinds. The idea of compulsory voting is being talked of in many parts of the world and in some provinces of Spain it has been put into effect, but so recently as not to have afforded proof of its feasibility. It seems to be coming. There does not exist a serious political ill that could not be substantially remedied if those having the right to vote would all exercise that right to the best of their ability. If they cannot be persuaded to exercise it perhaps they can be compelled to. The end sought would seem to justify the attempt at moderate coercive measures.

DOES THE READER WANT TO HELP?

The California Weekly is a new enterprise. It requires a good deal of effort to put any new enterprise upon its feet and establish it permanently. Such things do not do themselves.

Does the reader of this wish The California Weekly to succeed? If he does, to what extent? We are going to put it up to the reader to measure his real interest by doing one, or all, of three things to help.

First, by sending us the names and addresses of persons whom the reader thinks might become subscribers to The California Weekly. We'll take the subject up with all such persons by letter.

Second, having made up such a list, and sent it to us, will the reader take the further trouble of writing or talking to these persons about The California Weekly, telling them why he likes it and wishes it to succeed? It is influence that counts.

Third, and this is the supreme test of interest and good will, send us twenty-five cents with each name and address, as far as the twenty-five cent pieces you can spare will go, that we may send each such person The California Weekly for a six-weeks' trial subscription. One dollar will pay for four, $25 for a hundred, each contributing according to the measure of interest and ability. All The California Weekly lacks is a big-enough circulation. With that it can get all the other things it needs or wants, including a Class "A" building of its own on Market street.

Did He Speak Too Late?

We shall not be warranted in being overly joyful because President Taft wins a few victories over the standpatters in conference committee. That enables him to do no more than to save some scraps of advantage out of a national misfortune. The conference committee has no jurisdiction over schedules except where the two houses were in disagreement and both houses were in accord in making the general tariff level about as high as that of the Dingley bill. There can be no reduction except in cases where one house or other made reduction, and the body of the bill will remain untouched unless the President vetoes it and sends it back to Congress to be sealed down to meet the expectations of the American people. He is unlikely to do that. If, at the beginning, he had placed the Republican tariff platform plank upon his desk and had said to Aldrich, Cannon, et al., "Gentlemen, I understand that plank to mean a general reduction of duties in good faith and I will sign no bill that does not conform to that interpretation," the issue would have been made then and there, the general public would have rallied to his support, the fight would have been a pretty one to witness and the result could hardly be in doubt. Apparently the President did nothing of the kind, although the public does not know what he did or did not do. The President does not take the public into his confidence. With Theodore in office it would have been different. Thankful, however, for small favors.

Every Man in His Own Way.

The American people will not quarrel with President Taft as to the methods by which he accomplishes good results if he accomplishes them. The Roosevelt way was not a bad way. He took everything straight to the people and the people sustained him good and hard. Mr. Taft appears to prefer to keep his own counsels and to fight out his battles without bothering the people about them. That may be the best way for him to do his work and he may be a big enough man to whip the predatory giants without calling for reinforcements, but the public would feel easier if he consulted it more frequently and candidly. And there are few so stupid as not to have noticed that, since the Fourth of March, the predatory interests have taken on a new ef-frontery and have manifested a new courage, proclaiming with a new assurance that they now have the middle of the road. But, as stated at the beginning, the American people will not quarrel with the President as to his methods. As to his accomplishments they are going to be wonderfully exacting. This earth and the fullness thereof was made for the many, not the few, and those few concentrated into a holding corporation.

Tahoe watershed, is important to the people of half of one state and part of another. They should be heard regarding it.

The corporation owns fifty-five acres of land so located that it gives it the whip hand. It is permissible to assume that the company has taken that advantage for all it could be made worth. According to reports it has exacted a governmental guaranty of a certain, definite flow of water into its penstocks uninterruptedly and in perpetuity. The Reclamation Service may take the rest.

The company is not to be blamed for this. A definite, uninterrupted flow from year's end to year's end is an elemental necessity to a power company. Every power company must have it or use its water plant only as an auxiliary to a steam plant and that deprives a water plant of the greater part of its value.

Per contra, the irrigator wants a maximum flow of water when he wants any water at all and the rest of the time he wants little or none. These two uses are essentially inconsistent. Which shall be the preferred use? Over that issue many a battle is yet to be fought.

But rights in perpetuity are inconsistent with a sound public policy. They should never be granted or contracted away by the government. If any coign of vantage be held by a person, firm or corporation, adversely to government interests, the same should be purchased, or condemned and paid for by right of eminent domain, and the government given a free hand to carry out its policies in a broad public interest.

It is reported that the Truckee General Electric company has absorbed other corporations and now has full control of the power supply for a vast territory. American experience has demonstrated a progressive tendency from absorption through control to the "cinch" as the objective point. If the Truckee General Electric prove an exception to this common experience it will be but to prove the rule. Between the consumer and the cinch the powers of government must somehow stand or the net profits of the industry of millions will go to make more Rockefellers, Carnegies, Morgans and Ryans. That product by any other names will not smell more sweet.

Let the Tahoe contract be thrown open to public inspection in all its details.

Spaniard and Moor.

The unfitness of Latin races for representative government is exemplified somewhere on this earth about as often as once a month, and yet they are forever striving for it. Their fault is that they act first and take thought afterward. All Spain is doing this to-day. Across the straits from Gibraltar, in sight of Spain, lies the Mediterranean coast of Morocco. Spain has, and long has had, a foothold on those shores. The coast strip between mountains and sea is rich, but narrow. Beyond the summits of these coast ranges pre-mediaevalism reigns. Nothing progresses, and for the reason that no government worthy of the name exists now or ever has existed, and the littoral between mountain and sea is the battleground between civilization and barbarism, between twentieth century and tenth, Spaniard and Moor or, more properly, Berber and Arab. Spain wishes to establish order within its sphere of influence, the El Rif district. Her people at home, not understanding what the trouble is all about, and having had their fill of war in the trial of strength with the United States, have precipitated a family row that makes the throne tremble if not totter. This is perfectly characteristic and sufficiently explains what it is all about.

Across the Channel.

The flight of Bleriot across the English channel will mark an epoch in aerial navigation, but the playthings of the Bleriets, Wrights, Latham, and the rest, are a long way from a solution of the problem. Uses may be found for such craft as improved carrier pigeons and, possibly, for taking observations in time of war, when the weather is fine and the breeze just right, but it may be doubted if the strength of materials, the reliability of any kind of motors under all sorts of conditions, the whimsicalities of air currents, will permit aerial navigation for other than highly exceptional purposes. The imagination leaps while science crawls on all fours and those who see battleships navigating the ethereal blue are indulging in pipe dreams. And yet the thing that could render battleships and battleships impossible would prove such a boon to the race that merely to dream of it is creditable to the dreamer. As for trepidation in England, that is nonsense. There have been ways enough for getting armies into England, but none at all for getting them out again, else Napoleon would have crossed the channel in his day.

The most telling argument yet advanced against an income tax is that those who would be assessable for it are such infernal rascals that they would all queer their books, conceal their incomes and commit perjury to avoid paying the tax. That contention is quite too sweeping.

THE WATER POWER PROBLEM.

Not many are conversant with the progress making in the development of electrical energy, through a utilization of water power in this state, and fewer still have concerned themselves for what this may mean to this and to future generations. There is no more pressing problem than this, and that the public may have the data upon which to form correct opinions, The California Weekly has arranged to set forth the foundation facts clearly and candidly.

The welfare of the public demands that as many streams as possible be harnessed as soon as possible and at as many points as possible to the end that there shall be no lack of power for factories, for propelling cars, urban and inter-urban, lighting streets and roadways, carrying heavy trains across the mountains, pumping water for irrigation, for smelting ore, and plowing the fertile acres of the state. For all of these ends, fraught with splendid consequences to humanity, we are mainly to look to corporate enterprise and that such enterprise may be warranted in interesting itself in the development of this form of wealth the most ample opportunities for profit-making and permanency should be afforded.

Nevertheless, the use of the streams for any purpose is a public use and whoever uses them must do so as trustee for the public and under such control as will secure the public against extortion, if such a consummation be possible under our form of government. Again, humanity is seeking justice, if haply it may find it.

Hon. S. C. Smith, of the eighth congressional district of California, is reported to have devised a plan whereby the national government may safely relinquish control of waters and rights of way to the several states. Without scrutiny of the plan itself no opinion can be formed regarding it other than a prima facie opinion based upon the good faith of the gentleman himself. It cannot be doubted that he has considered well the fate of the swamp lands, which the national government relinquished to California upon the express terms that, as a condition precedent to their titles passing, the lands themselves should provide for their own reclamation. The titles to those lands have none the less passed without redemption, faith with the nation was not kept, and practically every law enacted in relation to swamp land in this state was enacted with the purpose of acquiring such lands without keeping faith with either state or nation. Representative Smith has spent a quarter of a century in a center of this pernicious activity and cannot have failed to bear the lesson in mind in devising his plan, whatever it may be.

Nor is deliverance out of the hands of extortioners and rapacious speculators made sure by relying upon the general government. Rumors afloat concerning Secretary of Interior Ballinger are injurious. There are reasons for fearing that the efforts he is making to "get his department back on a substantial legal basis," will have the effect of opening to rapacity a much coveted opportunity. The difference between a narrow and grudging, and a liberal and conserving, interpretation of the laws may make all the difference between a proper safeguarding of the interests of the common people and an exploitation of great resources in the interests of a gorged and predatory financiering. Tendencies squint that way.

Three generations of virile manhood enter upon control of affairs and pass off the stage of action each century. Each of these generations should be free to deal with these problems in its own way. To that end no franchise for the performance of a public use by a private corporation should run longer than one-third of a century. We may properly suffer the consequences of our own blundering, but there is no economic need for the perpetuation of these consequences unto the third and fourth generation.

These, then, are the great problems before nation and state. They cannot be solved without the people being put in possession of all the facts. It will be the good pleasure of The California Weekly to perform this service. For our information we have had recourse to safe sources. In its tumbling, roaring waters California has a source of wealth not second to the coal measures of Pennsylvania. This wealth should be developed without parsimony and utilized without extortion. The question is before the people.

The next article in our series will deal wholly with the Pacific Gas and Electric Company, which is the largest of the companies now in operation, and which controls the electric market of half the state. Its organization and activities illustrate the principal tendencies in the development of hydro-electric power in California.

POWER TO DO JUSTICE.

By reason of urgency in getting the problem of electrical development (by the development of water power) before the people of California, we have postponed the publication of the fifth article of the series treating of "England's Better Criminal Procedure," until next week, but we can not forbear to say of the forthcoming article, that it is illuminating. It treats of the powers of the English appellate court, an innovation in British criminal jurisprudence which must prove its efficacy by the test of time, but there is one thing that the statute of two years ago does do: It gives the English appellate court power to correct errors and to do full justice, and does not confine that court, as our appellate courts are confined, to veto powers, to powers to undo rather than to do, power to block the wheels of justice with little or no power to facilitate their operation. No man whose ears are not deaf to the human cry for justice should miss reading the fifth article in this series.

Our system of criminal jurisprudence has been shaped in the interests, not so much of guilty men of wealth, as in the interests of equally guilty attorneys for guilty men of wealth to facilitate their efforts to keep out of prison men who ought to be in prison, and for a price that sometimes reduces their clients from riches to poverty.

Take the Thaw case. There is some question if the Thaw family fortune, great as it was, will outlast the struggle to set Thaw free. If the Thaw fortune lasts he who was acquitted of a cold-blooded murder because he was insane will be liberated because it will be proved that he never was insane. Were it not that Mr. Calhoun is probably able to bring his allied street railroad corporation to his aid in financing his defense, it might easily eventuate that the cost of maintaining his cabinet of attorneys, his army of detectives, horde of hangers-on, a subsidized press, if not as insanely managed as despisable as the Calkins outfit, would absorb his fortune great as it is reputed to be, in which event his shirt would be short.

Wealth is power, and it always will be that a rich defendant can put up a harder fight for liberty than a poor one, but all the people have more money than any of the people. They have all that they all have, and if the people will pour into the coffers of the department of justice dollar for dollar with the plutocrat his wealth alone will not avail him. Even that wealth may be taxed for his prosecution as well as for his defense. Power must be met with power, or justice can not be established in the face of the power which great wealth affords.

There is another particular in which more power is needed that justice may be done, and this affects jurisdiction of trial courts. Our nation is made up of states and state lines are easily vaulted. Once over a state line the processes of state courts have no power over persons or papers. Thus Mr. Calhoun had only to ship certain books out of California in order to have their damaging record beyond the reach of a California court of justice. James J. Hill and his son had only to keep beyond the jurisdiction of a Spokane court in order to keep from the grand jury evidence of the corruption of judges by scoundrelly employes of the Hill railroads. If evidence may not be extradited, as persons charged with crime may be, then trial courts should be given power to put before defendants in criminal cases the alternative of producing evidence within their keeping, but beyond state lines, or suffer to be taken as true what it is reasonable to assume the sequestered evidence would show if brought into court.

Courts are human institutions and, at best, will be subject to human limitations. That is to be avoided and ever so much power vested in courts may not result in the enforcement of justice, but, without power to enforce justice, justice can not be hoped for.

This paper has little confidence in courts constituted by conscienceless political managers of great corporations, but we must trust somebody with the power for doing justice or each person will of necessity become the avenger of his own wrongs. Hence The California Weekly stands for giving all our courts greater power, trial courts as well as appellate and appellate as well as trial, for only as they are given power can they be held responsible for results. Once give the courts power to do justice and then it will only remain for the people to fight it out with the predatory corporations for possession of our courts. England gives to her courts full power to do justice and it is scarcely debatable that justice is more surely, swiftly and impartially administered in that country than in our own.

A Childish Squabble.

Attention is called to the story in our "Political Table Talk" of how the strike and boycott of the San Francisco engravers began. The cause of war was as trivial as ever engaged the attention of petulant children. It brings reproach upon unionism and predisposes the public to look upon even a grafter as a Moses if he can lead business out of thralldom to such an imbecile and irrational mastery. It is to the credit, too, of the sagacity of an organized political bandit that it was so quick to lay hold of this incident that it might be turned, not only to political account, but he used as a telling weapon against unionism itself. If the facile hand of Herrin be not seen in this then it is that of an intelligent under-study who has profited by example. It is the old artifice of dividing to conquer that Mr. Herrin has used with such effect. Labor union fights labor union, and the Citizens' Alliance makes common cause with unionism against unionism, keeping to itself an ulterior purpose of confusing the graft issue and obscuring it with the injection into the conflict of as many petty squabbles as can be devised. Mr. Calhoun is a great general and he is surrounded by a staff of unrivaled schemers. The purposes in view are to break down the graft prosecutions, to break up unionism and return the chief city of the state to the control of those who have pillaged it for private advantage. Surely these three objects should nerve the arm and excite the hopes of every son of rapacity that dares to call San Francisco his home!

Resubmission.

Unless men will agree to disagree after a trial of strength, social order is out of the question. Unless those who are whipped will stay whipped all human society will be a Donnybrook fair to the end of time. The California Weekly believes in accepting the results of defeat wherever a majority decides the other way until further reflection and opportunity for education shall bring the majority around to its way of thinking.

Ordinarily, therefore, The California Weekly would be opposed to an early resubmission of the Geary street franchise proposition. It has three times failed to carry, the last time by a very small margin. The majority is for it. The only limitation is that that majority has lacked a few hundred votes of being two-thirds. This paper is not objecting to the two-thirds rule. It is salutary. We are willing that one-third should cause two-thirds to wait a while before essaying a positive policy, but we are not willing that one-third should force two-thirds into a positive policy against its will. Unless the Geary street railroad is municipalized it must be turned over to a private corporation. A few more than one-third of those who have voted on the issue are opposed to municipalization. A few less than two-thirds are opposed to turning the street over to the Calhoun system. Which has the better right to rule? If the issue were merely to do or not to do a certain thing San Francisco might properly abide by the result of the last election for a term of years, but that is not the issue. The issue is to municipalize or sell the franchise. If an affirmative two-thirds vote is required in the first instance so should it be in the second, or nothing at all should be done.

The people have not yet had an unconfused opportunity to express themselves upon this issue. They should be given such an opportunity. The issues involved are important enough to justify it. Besides, there are reasons for suspecting that some thousands of illegal registrations have been made in San Francisco and that some hundreds of illegal votes were cast against this proposal. Fraud vitiates all contracts and removes all obligations to abide by the result of an electoral expression of opinion. Therefore let there be a vote upon that proposition alone. With such a vote this paper expects to rest content whatever the result.

Shuffling.

It was to be hoped that the political line-up in San Francisco would be frank. Every citizen knows what that line-up is, and the citizenry has a right to demand of politicians that they toe the mark and make the issues plain. The Republican primary is the only one worth noticing. The ticket selected by the voters of that party will be the ticket that will take the field against the field. The Municipal League of Independent Republican clubs has met the issues squarely. If that ticket triumphs at the polls the graft prosecutions will go forward until the indicted men are found guilty or until it becomes clearly evident that convictions can not be obtained on the evidence and, at all events, until the public knows just where to put the blame for a miscarriage of justice in this city and state whenever predatory wealth is brought to bay.

Per contra, the Hellman-Herrin Republican ticket shuffles. Its candidates shuffle individually. In Mr. Crocker the predatory interests have found a figure head who talks much and says little. He has no specific opinions save on the most general topics. He is a Sitting Bull, a Pook-Bah. His backers hope to put him through the motions of making a canvass without his recognizing the existence of an issue that cleaves San Francisco from stem to stern. That scheme won't near work this time. The same is true of Fickert, candidate for district attorney. He does not know that there is anything doing in San Francisco. He yawns, looks bored and passes the buck.

Fortunately this shallow pretense will deceive few who possess the ballot. The constitution eliminates from the franchise insane persons, some criminals, all idiots and Indians not taxed. All others will know instinctively that the triumph of the Hellman-Herrin ticket will involve the dismissal, or going by default, of the graft cases from "a" to "izzard" and the resumption of the city government by and for the special interests as of yore. Those who are not for civic righteousness are against it. The Byron Maury ticket stands straight up and strikes straight out. The Crocker ticket "ain't a lett'n on," but the public knows what it stands for just as certainly as though it wore the livery of Patrick Calhoun. Its cowardice will prove as ineffectual as contemptible.

One of the Least of Them.

Down in a cellar away from the light of day, in a Chinese opium den, one of the least of God's creatures has lived in pagan surroundings in a Christian city for nine years, during which she is reported to have seen the light of day but four times. And report has it that she was placed there by an alleged Home Finding society whose manager has for many years been gathering dollars from the charitable and, if reports concerning him be half true, doing a brokerage business in human flesh. Nor is this the first time this man has been accused of virtually selling white children into Chinatown. Officers of the Associated Charities have felt convinced that he has done exactly that thing before. It should be made a felony. The person responsible for committing that child to that custody deserves to suffer what that child has suffered—to be shut away from God's sunlight until he forgets what it looks like. And this is one of the wards of the great state of California! If that state were serving humanity instead of doing politics, its Board of Charities and Corrections would be equipped to know the whereabouts and custody of every dependent child in the commonwealth, and it is because that board is beyond the reach of politics that the requisite power and financial support are not given it to perform that service. Such crimes as are sometimes committed against childhood in the name of charity tend to make the blood boil to the slopping-over point. Sometimes these crimes are the result of stupidity and sometimes of greed. In either case they should be prevented as far as possible and punished whenever they can be. No person not the dwelling place of a lost soul could have consigned a cut to such a life as this child has lived.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Those who have followed Mr. William Kent for the last three weeks through "Some Sides of Homer," contributed for the edification of the readers of this paper, should have experienced a re-awakened interest in our friends, the ancients, who lived for us more profitably than many of us know. The human touch which all the literature they left us fetches through the ages proclaims them all of kin to us and not so far behind us as we may have supposed. Their problems are, with some shades of difference, our problems. They lived, if anything, nearer to the unseen than we ourselves and their gropings, like ours, were after justice, impartial, speedy, sure. That justice might be all these, and no mistake, the ancients generally attended to in their administration themselves, with consequences much resembling a modern slaughter house.

Bearing in mind that Sophocles flourished during nearly the whole of the fifth century before Christ, his sage sayings are not half bad, in proof of which the following are given: "It is not just lightly to deem the wicked good or the good wicked, for to cast away a virtuous friend I call as bad as to cast away one's own life, which one loves best." "Time alone develops the honest man, but a traitor thou mightest discover even in one day." "Where, where is the man who achieves more of happiness than barely so much as to fancy that he has it and, so fancying, to fall away from it." "Mischief is the most afflictive which show themselves to have been self-incurred." "Cease no man happy ere he shall have crossed the boundary of life the sufferer of naught painful." "It is likely that one who takes in hand to work ill will fare ill." "There exists not to man a profit more desirable to gain than forethought and wisdom of mind." "It is impossible to ascertain the soul and spirit and judgment of a man before he shall be tried by office and the administration of the laws." "No such evil institution as money has arisen to men, for it lays waste cities and drives away men from their homes. It seduces and perverts the honest inclinations of mortals to turn to base actions, and it has taught men to learn villainies and to know the impity of every deed." "It is not fitting to wish to make profit from everything, for by unjust gains you will see more ruined than preserved." "The grave at least desires equal laws." "To be wise is the first part of happiness."

How true these old sayings ring to this day! And yet Sophocles was writing of the sayings and doings of those who were, to him, the ancients, while he, himself, was born more than two dozen hundred years ago. It is not good that the Greeks of those ancient fountains of emotion, aspiration, wisdom, and, thanks to innumerable translators who have pored over old writings, and worked the enigmas out, they are accessible to us all. There is small need for learning Greek that one may become acquainted with Greek thought. There are bridges for every such stream to carry us safely over, and only yellow backed literature is cheaper at the book stores.

A main advantage which classical literature offers is that of seeing the human problem in perspective. The Chinese paint all their pictures with flat surfaces. They disclose no winding roadways through the woods or pathways through life. A curve in a street line will add beauty to any city and a facing of history and literature of past ages often gives the beholder an incalculable advantage. He knows that such things have chanced before and knows what the consequences were, while those who live only in the present have neither the wisdom which comes of recollection nor that which may be based on prophecy, for prophecy is only a predicting of the past into the future. It is not more wise to suffer the past to be dead to us than it is to live wholly in the past and be dead to things of to-day.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Our Vanishing Lumber Supply.

One need not casually investigate statistics relating to our nation's timber supply to realize that alarm concerning a prospective lumber famine is well founded. Such statistics are given, with no claim that they are more than approximate, but as accurate as they can be made, in a pamphlet recently issued by the Department of Agriculture. According to this pamphlet the original timber supply of the United States covered 850,000,000 acres and consisted of 5,200,000,000 board feet of timber. The acreage now has been reduced to 550,000,000, but, as the best of timber has been selected for cutting, the supply has been reduced to 2,500,000,000 board feet. That is, the acreage has been reduced but 35 per cent, but the timber supply has decreased 52 per cent.—more than one-half of our material for lumber has gone. We are reducing what is left at the rate of 20,000,000,000 cubic feet per year. To offset this, we grow less than 7,000,000,000 cubic feet. In other words, we deplete our lumber supply three times as fast as we replenish it. A very little consideration of these facts emphasizes the necessity of guarding our forests while we still have them to guard. Otherwise the first generation of our children will actually confront that which merely threatens us—a lumber famine.

Convict Problem in the South.

Since Louisiana and Mississippi have done away with the convict-lease system and its attendant slaughter of humanity (principally black) they are confronted by a serious problem. It comes from this way. During the 1890s the last year of the lease system, the mortality among convicts was 202 to the thousand; more than one in five died. Then the system of placing the convicts at work on farms owned by the state went into effect, and since then the mortality constantly has decreased until, in 1907, it was but forty-two to the thousand, and the indications are that it will not be more than ten to the thousand this year, or scarcely one-twentieth as great as it was in 1895. This is a wonderful showing, and what adds to the force of it is the fact that mortality tables show that the convicts (about seven-eighths of them are negroes) live longer under this system than do the unimprisoned men of their race in cities and towns. But here is the problem: As the mortality rate decreases the number of convicts constantly increases, having doubled within a few years. This necessitates the purchase of more land for state farms, and, as such land is untaxed, many of the people outside of prison walls are protesting against the system, claiming that it injures county finances, leaves them without money for schools and roads, and demoralizes unskilled labor. So stands the problem, and its solution still is to come, but it should be safe to presume that it will not be found in returning to a system under which one prisoner in five annually was killed.

And Now, Beware of "Germ-Carriers."

Recently the papers have had more or less to say concerning the case of one Mary Mallon, who, during the last years, has been quarantined in New York on the ground that she is a "germ-carrier." The woman is perfectly well, but it is claimed that she disseminates the germs of typhoid wherever she goes from a private stock which she constantly keeps concealed about her system. It has been supposed that her case is unique, but it appears that it is not; there are numbers of such "germ-carriers." There is, for instance, constantly confined in a London hospital a boy who is alleged to be a disseminator of the germs of diphtheria. "He is quite well," says the physician in charge, "but in his throat repose the bacilli of diphtheria, which find their surroundings congenial and thrive in them. If these were transmitted to other persons there would probably be an epidemic of diphtheria." Then there is a London professional man who has been discovered to be "an unconscious carrier of the dangerous bacilli" of typhoid. Somebody ought to tell the professional man. And a Glasgow boy has been revealed as repository of enteric fever germs. So it will be realized that the New York case is far from unique, and we may as well cease to "point with pride" to it.

The Iron Age Not So Recent.

It has been generally held by scientists that man's use of iron, which gave the Iron Age its designation, began about 1200 B. C. in Egypt, but a discovery made by the Eckley B. Cox expedition indicates that this theory is ill-founded. At Behena, on the west bank of the Nile, near the second cataract, the expedition opened about eighty tombs of the twelfth dynasty. Many interesting relics were found, but the most notable of these was an iron spearhead. As the tombs were of a dynasty which held sway about 2000 B. C., the discovery appears to demonstrate that the Iron Age was well along in development 800 years before the date of its birth as agreed upon by scientists. An interesting, but less important, discovery was that of a death mask covered with gold leaf. Such masks heretofore had been found both in Greece and Peru, but never before in Egypt.

Uncle Samuel Has Been Extravagant.

There is no question about it: our well loved Uncle Samuel has been unduly extravagant. If one entertains doubt on the subject, it is but to look at the figures relating to his recent housekeeping, and the doubt flees. Here they are in all their accusing veracity. During the administration of Arthur and the first administration of Cleveland the average yearly expenditures of the government were $258,349,469. During the next eight years, in which Harrison, Cleveland and McKinley were at the head of our nation, the average yearly expenditure was $372,448,822. During Roosevelt's eight years the average annual expenditure was $555,622,640. Let us put it in another way in order that we may more fully appreciate the significance of the figures. The average annual increase of the second eight years over the first was $114,096,353, or 44 per cent, the increase between the second and third period annually was $183,176,818, or 49 per cent, and the average annual increase of the third period over the first was $297,273,171, or 115 per cent. That is, Uncle Sam has considerably more than doubled his expenditures in a period of sixteen years.

Will Ships Be Made of Stone?

People who ride the waters in ships made of iron need not be startled by the suggestion of sailing in those made of stone. The latter, in a considerable degree, are what the world is coming to if a discovery made by an Italian engineer named Gabellini is as practical as he conceives it to be. It consists of a method of building ships with a species of concrete which is used in submarine work and is known as beton. The keel would be of iron, to which the skeleton of the vessel would be attached. Over all would be a wire netting, which would be covered with beton. The vessel, it is claimed, would be lighter than one made of iron, water-tight, and the surface being glassy in its smoothness, parasites could not attach themselves to it. The decks and bridge would be of the artificial stone, and Gabellini asserts that the entire structure would be far more durable than ships made of either iron or wood. History runs in cycles. Perhaps we yet will return to the Stone Age—on water.

Madam's Hair Goes Up in Price.

Madam's perfectly charming bushel-basket hat demands enough hair, at least, to make a bluff at filling out the cavernous depths of the exquisitely artistic creation. The fact is of cash value to poor people who have hair to sell, as evidenced by the details of the Limoges (France) fair. The Limoges fair for a long time has been the greatest of all markets for the barter and sale of human hair, and its prices have soared and fallen recently. Now they are up in a balloon, and the balloon will not land until the present styles of feminine hair are out of date, an unguesable time which a pitying Providence may make brief. Hair of ordinary colors, which heretofore has sold for $5 a pound, this year sold for $10 or $12, while the unprecedented golden article brought $15, and the fine silver hair which is a crown of nature glory as much as $25. Thus it is that we begin to understand about the hirsute adornment which runs riot in midair's hat. It comes high, but something must fill the cavernous void.

To Unearth a Roman City in Britain.

The British Society of Antiquarians soon will begin the work of excavating the ancient Roman city of Verulamium, which lies about a mile outside of St. Albans, in Hertfordshire. Verulamium was one of the largest Roman cities in ancient Britain, and its location is exactly known, as the society a year or two ago excavated sufficiently to find one of its walls. The entire city, however, now is buried beneath twenty-five or thirty feet of soil, and hence it is no light task that is about to be undertaken. In the earlier investigations the theater—the only Roman theater in ancient Britain—also was found, as well as frescoes and marbles of much interest to antiquarians. It is anticipated that discoveries of no inconsiderable importance will be made as the work progresses.

WORTH KNOWING.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Perry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. The store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

IN SEARCH OF "R. L. S."

Last Sunday a member of the staff of The California Weekly met a friend who, like himself, was out for a stroll on Russian Hill. Together they sought various points of vantage whence they could get varying vistas of the bay and the Golden Gate. At length the friend exclaimed:

"By the way, have you ever seen Robert Louis Stevenson's house here on the hill?"

The question brought out "no" for a reply and the urgent request to be guided to the house.

"It's right over there, on the corner of Hyde and Lombard—a great big house, with a wonderful flower garden concealed behind it."

"Big house?" I thought Stevenson was pretty hard-up when he was in San Francisco.

"So he was—flat broke. I don't know how he came to be living in the house, but I understand he owned it, and that lately Mrs. Stevenson sold it to some convent or nunnery."

The house was soon reached, and a glimpse of the garden caught through a passageway from the sidewalk. On nearer approach, a sheet of note paper was observed on the side of this passageway. It read:

"The Carmelite Convent is 2323 Hyde Street. This is a private residence."

"But it or any other house in San Francisco was never the home of Robert Louis Stevenson. The few sad months he spent in this city he lived in workmen's lodgings at 603 Bush Street, a house torn down long before the fire."

"This house reported to be his was not built until seven years after his death and twenty-two years after he was in San Francisco."

So ended the search. Evidently a good many people have been deceived by the newspaper article that misled this excursion. If the placard on the house at Hyde and Lombard is correct, in its historical reference to 603 Bush Street, it may divert a stream of searchers after literary landmarks toward a new destination.

TOLSTOI'S UNCOPYRIGHTED BOOKS.

It is well known that Tolstoid does not believe that the modern nations or the church, for that matter, are really practicing Christianity, says the Houston Post. He believes that "money is violence" and that most of it is tainted and all of it unnecessary; that when the church accepts these inequalities in worldly fortune and receives into its fold complacently and without reproof men of enormous wealth, who by that fact possess the power of constraining others to do their will, it is doing something fundamentally wrong and diametrically opposed to Christianity as taught by its founder. He says it is nonsense to talk of loving your neighbor as yourself when you ride to the opera in a motor car and pass him on his way who has carried a cold dinner and probably lives five in a room. To be sure, the present volume is not at all controversial, and it includes no such modern instances, yet, whether one agrees or not, one can not escape the conviction that it is this view of life which lies behind these simple and direct teachings of Jesus, and it is in this spirit that the parables are taken up and their meaning and bearing made explicit. The work of the translators has been admirably done, and they have left in this earnest and forceful style its strong personality and its touch of the prophet's naivete. It is a striking example of how the greatest truths can be told in the simplest language.

Tolstoid has long since ceased to believe in working for money, for the sake merely of amassing capital, and he disbelieves in every form of monopoly, even copyright. He has always believed, however, in putting his ideas not only into books, but into practice, and it is, therefore, characteristic that we should read on the title page of this new volume, the strange legend, "No rights reserved."

CALIFORNIA POETS' CORNER.

THE LAST OF CALIBAN.

["The Last of Caliban," written by Charles J. Woodbury, of Oakland, was once shown to Ralph Waldo Emerson, who declared that it was of the order of poetry that lives. To anyone familiar with Shakespeare's "Tempest," its visualization of that epic tale is remarkable.]

Half in the shadow of the cave he lay
One summer day,
Alone save one whose visage at his side
No man may bide.

The surly-folk and winged things from
Were pleased there
To do him grace; and gathered, foul and fair
From earth and air.
Beneath the bands of weed they found his Sore.

He cursed the more
And muttered in some strange, unhuman tone,
Half bark, half moan,
When a sharp-tempered wasp with eager sting
Would close and cling

To the weak knotting of the eye-ball's nerve
Nor deign to swerve
At such a nuisance as the monster's hand
And fierce command.

When the wee insects trifled with his pain,
Fleeing again
Over his gasping throat and witless face,
He cried apace

(A slight, fancee shower of brackish tears, Witheld for years.)
He watched a slender serpent trail the grass,
Nor pause, nor pass.

Its scarlet tongue's inquiring thread, he saw
More closely draw.
Then to the lisping trees and tender air
No more he swore.

So came Friend Death—beyond these moments vexed, Wert thou, God, next?

OSCAR WILDE'S RETURNING FAME.

From an obscure grave in the cemetery of Bagneux in Paris the remains of Oscar Wilde are to be transferred to Pere-Lachaise. When he died alone in Paris in 1900 his body was placed in the Bagneux Cemetery with practically no funeral rites. Now the revolution of feeling in England has enabled his friends to do what they have been planning for years, namely, to place Oscar Wilde's body in Pere-Lachaise, where many great writers and artists are buried.

The legal formalities in connection with the purchase in perpetuity of a grave in this cemetery have all been carried out by Robert Ross, Wilde's friend, executor and biographer, and a monument to the memory of the dead man is on the point of completion. This monument, which is symbolic of the literary genius of Wilde, is the work of a young Russian sculptor, Jacob Epstein.

The children of Oscar Wilde are being brought up in absolute ignorance as to their real name or parentage. They live in the country under care of relatives. If the reaction of the last few years continues to spread it is probable that they will be informed of their real name and will take their places in the London world.

William Somerset Maugham, whose "Jack Straw" and "Lady Frederick" were enthusiastically received on this coast last winter, has written a new play, "The Noble Spaniard," in which Robert Edeson will star next season.

The place in which one may see the most members of the acting profession, off-stage, at one time is Siasconet, Nantucket Island, in the summer vacation season. Actors flock there by the hundreds, and their entertainment is one of the most profitable industries of the former fisher-folk—"former" because the famous Nantucket whaling fleet is now only a memory.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.

Essays of Elia.

If a man love books he cannot help loving the most devoted of book lovers, Charles Lamb. What a mixture of wit and humor and pathos and laughable "whim-whams" was that saddest and gayest of authors and clerks. If one would know the riches of pure joy that the poorest may possess by the possession of a few dozen of books, let him read the Essays of Elia. Lamb buying a book at a stall on a Saturday night after weeks of close saving, passing it by, returning to enjoy the temptation of the extravagance of buying it, hurrying home to escape the temptation, and running back in the dark in an agony of fear that some rival had bought it, and, owning it at last, carrying it home to his sister in triumph, the two to gloat over it and call blessed the poverty that made of so simple a thing an epochal occasion of joy! Lamb decanting upon those borrowers of books who are wanton spoilers of libraries, and upon those other borrowers who, like Coleridge, return the volumes enriched three-fold with marginal annotations! Lamb discursing upon old actors and acting, upon rare china, upon friends, upon natural friendships and instinctive antipathies! These are precious pages, full of human kindness and fellowship and enjoyments shared and wistful longings and the ghosts of dead regrets. Always gentle, always making allowances for the natural share of the Old Adam, always sprightly and fresh and good-humored.

Blessed books, that make such friends! Blessed Elia, guardian spirit of all books and book-lovers! Read his essays.

SWINBURNE AND SWIMMING.

Swinburne sang of swimming as enthusiastically as the Rev. Frederic Ingham wrote of it, says the New York Times, but the poet was no New England "six foot of man, clean grained and human nature," but small, slender, moving even on foot "as if blown before the wind," and floating on the top of the waves like a cork. At Etretat, in 1870, says Mr. Gosse, he was caught by the race of the tide under Porte d'Amont, and swept out to sea, but was followed, caught, and rescued by a yachtsman, Guy de Maupassant, no less. The sailors wrapped him in a sail and set him on the deck, whence it suited him to declaim Victor Hugo to them. He told Mr. Gosse not long after the incident that when persuaded that he must drown he reflected with pleasure that he had finally revised the proofs of his "Songs Before Sunrise," and was only a little older than Shelley when he was drowned. The honesty of this last touch is truly fine; a man intellectually small never dares to own such a thought.

DICKENS ON SHAKESPEARE.

Four letters written by Charles Dickens between January and March, 1864, to a novelist now deceased were recently offered for sale at auction in London. In one of these letters he gave his view of a proper memorial to the greatest of English writers in the following words:

"Besides that I have not the time and attention to spare for so extensive an object (being hard at work on a new book I do not believe, and never have believed in its meeting with such a public response as may be called a success. I dread the notion of a statue, moreover, shiver and tremble at the thought of another graven image in some public place. Lastly, I believe that Shakespeare has left his monument in his works, and is best left without any other, until the distant time when the country, through the government it chooses, shall do some such thing as found scholarships in his name in all the arts and so connect young Englishmen sent to study in foreign countries with the greatest English name."

JUVENILE OFFENDERS IN PARIS

By A. J. TODD.

The text of the proposed new law creating a special court for the protection of children has just been laid before the French parliament. Two young social workers, M. Ed. Julhiet, who studied the juvenile courts in the United States, and M. Klein, who did the same thing in England, together with M. Rollet, lawyer, and president of the "Patronage de l'Enfant et de l'Adolescent," are sponsors for the bill. It is not a revolutionary project, and as its authors frankly declare, appears extremely modest in comparison with the laws which created our Chicago, Denver and San Francisco courts. It merely legalizes and extends somewhat practices which have been in vogue for nearly three years in Paris. In December, 1906, all children's cases were turned over to four judges of instruction (for preliminary hearings). In March, 1907, all were assigned to one department, the Eighth correctional chamber, to be heard at a special audience each Monday afternoon. Suspended sentence and commitment to a private person or association for supervision has been permitted by a liberal interpretation of the law of April 19, 1898. Such, with a certain relaxation in rules of procedure, is the present Paris juvenile court.

But while all these measures, rendered necessary by circumstances, were excellent in their way, they lacked generality; they were permissive and in no way mandatory; they had no legal base and applied only to Paris. The new law proposes to improve the situation by: (1) The consecration in every important city of one correctional chamber exclusively to children. (2) By relieving these judges from the system of rotation. (3) By providing in the lower courts special sessions for children. (4) A special procedure with restricted publicity. (5) The probation system. (6) Permitting the return of the child to his own home under supervision, commitment to a charitable society or to a "third person." (7) Appointment of chosen persons as delegates—probation officers. (8) Permitting return of the child in case of bad conduct to the court for further hearing, or his release from supervision for good behavior. (Now the child must commit a new offense and submit to a new trial before the court can resume its jurisdiction over him.)

Such are the essentials of our own system, upon which the new measure is based. All the friends of unfortunate and delinquent children solicit the speedy enactment of the law, though it is reported that the government may oppose its passage.

Several visits to the so-called children's court here have impressed me with the urgent need for improvement. The differences from our system are striking. In the first place, the trinity of capped and gowned judges, for even a ten-year-old child must be tried in bank; again, the crowd of advocates, also in cap and gown, among them a woman, with their eloquent appeals on behalf of diminutive clients. A squad of police in full uniform guard the prisoner's dock, the courtroom floor and the corridor leading to it. The child remains in the prisoner's dock at some yards distance from his judges and shouts his answers across a stormy gulf to the president, who conducts the inquiry. The noise is incredible; everybody talks; the judges talk, the guards talk, the children talk, the lawyers talk, the audience chatter, and when the noise swells too loud—bang! the president pounds his desk and shouts Silence!

Specially noticeable is the number of boys of 10 to 18 years old, mostly gangs of "Apaches," as they are called—youthful hoodlums who commit petty thievery and assault. Theft occupies by far the larger part of the docket. Striking, too, is the freedom and ability with which the youths plead their own cases, ask questions, contradict witnesses, interrupting them often with the cry: "C'est faux, Monsieur le President, c'est absolument faux, je vous le jure!" Highly amusing and amusing the pleadings of some of the advocates. I saw more than one youngster dissolve into tears at the portrait his lawyer painted of him, his virtues, his sufferings, his persecutions. Short prison sentences, commitments to reformatories, fines, are the rules and acquittal or release under supervision the exception. Though by virtue of an understanding with the ministry of justice, M. Rollet of the patronage receives many boys who, though formally committed, are released on probation without ever entering the reformatory.

In the audience and among the parents of the children appear the too familiar signs of poverty, physical stigmata, alcoholism and feebleness of will. Too familiar, also, the pitiful showing made by these parents in response to the judge's questioning:

"What do you think of your son, Mme. X?"

"Oh, M. le President, he's a good boy."

"Ah, very likely; but what do you say about his stealing, etc.?"

"Oh, oh, mon dieu, I don't know what to think. Ah, M. le President, how should I know?" etc.

Very human and less inconsequential was a letter submitted in a case last week, a letter from a father to his 15-year-old boy in detention for stealing.

"Dear Son: In spite of all that your mother and I have been able to say to you you have preferred to follow the advice of your comrades. Now, today, finding yourself in prison you seem to remember that you have father, mother, brothers and sisters!"

"If you had only stayed at work you would not be where you are. But you preferred to follow the advice of your chums; now you see where it has led you," etc.

The same old story, idle companions, "easily led," the idle brain and the devil. This particular boy was turned over to the patronage.

On the whole, then, the children's court here remains a police court with all the lack of dignity and ventilation which unfortunately that name implies. It remains a court in spirit as well as in form. Both M. M. Julhiet and Klein have seized the idea that the court must be rather clinic than tribunal, the judge more doctor than magistrate, the probation officer more friend than inspector or spy. It is to be hoped that their intelligent enthusiasm may prevail. And in spite of the Roman tradition, the paralyzing conservatism of a regime of functionaries, the technical objections of certain members of the law school, the idea is fast gaining ground. Several excellent articles have appeared recently in the newspapers and reviews, which, together with the books of M. M. Julhiet and Klein and the "Patronage de l'Enfant," conducted by M. Rollet, should go far toward the campaign of education which is the necessary preliminary to any effective reform.

Juvenile Prisons.

Closely associated with the children's court and suggested by the letter cited above, is Le Prison de la Roquette or Prison pour les Jeunes Detenues, in which are detained the 300 odd boys from 6 to 21 years old, awaiting trial, awaiting sentence, or after sentence awaiting transfer to prison, reformatory or private institution. Here, too, are brought the little "pick-ups" from the street, the "lost and founds." Here also, and unfortunately, are received the boys committed at the request of their parents (a practice which has suffered untold abuses). A gloomy, hope-killing sort of place, this La Roquette. High stone walls, great concrete towers, guards with guns and bayonets, iron bars, cells and all the miserable list of penal machinery. The superintendent is efficient, kindly, alive to the defects and the needs of his institution, but almost despairing of improvements in the face of so many obstacles. For years a plan has been afoot for the demolition of La Roquette and the building of a modern institution, but so far lack of money, a slow-going bureaucracy, and the opposition of various districts of Paris to the setting down of a prison in their midst, have effectively prevented. M. Blond, the superintendent, related an example of how difficult it is to introduce even the slightest change in a regime hallowed (or hardened) by tradition. The morning of my visit he had ordered a small increase in the rations of the older boys whom he believed insufficiently nourished. Immediate and indignant protests from the functionaries. "Change, change the rations? My dear sir, they have remained the same for a hundred years. How absurd to change!" But the change was effected just the same.

A pleasant officer showed me over the great

CLAY, FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH STS.
OAKLAND, CAL.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Here's to the Dollar!

Now, here's to the Dollar, the Almighty Dollar,

The Dollar we worship today!

For they were but clod who worshipped a God

They could not receive as their god.

But we, who are wiser, an altar have built,

A very neat altar all covered with gilt,

And haply our god will attend, if he wilt,

As there to the Dollar we pray.

"Oh, Almighty Dollar," we whisper it low,

"On thee we depend for thy grace,

For they were but fools, in the long, long ago,

Who strove for the good of their race;

For Freedom's a phantom, and Justice a name,

And 'business is business' the rule of the game,

And to interfere with it a sin and a shame,

So we worship the light of thy face.

"Our foolish old grandires, Great Dollar, were daft

As they struggled for God and for right,

And we, who are wiser, full often have laughed

As history pictured the sight.

So down on our marrowbones, here in the mire,

We're chanting thy praises, nor ever will tire;

If Justice hurts Business, why, let her expire,

While we in God Dollar delight."

Thoughtful Man on Crocker's Candidacy.

"The Businessmen's Committee," the Thoughtful Man remarked, "was organized to rectify loathsome local conditions which are sufficiently indicated in the golden motto,

"I'll with justice when it interferes with Business."

William Crocker is its candidate for mayor, and a candidate must respond to a loud and unanimous call. Such a call Mr. Crocker received—loud from the committee and unanimous from Mr. Crocker, which, you will observe, complies with the conditions. I remember so well when we selected him after much consideration, it being admitted that he would be less suspected than some of the rest of us.

"Mr. Crocker's views on matters of public interest are pronounced, but this may be overlooked in a candidate who has received a loud and unanimous call. Says I to him in the course of an interview which accounts for this cold that you may have noticed: 'Mr. Crocker, what is your view of the United Railroads' monopoly of lower Market street?"

"A look of conscious pride came into the statesman's eye as he responded: 'I refuse to entertain a view on this hackneyed subject. It is a question of law for the courts, and my supporters feel that we can trust the courts."

"What a statesmanlike answer! And how much better it would be for all of us if we should decline to hold views until the courts had told us what they should be! It would save so much useless mental wear and tear.

"Mr. Crocker," said I, while my heart swelled with pride for him, "What do you think of the Hetch-Hetchy project?"

"I don't," he replied. "I refuse to be cajoled into doing so. Let plebeian minds grapple with such problems; on my white height of intellectual supremacy I decline to consider them."

"Again that thrill of pride on my part. If he had not been a statesman he might have mixed himself up with a topic concerning which the heathen proletariat imagine a vain thing. Of course we need water, but I understand that the price of beer is descending.

"What about gas rates?" I continued, drawing my overcoat closer about me.

"On that important subject," the statesman replied, "I am proud to say that I have no opinion. Gas rates may be too high, or they may be too low, but let us not interfere with business."

"Ah, such devotion to the public! How it wrings the heartstrings!"

"What is your opinion of the resubmission of the Geary-street bond proposition?" I asked.

"In response to that question," the statesman replied, "let me say that I am in favor of a salt-water auxiliary system."

"This response might not please everybody, but it is satisfactory to the committee and me.

"What is your attitude toward the graft prosecution?" I inquired.

"S-s-sh!" said the statesman.

"So, realizing that a hen might be on, I s-s-sh!"

"So should I," said I.

The Opinions of Refus.

Let's license the use of gunpowder on the Fourth. Course, it may destroy a few boys, but our experience with saloons or to teach us how to make money out o' that kind of business.

As I understand it, a clean conscience is something all of us talk about an' none of us reely carry.

If you wouldn't paint the lily, why should you set a creed round the Golden Rule?

The poet said man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn, but he never found no words to express his idee of woman's attitude toward woman.

A peach basket on the head is worth several hundred in the free market.

Don't b'lieve it was necessary for the serpent to enter the Garden of Eden, Judgin' by what I've seen of human nacher, es long es they was a man an' a woman there the same and would have been reached without his troublin' 'bout it.

I understand that the man that wrote, "The longest way round is the shortest way home," did it after readin' a lawyer's pleadin'.

The Woman and Her Child.

Down in Ventura county, recently, there was a considerable popular excitement because a woman, from whom her husband had secured a divorce, kidnapped her child. I know nothing about the circumstances preceding the event, and consequently do not venture to comment on the case, but, speaking in a broader general way, I may say that my sympathy in such instances usually is with the woman.

The mother is the one who pays the price of parenthood, and it is a price written in pain and agony, while all that we men have to do is to stand around, feel useless and try to look gullible. The new-born babe is a part of her very existence; to the average man it is but an interesting sideshow to the great circus of his life. In the anguished hour of its birth the infant turns to its mother for the direct possibility of continuing its existence, and through her alone does it live. Through all its earlier years it is the mother who guides its tottering footsteps and gives to it those thousand and an attentions without which each day were its last.

Whatever man's laws, then, may dictate, it

Dan's Nature herself who gives to the mother the first right to the child. Of course, this right may be lost by waywardness, but what I am contending is that the proof of such waywardness should be clear and explicit before the woman's God-given right is taken from her, and I think that the law—made by men, and not by women—often fall short in demanding this proof. When they do—well, I blame no woman then for engineering a kidnapping party. Is it not first of all her child?

With the sweat of bitter agony upon her brow, did she not pay the price of it? Sometimes, for its own sake, the child should be given to the father, but not until it is clearly shown that she has thrown away the divine rights of her womanhood.

The Potent Reason.

We would save our darling Willie

And the other little boys

From the Fourth and all its dangers—

For we quite dislike the noise.

I Abhor These Things, But—

I much abhor the ones who hold

Their money in too tight a grip.

Who, bowing at their shrine of gold,

Let every chance for blessing slip;

I loathe the narrow way they tread

While grasping tinsel as a prize,

By craven greed forever led—

Ah, yes, such folk I much despise.

Still, I suppose I owe it to the public to mention that I am not that kind of a man, that I would use money only to bless my needy fellow-mortals, and hence, if anybody feels like donating a large sum of money to me for the benefit of humanity, I—that is—well, pass it along.

How can I speak the shame I feel

When some bad brother tells a lie,

How blushes to my face will steal?

At thought of sin he can't deny?

To tell a lie! Oh, crying out,

To thus give Truth the icy mild!

Such deed must cause my grief and dole,

And much I am condemning it.

Yes, I am condemning it, and yet when one pauses to reflect—well, suppose you get home at 3 a. m. and She asks you what you have been doing, or suppose the parson requests information why you were not at church last Sunday, or—say, I am not mentioning what I do under these circumstances, but still I am condemning it.

The gossip's is a sorry trade,

To pick a flaw in deeds of men,

To drag to light the things of shade

And make them live in shame again.

I spur my pen to here denounce

The scandal-monger and his crew;

I loathe him much on all accounts,

And so, I feel no doubt, do you.

Yes, you do; both of us do, but don't you recall that little talk about Brown that we engaged in the other night? And the one about Mrs. ———— you know whom I mean. Ah, thank you, thank you; a most excellent suggestion: It was casual comment, not gossip. Knowledge of this fact relieves me, as undoubtedly it relieves you, for we are entirely harmonious in condemning gossip. It's a shame, isn't it?

Mr. Tarlton Arrived.

The Associated Press has been adversely criticized so much of late that I am pleased to be able to toss a deserved bouquet in its direction. Under recent date, the following dispatch was sent from Naivasha, British East Africa:

"Leslie A. Tarlton, of Nairobi, who accompanied the Roosevelt expedition to the Sotik country, arrived here last night. He was chased into the town by five lions."

How simply told, yet how graphic! And how manfully true! "Mr. Tarlton arrived."

Yes, he arrived; there is not a doubt of it.

The account does not say that he was glad to meet his friends, but probably he was. Anyway, some men would have been glad under the circumstances. Nor does the simple little narrative say that he did not linger upon his way, but I doubt that he did, for it is probable that he remembered that he had an engagement in Naivasha. As an example of clarity, perspicuity and that avoidance of unnecessary detail which raises the hair without entering into particulars, this little dispatch is recommended to the thoughtful reader. "Mr. Tar-lton arrived." Well, I fancy that he did.

Prima Facie Evidence.

"Is he an intelligent man?"

"Well, I judge so. They refused to accept him on a jury the other day."

A Double Conversion.

Hiram K. Pottles an 'Bijah G. Blee, Though they were neighbors, could never agree.

Says Hiram: "These battles is seed of death, Fer war it is hell, es the scripcher saith."
"The scripcher don't say it," says 'Bijah then,
"I was writ by Shakespeare is known to men."
"I don't give a dern," says Hiram, says he,
"Es long es the 'thorities all agree.
That war is a burden to yex a saint."
Says 'Bijah G. Blee, "I say that it ain't."

"I'm a man of peace," says Hiram, says he,
"But the views you hold is repulsive to me,
When you claim that fightin' is righteous, alas!"

"I do," says 'Bijah, "you peace-lovin' ass!"
"Well, speakin' of peace," says Hiram—he

An' the ground it was covered with fragments an' clothes
Pertainin' to 'Bijah. "Let up," was his prayer.

"I'm a strict peace-believer; I am, on the square."
Says Hiram (I claim that his language was girant).

"Well, come to think of it, by jingo, I ain't."

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

The following facts relating to California schools are condensed from the report of Edward Hyatt, state superintendent of public instruction: The total number of school children—between the ages of five and seventeen inclusive—is 469,431; and 352,935, an increase of 10,411 in one year, are attending public schools. Attending private schools are 33,367. It should be remembered that these figures include children of five years, who, in most instances, are considered too young to attend school. Of the children attending school 3,738 are Mongolians, 3,443 Indians, and 2,931 negroes.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

How Big Is Charlie Curry, Pa. That Politicians Call Him Great?

How strong is Secretary Curry as a candidate for Governor?

This is usually the first of several questions suggested by the recently announced candidacy which politicians fall to discussing when they meet, and the consensus of opinion is that his popular strength is great. It is said that he knows everybody and has conciliated everybody so far as he could; that he has practiced politics fifteen years with a view to doing just what he is doing now, and after he has many miles of pipe laid with shrewd judgment and thousands of invisible wires lifted not only to every city ward and country voting precinct, but also to every remote lumber camp and mine where men are employed. There is no doubt that Curry is a master of that kind of politics which exploits the personal pull; there are probably more persons in California who are ready to apply the term "a good fellow" to "Charlie" Curry than any other man.

Of California Politics Curry the Svengali

He possesses a remarkable faculty for making different classes of people feel that he is one of them, and how he does it, except through a hypnotic glance of his dark eyes and a rather oily smile, is a mystery. He lacks the rollicking jollity, the abandon, the impulsiveness of the ordinary good fellow. He possesses more hypnotism than magnetism. He fascinates without warning—at least, such is the effect upon some whom he meets; there are even those who say that when they take his proffered hand and look into his glittering eyes they feel as though handling snakes. And yet the general result is as before stated, and personally Curry is the state's strongest politician.

Strong With Small Fry And Labor Union Politics

His friends expect him to prove especially strong with two classes of people, the smaller politicians and the union labor voters. The term smaller politicians is used advisedly, because the real managers and organizers among the professionals wait until they receive the tip from high authority that a self-declared candidate is the one to be supported before they take their coats off in his cause. The petty local politicians who may be swayed by sentiment are expected to wax enthusiastic out of a belief that Curry is essentially one of themselves. As for the labor union people, it is suspected that he is chiefly strong with the politicians among them, although there is no sentiment against him among the others, and many of them are just the sort of persons with whom the personal pull would be effective.

What Will Herrin Do About Curry's Candidacy?

It is easy to foresee even now that just how formidable the Secretary of State will be as a candidate at a direct primary for the Republican nomination for Governor will depend on whether the organization takes him up, orders the managers to endorse him, and turns over to him the full power of the machine. There are already some shrewd ones who think that Mr. Herrin will be forced to do this and that the reason why Curry got into the field so early was that he desired to demonstrate his personal strength and prove to the organization that it must back him if it wants to win, as of course it always does. It will back the winning man if it has the sagacity to pick him, even at the humiliation of not being able to control him in office, a misfortune that has overtaken Mr. Herrin only once since he assumed to dominate California politics in the interests of the Harriman dynasty. That once was while Geo. C. Pardee was governor of California. The "organization" ostensibly supported him, whether or not it threw its influence to the other man, and lost out on him.

Is Gillett Holding the Crowd While Curry Fixes Fences?

There are many reasons why the Harriman dynasty should wish to give the people of California their fill of the direct primary at the start and, to do this, it would be hard to find a fitter man than Charles Curry. He can poll a good many votes and, if elected, he would give the state an administration that would give good citizenship the horrors for forty years. It would be a spoilsman's administration from start to finish and every office would be filled by a politician. The only way to convince the public that corporation government is preferable to free government and yet corporation interests would be preserved from harm, because Curry is a corporation man. Nor did he break into the contest with any risk of incurring the hostility of Gillett and his friends. He is too shrewd of a politician for that, and the inference is not unwarranted that an understanding all around exists. Gillett's declining to declare himself will naturally tend to restrain other candidates from entering the lists, and so give Curry an unhindered opportunity to fix his fences undisturbed. If the state should rise in revolt Curry will doubtless be dropped by the "organization," but that he is being purposely given an opportunity to try the matter out, under the watchful eye of the "organization," few cognizant with the game as it is played in California will be inclined to doubt. In fine, little short of a general revolt will save California from an administration which, by comparison, will make that of Henry T. Gage look like a great moral wave.

A Strike With Background

Shall the compositor in a newspaper office be allowed to fasten an engraving to its supporting block when he makes up a page, or the paper, or must he call in a member of the engravers' union to do it? That sounds like a simple question, to be fought out by the engravers' union and the newspaper owners; in short, that it should involve three or four dozen men, at the most. But if an explanation of the ramifications of this simple episode, that has reached the office of The California Weekly, is true, it is likely to involve the outcome of the approaching municipal election in San Francisco.

What the Strike Is About

The newspaper engravers of San Francisco have this grievance, and they have called a strike, that has been in progress for several weeks, to support their contention that the compositors have no right to tack a cut onto a block, an operation taking only a moment's work, and wholly unimportant to anyone. The Call is the paper against which they have had this grievance longest, but the strike was declared in all the offices, and the executive committee of the Allied Printing Trades backed up the strike by ordering a boycott of the Examiner, which had as much to do with the original cause of the strike as the Call, or as the Chronicle which discharged all its engravers at the first sign of trouble. At a meeting of the San Francisco Labor Council, to be held to-night, the executive committee of the Allied Printing Trades will endeavor to have the Labor Council order a boycott, by all union laborers, against the San Francisco Examiner. This action will be contested by the conservative Typographical Union, whose president, George A. Tracy, recently issued a statement declaring the action of the executive committee illegal because the delegates had not been instructed by their several unions before ordering the boycott.

So much for the situation. Informant alleges that the origin of this situation is two-fold: the political ambition of P. H. McCarthy, and the open-shop ambitions of the Citizens' Alliance. Mc-Carthy ordered all his union labor followers to register as Republicans. It will be noticed that the Republican registration this year is 70 per cent of all the registration. It will be noticed, too, that the Union Labor registration is away below that of two years ago. Now certain questions become pertinent: Is it not true that P. H. McCarthy declared his allegiance to William Crocker's candidacy early in the campaign?

Is it not true that Michael Casey has repeatedly, in public, declared that he and McCarthy have "buried the hatchet"?

Is it not true that Casey developed an ambition to be the Union Labor candidate for mayor as soon as McCarthy announced himself for Crocker?

Did McCarthy then, after consultation with Crocker's organization Republican friends, suddenly return to the Union Labor camp, announce his candidacy for mayor, and hurry through his nomination by the county committee of the Union Labor party?

Does McCarthy know that a strike during a political campaign tends to solidify the Union Labor vote?

Is It a War for The Open Shop?

Further questions, to help solve the mystery of the open-shop side of the matter, are here propounded:

Are the members of the Citizens' Committee, otherwise the "Business Men's Committee" (Hellmann, Jr., De Young, et al.) friends of Patrick Calhoun?

Are they also members of the Citizens' Alliance?

Does Calhoun own the Evening Globe (and Post, consolidated)?

Is Fred Hogue, manager of the Globe, the Fred Hogue who wrote Harrison Grey Otis's anti-union labor articles for years in the Los Angeles Times?

Is Fred Hogue's real name Fred Hamell? Did Fred Hamell's father-in-law, while a member of the typographical union in Los Angeles, supply Fred Hogue with the facts about the unions to be used in fighting the unions in the Times?

Has Fred Hogue carried to Patrick Calhoun a promise from Otis that, if the Globe is declared to be an open-shop paper, Otis will come here and manage the Globe for Calhoun in a big fight for the open-shop in all the trades in San Francisco?

Would such a fight serve to solidify the "business men" of San Francisco to support Calhoun, not only in the fight for the open-shop, but in other ways?

Would Calhoun be glad if the engravers' strike resulted in a boycott of all the papers in San Francisco, and would he declare the Globe an open-shop paper on the plea that it was harassed unjustly, since it does not use any engravings and consequently employs no engravers.

A Three-Cornered Shrivelfight The Business Men have completed their nominations except for supervisory candidates. Partly in the hope of splitting the vote of the Municipal League of Independent Republican Clubs, they have named some candidates from those clubs' list, notably John E. McDougald, incumbent for treasurer, and John J. Greif for county clerk. In one equally notable instance they have named a different candidate—for sheriff. Here a pretty fight threatened to disrupt the Business Men. M. H. de Young made a bitter fight for John J. Deane, who was finally nominated. Deane's opponent was Fred Eggers, who has been laying his wires for years to get this office. Eggers is bitterly disappointed, and will continue his fight at the primaries. This division of the machine vote promises to help the candidacy of E. J. Callan, who is backed by the Municipal League. Callan is a member of the assembly, and in the last session made an admirable record by standing right on all measures for the public interest, and an exceptionally admirable record by being one of the very few Republicans who stood out to the end against the re-election of Senator Perkins. Mr. Callan has an inside claim upon the suffrages of reputable men who stand for right things.

Will Leland Withdraw? McNab regulars, though without any formal list of candidates, will support Fickert for district attorney. They are said to have received the tip also that Leland is the acceptable majority candidate, but it is rumored that the inquest over the remains of the late Mrs. de la Montanya has been so unsatisfactory to the public, which expected that the case would be more thoroughly sifted than it was, that Leland will possibly see to it that his candidacy does not come before the people at all prominently. There is a feeling abroad that the true version of that unfortunate woman's untimely taking off has not yet been told and that it is a good deal the coroner's fault that it hasn't.

A Promise Looks Different After They Get the Money The voters of Los Angeles are always progressive when questions of public improvement are in issue, authorized a bond issue of $3,500,000 to construct good roads, and one of the strong inducements which led to this decision was the promise of the County Board of Supervisors, which has the expenditure of the money, that it would be guided by the counsel of an advisory committee made up of leading citizens. Now the supervisors have the bond money, and they have no further need for the advisory committee. At least, such is the substance of the complaint made by the committee, which has addressed a communication to the civic bodies of Los Angeles, in which it is asserted that the supervisors have failed to advise as they promised. Substantially the same thing happened in Sacramento county, and it might be expected to happen in any county in which the Board of Supervisors is made up of politicians, for according to the politicians' view, is not the proper object of public expenditures politics?

Relieve Governor and Politicians, That Late Give the People a Chance An internal disturbance of the Republican county committee of Orange county serves to direct attention to one of the minor evils of local government in this state. A county supervisor resigned, and immediately the politicians became involved in a fight over the question whom the governor should appoint to succeed him. No small part of the troubles of a governor of California arises out of the necessity of filling occasional vacancies in fifty-seven boards of county supervisors. It is an absurd thing to impose on a governor the duty of making these local appointments; but it is worse than absurd for it leads to bad results. The governor knows nothing about the village issues involved and almost always turns the selection over to the county committee of his party, which proceeds to do petty politics with it. When an office so important to the locality, and of so little importance outside of it, as a county supervisorship, is to be filled, a district election should be called and the governor relieved of a nasty little job.

THE GRAFT CASES.

In the ninth day of the Calhoun trial not one possible juror had been secured to break the vacancy in the jury box. A close approximation to one thousand talesmen had passed in long procession through the courtroom, but as there was not one who had not heard about, read about, or discussed, the bribery charges against Patrick Calhoun, none was found available. Some of these prospective jurors asserted that they held no opinion which evidence would not change; the opinions of others varied from that of Alfred Lilienfeld, the clothing merchant, which he avowed "God Almighty himself could not change," to those which were only less extreme on the other side; but, whether they held one opinion, another, or apparently none at all, they were passed on and out.

HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER IN CALIFORNIA

I. THE SURPRISING MAGNITUDE OF ITS DEVELOPMENT.

By E. FRENCH STROTHER.

When a man has burned a barrel of crude oil in an engine for the purpose of generating power with which to pump irrigating water out of the ground, he goes and buys another barrel of oil if he wants any more power. The barrel he has used up is gone forever from the resources of power development. Likewise, a ton of coal, once burned in a steam engine, has served man once and for all, and its usefulness must then be subtracted from the total of man's resources for power.

A Perpetual Source of Power.

But so long as the mountains stand and so long as clouds form and rains fall and rivers descend, an electric generator, properly hooked up to a water wheel under a good pressure of falling water, will generate electric power.

Oil and coal, the scientists tell us, will ultimately all be used up by the increasing demands of our industrial life for fuel for power. Then, so far as we can see now, we must fall back upon such perpetual sources of power as the hydraulic generation of electricity.

California is singularly blessed with the natural equipment for this latter form of power generation. The steep slope of the Sierra Nevada and the immense storage of water at the top of the range in the form of snow, have provided extraordinary facilities for natural power sites. Where the forest cover of the range is not sufficient to retain the moisture so that there is an equable flow of water in the mountain streams the year round, nature has provided narrow glacier-worn canyons that make admirable dam-sites for storing reservoirs from which the water may be drawn at will.

But California has not waited for the exhaustion of her fuel oil before developing her power possibilities. The development that has already taken place is stupendous, as the following paragraph will show; and they are, we believe, far beyond the idea that the average man has of their scope and importance.

Huge Investment in Water Power.

Nearly half a billion dollars in outstanding stock, and more than 125 million dollars in outstanding bonds, are invested in the generation of electric power in California; and of all this power, more than three-fourths is generated by falling water in the mountains.

The significance of these huge sums of money may be better grasped by the following comparison: The money invested in the bonds alone of California electric enterprises exceeds, by two million dollars, the entire gross transportation revenues of the Southern Pacific Company for carrying 41 million passengers and 22 million tons of freight during the year ended June 30, 1908.

Blanchfield's "Western Electric and Gas Directory" estimates that 465,965 horsepower is the rated capacity of the hydro-electric plants now in operation in California. To maintain this capacity in steam plants generating electricity would require the burning of 3,500,000 tons of coal per year.

California Towns That Use the Power.

Electricity generated by water power lights Los Angeles and most of the other cities and towns of Southern California, and runs the larger share of the street cars in Los Angeles and over the great interurban trolley system around it. Electricity generated by water power lights Bakersfield, Visalia, Fresno, Tulare, Hanford, Madera, Merced, Modesto, Mariposa, Stockton, Sacramento, Redding, Red Bluff, Ukiah, Oakland, Berkeley, San Jose, Alameda, Chico, Marysville, Colusa and other cities and towns. Electric power generated by water runs the machinery of shops and factories in most of the larger cities of the state. Electric power generated by water is the motive power of part of all the street railways of Bakersfield, Fresno, Stockton, Sacramento, Oakland, Berkeley and San Jose.

We believe that these statements will surprise the average man, who has seen the use of electricity increase in his own neighborhood without realizing that what he has seen is only part of a far-reaching economic development by which, already, the control of a majority of the best power sites in the Sierra Nevada has come into the hands of about a score of corporations, and that four or five of these practically control the electrical business of the entire state. Nor does he realize what a government expert stated four years ago, that "it is believed that 75 per cent. of the commercially feasible power opportunities of northern and central California have been alienated from public ownership."

To grasp the importance of these facts, consider that California has no natural resources of fuel with which to develop power except petroleum, and that the limits of production of that fuel, though undetermined and perhaps remote, are yet certain to be reached. When they are reached, and when nothing is left of our coal and exposure of our oil, the miners and the transportation companies of the state will be at the mercy of the hydro-electric power companies.

Companies That Control Power Business.

At present "the great bulk of the power opportunities of the state are controlled by the following companies: California Gas and Electric Corporation, Western Power Company, Northern California Power Company, Edison Electric Company, and Pacific Light and Power Company," and the Mt. Whitney Power Company.

The Edison Electric Company and the Pacific Light and Power Company control practically the entire electric power, electric lighting and electric railway business of all California south of Fresno, together with most of the feasible power sites in the Sierra Nevada from Madera county to Tehachapi.

The Pacific Gas and Electric Company (which includes the California Gas and Electric Corporation) controls the electric market of all central California, from Fresno to Chico, including San Francisco, Oakland, Berkeley, Alameda, San Jose, Stockton and Sacramento, together with probably a major share of the available power sites from Tuolumne county to Butte county.

The Northern California Power Company controls most of the valuable power sites in the Mt. Shasta region; supplies most of the interior towns and mines north of Chico with power, and sells power to the Pacific Gas and Electric Company.

The Western Power Company is generally considered to be a part of the equipment of the new Western Pacific transcontinental railroad, as its power stations are near the line of that road and its transmission lines lead to Oakland, making feasible the electrification of the route from the summit to the bay. The company is building a hydro-electric plant, on the Feather river near Oroville, capable of generating 165,000 electrical horsepower, with a transmission line about 300 miles long to San Francisco.

The Smaller Companies.

In addition to these larger companies, nineteen smaller corporations, each generating, at least, 100 horsepower or more, serve smaller local territories with power for lighting purposes, factory use, or for mines. Some of these smaller companies, though having a separate legal existence, are controlled by one of the larger corporations. Besides all these, there are twenty-one still smaller plants, generating from sixty horsepower to more than 1000 horsepower apiece, and supplying the local needs of small towns, mines and industrial plants.

These companies represent the entire development of the hydro-electric power industry in California; but, in addition, they control scores of valuable power sites in the Sierra that are held undeveloped pending an increased demand for power and pending further the final settlement of a controversy between the government and the promoters regarding the charges the government shall exact for power developed on land under the supervision of the Forest Service. Many corporations and individuals not included in the list of operating concerns hold such power sites by virtue of filings under the state law, and many of these are held purely for their speculative value and with no regard for public benefit in the manner or time of their development. These speculative holdings, together with the facts in the controversy with the Forest Service, will be discussed in a later article in this series.

Power Possibilities Mostly Taken Up.

The extent to which the power possibilities of the state have been taken up is indicated by the statement of government engineers that the Tuolumne River is the only stream draining the west slope of the Sierra Nevada that is not controlled by the electric power companies, and that the California Gas and Electric Company is trying to get this. The streams of the Coast Range are relatively unimportant, but they, too, are nearly all tied upon for power purposes. And the Forest Service alone, which has jurisdiction only over the lands within the national forests, is receiving on an average one application a day for permission to use such lands for power sites.

In concluding this introductory article it is pertinent to point out a few facts that will help to throw light upon the activities and the problems of this great development as described in the articles to follow.

Tendencies Toward a Power Monopoly.

First, the use of a natural water-fall, or of an artificial water-fall fed from an artificial reservoir, for the development of electric power, is "a monopoly of the extreme type." The number of such sites absolutely limited by the natural formation of the mountains, by the number of streams, and by the total amount of descending water on the entire watershed. Only one company can use one site. Thus the total number of companies which can enjoy the privilege of making profits out of the sale of electricity generated by water power is definitely limited by nature. This natural monopoly tends to suggest to the power companies the advantages of completing the monopoly by consolidating the several companies so as to avoid competition, thus supplementing the monopoly of power possibilities by a monopoly of markets. This tendency toward consolidation is readily discerned in the organization of the larger companies that will be described later.

State Laws Permit Grabbing.

Another noteworthy fact is that the state laws regarding the diversion of water from streams for power purposes have made it possible for speculators to hold the rights to power sites, undeveloped, in some cases for years in advance of any possibility of profitable use, and in other cases years after the public should have been deriving the benefit of their development which the speculators will not permit until they get a speculative price for their holdings. The forest service, in line with the new national policy of conservation, is now preventing this kind of business within the national forests, but these reserves are only a part of the entire watershed.

One of the great services to California that is now being rendered by the Forest Service is its work to prevent these great natural monopolies becoming perpetual monopolies, and its work to force the control of power sites out of the hands of speculators and into the hands of solid investors, who will develop their sites as soon as they get the right to do so and who will relinquish them after they have enjoyed their profits for the reasonable time of fifty years.

LETTERS FROM THE PEOPLE.

262 Kingsley avenue,

Palo Alto, Cal.

Editor of The California Weekly.

I have been a reader of the Weekly ever since its inception and want to take occasion to register my appreciation of its work and the things it stands for.

It is very reassuring to those of us who have the welfare of our state and nation at heart, but who must move in the ranks of the less influential, that over against the powerful influence of the god of dollars in our land there stand a few such papers as the Weekly calling for higher ideals and pointing out "The Deeper Significance of Living."

We as a people, have forgotten very much of what we once clung to, and clung to to our greater welfare. We have let go of our love of truth, fair play and honesty to grab the power of dollars. And we have reaped and are reaping the rewards, for every one must take the pay of his master. Men have accepted lying, cheating, coercion, vicious and unfair advantage as a part of the standard of business. They have banished brotherhood from their thoughts, bought the law to serve their standards in city, county, town, state and union. They have stolen the public domain and pilched from the treasury. Courts, juries, officers high and low, have used their positions and reputations for the tainted gain. Men are gambling, lying, swindling, embezzling, perjurying themselves and even resorting to violence for the profits in the service of this, their god.

What sick and sorry rewards to be standing in the forefront of a great nation's activities! For we cannot lay them at the doors of the underworld; they are a conspicuous part of our national character. There truly is a deeper significance to living, a destiny which we are trying to scorn but which, in the nature of things, we cannot. Men cannot gather figs of thistles. We must take the pay of our masters.

It is high time that we as a people were finding more worthy masters, such masters as do not rob us of our honor, self respect and mutual helpfulness. I wish the Weekly God-speed in its work.

Yours very truly,

FRED WHITNEY

The allegations contained in the foregoing are all true, have always been true, and always will be true until millenium comes. We can only fight against them, fighting with odds against us, yet fighting without bitterness and keeping up the fight without despair. God is in his world and knows what he is up to if we don't. When we have done what we can we can wash our hands of the rest and lie down to pleasant dreams. Let us beware how we take ourselves, or others, too seriously. It is a long way from cannibalism even to Herminism, and, thank God, we have come that far, anyhow.

Make Them Unprofitable.

Editor The California Weekly:

President Jordan need not to have pointed across the Atlantic to indicate a decadent nation.

What judgment would an intelligent foreigner form of us, upon seeing our daily newspapers filled with pictures of prize fights and fighters, race horses and gamblers that maintain them?

This might raise doubts in his mind but when he came to view the Sunday editions, called comic, would he not say that universities, colleges, and high schools, are wasting their efforts on such a people?

The silly, disgusting colored illustrations do more injury among the little folks than all the good teachings in the Sunday schools do. I watch for the arrival of my copy of The California Weekly and eagerly peruse it, approve its conduct. Always interested in that column, "The Deeper Significance of Living."

Will not you suggest a method to arouse an agitation against the so-called comic press?

The mass of our people don't want this vulgar trash to come before their children. How can we stop it?

There is little doubt that the comic supplement was the greatest stroke of business the Hearst papers ever scored and the greatness of it consisted in doing quite the most attractive thing in that line that has ever been done. There is nothing inherently wrong in a comic supplement. The wrong comes in making the stories the pictures tell cruel rather than funny and this is done because talent has not been equal to making those pictures humorous without making them cruel and repulsive to the finer sense. There is nothing to be done about it except to withdraw patronage from papers that use them. The fad will wear itself out in time and is getting pretty threadbare already.

"I'm afraid," said the dear girl with a large, open-faced sigh, "that George doesn't love me as much now as he did before we were engaged." "Why do you think that?" queried her mother. "Because," explained the d. g., "he no longer comes back for another kiss after saying 'good-night' for the last time."—Chicago News.

By the way," remarked the Professor, as the charter members of the Galoot Club receded from the whist table and lighted their pipes for a quiet chat before going to their respective homes, "I call to mind, Mr. Appleby, that there was another story involved in this one you narrated for our benefit some months since, a story relating to your son Tom and a love affair of his which somehow affected your own. I am quite sure that if you were to tell it to us it would prove of advantage to me in the evolution of my Philosophy of Matrimony, still needing a few finishing touches to make it complete, and, I dare say, of great advantage to my kind. For one, I should be glad to hear it this evening."

"So would I," broke in the newspaper man, "if it is not filled with spooks, and goblins like that delirium of the Judge's was. For three weeks after he worked that off onto us I was afraid to go out of doors after dark."

"I confess to some scepticism about that Philosophy of Matrimony," returned Abner Appleby, "but I do not mind telling you so much of Tom's escapade as related to my own affair of the long ago."

You see, after Tom finished his course at the university we sent him to Harvard law school for three years. He got through his college course with yet under twenty and so was barely twenty-three when he received his degree from the law school; quite too young, as his mother thought, for him to marry.

His letters home had made mention of a certain nice girl, daughter of the keeper of the quiet hotel where he lodged, and this mention began to be more frequent and pronounced as the time drew near for his graduation and return. He was urgent, too, to know if I could promise him any bank business to attend to when he came back and hung his shingle out, which employment was, of course, readily promised him.

By and by came the bursting of the bomb. He wrote us that he should graduate in two weeks, be married on the evening of graduation and, the next morning, start with bride and baggage for our home prepared to be welcomed with open arms and to fall to work upon anything I had for him to do by which he could support his nucleus for a family. He assured us that we had only to see his bride to lead head over heels in love with her as he had done, and admonished us to withhold judgment until he had crossed the threshold of our door; no longer. He was sure that there would be no opposition after that.

His mother did not share Tom's enthusiasm. She declared that, although she had never switched him in childhood, she believed that she could do so heartily now, big as he was, if she could only get hold of him; but that was impossible, inasmuch as our youngest daughter was down with the measles and the eldest was soon to graduate at the university. Nothing would do but I must set off at once for Cambridge, put a stop to the foolishness and fetch the bride home with me to state it over for a year or two if nothing more. I was to do this, his mother said, even if I had to boot him every step of the way.

Tom had always done well in his classes, had been ambitious to get on and, so far as we knew, had been greatly given to companionship with young women and was about as little likely to do anything foolish as any one in his right mind well could be. We made sure that some worldly wise matron had set traps for the boy, and the nearer I got to Cambridge the more indignation I felt, so that when at last I met the youngster face to face I was not long in letting him know the state of my mind.

"I thought that just as likely as not mother would be putting you up to something of the sort," he said, with infinite composure, "and I rather hoped she would, for I have been desperately impatient to have some of you see Helen, but did not dare to say much about her until I got things fixed right at this end of the line. I wasn't bothering myself about the other. There was some opposition here, and one difficulty at a time is better than two."

"Now, Pop," he went on, "just don't say a word until you have seen Helen, and I'll take you down to the parlor to see her as soon as you have put yourself in presentable condition. I'm not going to usher my Pop into the presence of his daughter-in-law all crumpled and travel-tired, for I want you to make a good impression upon her. She has asked a million questions about all of you and it is important that she shall not be disappointed at first sight.

"And, Pop, when you have seen Helen if you do not feel satisfied to have her for a daughter-in-law and we must part—you and I, I mean, for Helen and I are not going to be parted from each other while we are away, we shall just naturally have to and that is the whole of it. I have saved a good bit out of the allowance you have sent me, have the refusal of a place in a good office in Boston and we'll stay right here. You see the business is all fixed. But you see Helen and spend an evening with us down in the parlor and I'll have your bank's legal business to attend to, or you are no judge of a woman, that's all."

The audacity of the youngster and his hearty enthusiasm fairly took my breath away, so I subsided and let him put me through the barber's, the bath's, and I don't know what all, until he pronounced me a fit sort of person to take dinner with his Dulcinea and her family, and then we went down to the parlor.

The boy was as eager as he used to be years before when, instead of standing shoulder to shoulder, he clung to my fore-finger and hurried me off to see some newly discovered bird's nest or other boyish wonder, and, remembering, as I could not well help doing, despite my promise to Louise, that I once had a Helen, too, although I tried to be stern I half forgave him before we had reached the parlor door.

I was ushered into the parlor and left seated alone for a few moments to await the appearance of the marvelous being whose hopes I had crossed the continent to crush, but with a fast diminishing likelihood of accomplishing my purpose. There was a rustle of skirts and I arose to be presented to mother and daughter who advanced toward me. I did not at once raise my eyes to their faces, but when I did the younger woman stared at me perfectly self-composed but pensively, in the full flood of a western sunlight.

The apparition stunned me. I felt myself reeling upon my feet and, raising my hand to my forehead, I gasped, "My God! This is Helen indeed." My son was stupefied with amazement and the girl looked as though she wished that she might sink through the floor. Then a voice, the voice of the elder woman, speaking gently, said:

"Why, Abner, did he not tell you my name?"

"Your name? Perhaps so; I don't know. I did not read that far. I only read that you had been married to another and then threw the announcement into the grate. You see I was just on the point of starting to claim you for myself, was to take the train that very evening, and I didn't know your name."

"I crave your pardon, young lady, if I have occasioned you discomfort, but the rolling back of a third of a century has moment of time without warning was more than I was prepared for. However, the pleasure I feel,"

I declared (although a bed in the bottom of the Atlantic would at that moment have seemed a blissful refuge) "at again meeting my good friend of former days compensates me for the mortification suffered by all of you on account of my behavior. If I may now recompense my hostess and her daughter for the embarrassment I have caused them I shall be in a mood for forgiving this young reprobate here for being the occasion for my stumbling. I have not had much faith in reincarnation, and all in all in one person being reincarnated in another while yet alive," I said, turning to the mother, "but your daughter is nothing less than a replica of yourself as you were thirty-odd years ago and as I have carried you in my memory ever since."

"One would suppose that a glance at your son would have taught you as much," the mother said. "He quite took my breath away the first time I saw him."

I got myself pulled together as best I could during the dinner hour and the evening passed pleasantly enough. "You will lunch with me to-morrow at one, will you not, Abner?" the elder woman asked, adding that Thomas and Helen could join us at dinner. I promised that I would and went to my hotel.

"Why, Pop," exclaimed my son when he came in the morning to accompany me to breakfast "What is the matter? Are you ill?"

I told him that I had not rested well.

"Have not rested well? Have not rested at all, you mean. You look to be ten years older than you did when you arrived from the train last night, but, father, what do you think of Helen?"

"What do I think of Helen? I think she is very well preserved, and, while her eyes have lost something of their luster, I caught the old look in them once or twice, and I cannot think that she has been so very unhappy."

"Oh! I do not mean Mrs. Garretson," the boy exclaimed in astonishment. "I mean Helen, my Helen, what do you think of her, father?"

"Oh, yes, to be sure," I replied. "Of what was I thinking? What do you think of your Helen, my boy? I think that she is very like my Helen of thirty years ago, very like, indeed, in face and form and carriage, in the tone of her voice, in her enthusiasm alternating with moments of dreamy thoughtfulness. In God's name, boy, if you love her marry her, marry her to-day, to-morrow or any day when you will, but do not leave her for so much as one full day until you can call her your own. You have my consent, my blessing, son, and you shall have a share of my fortune when you can prove to me that it will not run you in the spending of it as the making of it ruined me. Come, let us go to breakfast and say no more of this. The subject is painful."

I called punctually at one, and Helen, my Helen, received me at the door, for she was watching and waiting for my appearance. "I am sorry, Abner," she said, "if I failed of doing right. You did not see me, did you?" Then she said, "I suppose you know, in such as most lovers would write to those to whom they were engaged to be married, or speak hopefully of coming back again. Mother was growing old and father was dead, and she wanted so much to see me settled in life before she, too, went away. Perhaps she overpersuaded me. My husband was very kind and patient with me, or always meant to be, but he knew that I cared more for you than for anyone else I had ever known. And when you Tom came to see my Helen—they met in the White Mountain. I suppose you know, in vacation time—I thought I should fall in a faint at his feet, he looked so like you when you went away from me."

I tried to tell her how I had fought my way to a fortune with no other purpose than to make of her a lady, but, held in the thrall of a fanaticism ever spurting me on, when at last I clutched my whim and hugged it to my heart it turned into an asp and stung me to the death of that which best deserved to be preserved alive. Up to the moment when I received the announcement of my marriage I had gotten money for her sake and had counted on being done with the wretched grind and struggle, but after that I struggled for it for the intoxication of conquest, for the forgetfulness of better things, that it afforded, and, finally, for money for money's sake. It had made me hard and flintlike. I had become a relentless, methodical, money-making machine, just but ungenerous, proud of my financial prowess but ashamed enough of having developed a character for which I had chiefly blamed her.

We sat on the sofa together; she, the wife of another man, and I, the husband of another woman, as we had sat so often nearly two-score years before, mutually explaining, mutually forgiving and plighting again our mutual troth for an eternity of companionship beyond the grave if, perchance, a merciful God will let me go where Helen goes when we die. That is my only prayer and that I utter unceasingly.

But permit me, gentlemen, to assure you that my wife and I are the best of friends and while I have not for more than thirty years been able to expel Helen's image from my mind, I have never permitted my love for her to interfere with a hearty and genuine affection for my wife, the mother of my children, the head of my household. Our partnership has prospered.

I rather like the idea of postponing the readjustment of these difficulties to another life," observed the newspaper man. "It would have been the part of wisdom in the case of the Johnsons."

"The custom would bear heavily upon the legal profession," I am thinking, said the judge, "but it would have made of my judicial career a season of sweetness and light. Divorce suits are the bane of my existence and indescribably painful. I can send a man to the gallows more easily than I can part husband and wife and parcel out their children." "A rather remarkable feature of the whole affair," continued Mr. Appleby, "is that Helen and my Louise have become fast friends. Helen came out here when her Helen's first baby was born, and she spent one whole winter here with the family of my son, during which she was almost a daily visitor to the school and Louise chummed together like school girls. Louise blames her for not having waited longer for me, but is heartily glad she did not, and Helen thinks that Louise ought to have fallen in love with me before this, but is glad she hasn't. Neither of them is jealous of the other and both of them are looking beyond the grave for the fruition of their individual hopes of wedded happiness."

"Remarkable in the ex-treme!" declared the Professor. "Remarkable in the ex-treme! And throwing much light upon my matrimonial philosophy."

rambling building with its towers and courtyards, past long rows of cells, through the little kitchen garden of the watchmen. Each boy in a "solitary" sat either idle or working at some petty hand-craft, making paper lanterns or the like. No school, except an hour's lecture or "causerie" for the younger boys in the morning. No exercise except an hour's "promenade" every day in an open-air cell provided with high walls, cement pavement and, more to the point, a water pipe for daily ablutions. No water or toilets in the cells. Shower baths once a week. The cells are fairly light with bare walls and floors; the beds rude; a light mattress covered with a linen slip changed twice a year, and blankets changed "when necessary." Religious instruction is supplied—on request—to the Catholics in chapel, to the Protestants by visitation in their cells, to the Jews in an office. The chapel is provided with tiny cells arranged in a sort of amphitheater; at school or church service the boys march and drop into their respective cells, close and bar their doors and thus insulated from mental contamination may be presumed to respond the more readily to the moral causeries of superintendent or priest. Though perhaps highly antiseptic as a method it is far from pleasant or hope-inspiring as a spectacle.

In spite of contrary appearances the system at La Roquette is considered paternal, familiar, rather than penitentiary. Discipline is not too rigid. The management disavows use of corporal punishment and inclines more to "deprivations" and "bread and water." Escapes, there are none; insubordination rare; would we might say the same of suicide. The superintendent condemns the cellular regime as responsible for many suicides and a peculiar form of mania he calls "cellularization," a morbid individualism and secretiveness. His own plans for the new house of detention would include cellular isolation at night and associated occupation by day, thus avoiding the evils of the dormitory system and securing the advantages of socialization, exercise, and manual training by group organization. With a new La Roquette and a real children's court animated by such men as M. M. Blond, Jublet, Klein and Rollet, France will have taken a long stride towards coping with the problem of abnormal and delinquent youth.

A "Squeuers" Case.

The widely advertised Sargent case was recently brought to trial and sentence rendered. Several months ago H. C. Sargent, an English ex-army officer, and his American wife were arrested for cruelty to children—failure to provide proper nourishment, neglect, bloody beatings, indecent exposure. The Sargents connected a sort of children's boarding house somewhat after the Squeuers pattern; they were in the habit of advertising to adopt children "for a consideration." Sargent was an extreme drunkard and his wife a tyrant and slave-driver. The facts were well established in spite of some conflicting testimony and the lawyer's highly colored painting of his clients as combinations of St. Vincent de Paul and other humanitarians. But the sensation—to an American—of the trial came in the lawyer's final plea that his clients were entitled to consideration from the fact that they were subjects of a country where corporal chastisements were part of the system of education and were not a crime! Stupelying, when one considers that in the same courtroom sat a fellow barrister who only a few days before had helped to draw up a bill for the French Parliament providing for reforms in the public work for children, based on the superiority of American and English systems. Happily for the children, the judge either overlooked the sprightly plea, or decided to administer an instructive lesson to the land of corporal punishment, for between them the Sargents were condemned to thirty-seven months of prison and 200 francs fine.

Caution of Union Labor.

The recent postal strike is dead, but its ghost will not lie. A day or so ago the newspapers announced a "strike of labor leaders!" So far no men have been found willing to and capable of filling the office vacated by Secretary Niel of the C. G. T., after the strike. This is a healthy sign—this reserve and careful consideration. The labor movement needs a Cincinnati once in a while. And by the way, M. Lajarigie, general secretary of the Paris Gas Workers Syndicate, issued a wise and thoughtful statement recently. He said: "The memory of the disaster in which the postal strike ended must remain a hard lesson for all those who assumed too lightly that the will of majorities could be replaced by the turbulence of minorities."

Paris, July, 1909.

AMERICAN LYRICS.

THE TIDE RISES, THE TIDE FALLS.

By Henry Wadsworth Longfellow.

The tide rises, the tide falls,
The twilight deepens, the curlew calls;
Along the sea-sands damp and brown
The traveler hastens toward the town,
And the tide rises, the tide falls.

Darkness settles on roofs and walls,
But the sea in the darkness calls;
The little waves, with their soft, white hands,
Efface the footprints in the sands,
And the tide rises, the tide falls.

The morning breaks; the steeds in their stalls
Stamp and neigh, as the hostler calls;
The day returns, but nevermore
Returns the traveler to the shore,
And the tide rises, the tide falls.

"Oh! yes," exclaimed Mrs. Nubridge, enthusiastically. "He's just the kindest husband in the world. He just seems to feel that nothing is too good for me." "Indeed?" replied Mrs. Older, with a sardonic curl of the lip. "In a little while, my dear, he'll seem to feel that it's good enough."—Catholic Standard and Times.

"Come, come!" said the new teacher, trying to extract the right answer by naming something that pussy didn't wear. "Does she wear feathers?" "No answer." "Or does she wear a pinafore?" went on the teacher. "Or a silk blouse?" "Or a cotton overall." Such ignorance was more than a little boy in the front row could stand. But Donald stood his ground. "It was, too," he persisted. Then he added: "The teacher said 'kid,' but I don't use words like that."—Woman's Home Companion.

A good bishop tells this story on himself. He performed the marriage ceremony at a young man's request: "When the ceremony was over the young couple waited, instead of leaving the chancel. So I held out my hand, shook hands with the bride, and then held out my hand to the bridegroom. He had his hand deep in his trousers pocket, and as I stood with my hand out he said, somewhat impatiently and in a tone that could be heard all over the church: 'Now, don't be in such an all-fired hurry, bishop; I'm getting the money out just as fast as I can.' And everybody in the church giggled."—Lippincott's.

PERSONALIA

The August Lippincott's is the five hundredth issue of that magazine.

Oscar Wilde's comment upon George Meredith was that "his style is chaos illumined by flashes of lightning."

Mrs. Humphry Ward is writing a new novel, which she intends to call "Robert Elsmere, Twenty Years After."

The oldest United States senator is Isaac Stephenson, of Wisconsin, aged 80. His term expires March 15, 1915.

Margaret Anglin will appear in a new play next season, "La Rencontre," a play by Pierre Berton, first produced at the Comedie Francaise on June 21.

J. A. Hammerton's "George Meredith in Anecdote and Criticism" will shortly be published in this country by Mitchell Kennerley, and in England as a companion volume to his "Stevenson."

The British house of commons on July 1 adopted a resolution for the appointment of a committee from both houses to inquire into the censorship of the drama. This was largely brought about because of the censor refusing to license George Bernard Shaw's two plays, "Press Clippings" and "The Showing Up of Blanco Posnet."

Hall Caine's new play has been refused a license by the English censor. The play is called "The White Prophet," and was dramatized from a story now running in a magazine with English and American editions. It deals with the English occupation of Egypt and the coming of a leader of the Mohammedans who is called by his followers the White Christ.

The British Home Secretary, D. Lloyd George, is a versatile and quick-witted Welsh man. At a political meeting the other day he was talking about the future of Home Rule. "We'll have it in Ireland," he said, "and in Scotland, and in Wales." "Yes, and in hell," shouted out a drunken opponent. Like a flash George turned to the interrupter, "I'm always glad," he remarked, "to see a man stand up for his own country."

Mark Twain is constantly receiving photographs from men who have been told that they look like him. The latest one is from Florida, and Mr. Clemens is said to have written the following acknowledgment: "I thank you very much for your letter and the photograph. In my opinion you are more like me than any of my doubles. In fact I am sure that if you stood before me in a mirrorless frame, I could shave by you."—From Success Magazine.

A new novel by Sudermann is announced for publication in the fall by B. W. Huebsch. This novel, which is already in its fiftieth edition in Germany, is entitled in the original "Das Hohe Lied," and in the forthcoming English translation "The Song of Songs." It is described as being "a searching study of a woman's soul by one who blends the passion of the poet with the science of the surgeon. Life in its noblest and its most repulsive aspects is laid bare to the reader."

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Some Concluding Considerations.

We have now had thirty-five lessons upon our national constitution and government. The purpose has been to make essential principles clear and the working of government machinery intelligible to those not already familiar with the subject.

But our general government must be and remain a long way off from the individual citizen. Many persons live and die and scarcely see any representative of the general government other than the postmaster. Other governments touch the citizen more frequently and directly and therefore stimulate greater interest in government. In England, for instance, no city can take over a street railway or enter upon the construction and operation of a public service convenience without the interference in some form of the British parliament or central governing power. Our national government has nothing to do with any municipality except that of Washington and the District of Columbia. This policy of non-interference of the national government in local affairs militates against that keenness of civic interest that insures that government shall be by, of and for the whole people, and makes it difficult to make the general government responsible to the citizen.

The less our central government touches us the more easily may it get beyond popular control. The prevailing tendency toward centralizing power in the hands of our national government is, therefore, paradoxical as it may seem, tending toward making that government more responsible instead of less, and is not to be looked upon with dread. What we do need to dread is loss of public interest in public affairs, and those governments that touch the citizen most frequently are the governments most certain to be held accountable to the citizenry.

Our pocketbooks are touched by our government at every turn, but we do not see it do it, and so become negligent as to how it does it. No man buys a cigar, drinks a glass of beer or buys anything in the marketplace, unless we except home-grown vegetables, without being affected by governmental policy; but Uncle Sam's tax gatherer is mainly invisible and his tax gathering is, therefore, little resented and little scrutinized.

Just now Congress and the executive have been preparing for us a new tariff schedule. Their action will affect every meal eaten off every table in the union, and every article of clothing worn by every man, woman or child, and yet the driest subject connected with human affairs is said to be the tariff. So dry is it that few fences are high enough, or doors strong enough, to hold American citizens while they listen to a tariff debate, and a public lecture that devotes much space to tariff discussion is so full of little else than to kindle fires. It is only when we are touched, and know that we are touched, that we are most interested in government. This may be accepted as a permanent state of affairs not to be remedied by anything that can be said or done.

Our state government comes nearer, but only city government comes close. Even in city government we, in the United States, are governed little and the policeman who pilots ladies across the street is the chief example of it. That is because we are a self-governing people and, so long as we mind our own affairs and suffer others to do likewise, we are unaware of government of any kind.

Without having exhausted the subject of government, as related to national affairs, and without promising not to recur to the subject again by and by, this series of lessons in citizenship will next have to do with the State of California. The constitution of the State will not be followed as the constitution of the United States has been, step by step, from preamble to the latest amendment. Our state constitution is so long that such a treatment would be interminable. There will be only a few lessons on the constitution of the state, but the machinery of state government will be treated as clearly as possible and as practically. There are many Californians whose understandings of the government of their own state are hazy. They do not clearly know what the several departments of state government do, how they do it, or what it costs to do it, but one thing they do know: taxes are high and much public money is collected and expended.

The California Weekly will try to make all of the ins and outs of state government clear to its readers, with as little partisanship as possible and with as much brevity as the subject will allow.

BASEBALL AS AN INDUSTRY.

The organized baseball situation to-day is this: fifty-two leagues; 416 teams, and 6,500 players.

The estimated value of the major leagues' sixteen clubs is $6,000,000. Big league parks average $200,000. Their franchises represent an equal value. Pittsburgh's plant represents an output of $1,000,000 alone. The major leagues do a $500,000 business every month. Last year the attendance in the majors was 7,069,122, and the weekly disbursements $100,000, which in six months means an expenditure of $2,600,000. And so it is all down the line in lessening figures.

Baseball expenses are many and high. Salaries range from Hans Wagner's $12,000 a season down to the $1,800 of the recruit.

Every day during the season 300 balls are used. This means 50,000 a season, and at $15 a dozen they cost $2,000 a week.

Bats average $1.50, and the 416 teams manage to buy 13,200 every year, an item of $20,000.

Uniforms average $12, and every player must have two, which means $156,000.

Gloves average from $4 to $7 a pair, and two for every player runs the glove bill up to $550,000.

Shoes cost $8 a pair, and two or three pairs are worn out every season. The shoe bill nears $100,000.

Protectors, masks and other incidentals cost $50,000, while salaries are estimated at $6,000,000.

Add to this hotel bills, which mean $2 a day in the minors to $4 a day in the majors for 6,500 men while the teams are on the road, and at the end of the season $1,000,000 to $1,500,000 has been spent.

Railroad fares average $5 a week for each man, the total running between $500,000 and $700,000.

In 1908 the attendance of 30,000,000, at from 25 cents to $1.50, meant that $10,000,000 was paid to see the game. Added to this the peanut, popcorn and cigar privileges, the return from score card advertising and the fence advertising which prevails in some parts of the country, mean $2,000,000 more.

Who Can Answer?

A friend to good government writes to The California Weekly to learn what the reform program in California is going to be the coming year. Who can tell him? He desires to know, in substance, if there is to be a movement on behalf of distinct national and state policies or if the reform forces are going to rest content with merely opposing bossism in Republican politics? Who can answer that? He would like to know if it is the intent to fetch out representative reform men as candidates before the primaries, or if it is going to be left to a catch-as-catch-can scramble in a free-for-all. Who is in a position to say?

We may be sure that the "organization" plotters are not so in the dark, although their need for getting together early is much less than that of the better element. A good deal can be accomplished by a boss and a check-book. He may call in his workers one by one, give them their orders and a check and so start the machinery moving. It is different with the better element in our political life.

The better element in civic and political life is a difficult element to deal with. It will not take orders from any human being. It can be led but not driven, influenced but not hired, filled with enthusiasm for a policy but it must have helped to formulate that policy.

Is it not about time for representatives of this better element in California to hold a conference that answers to the foregoing question may be forthcoming? The reform element possesses no machine that may be set in motion by pressing a button.

What Is to Be the Price of Peace?

"These men are trouble-breeders," declared the Herrin touts last year, when speaking of the promoters of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, "do not listen to them. What we want is harmony in the party."

"What is to be the price of harmony?" was demanded in return.

"Nothing except that you shall abandon the efforts you are making to emancipate the Republican party of California from corporate control, you shall not strive to make California a free and independent commonwealth, you shall make no attempt to elect a free and independent statesman to be United States senator, and you shall not commit California to the Roosevelt policies."

"Cheap enough," declared the Republicans of California. The price was paid and we have had harmony in the party with a humiliation that tends to make honest men detest party and abhor politics and politicians.

The demand of this same ilk in the pending primary campaign in San Francisco is for peace, peace as it is termed, "between warring factions." Peace is good. What is the price?

Quite certainly, if not very frankly or openly, it is the discontinuance of the graft prosecutions. "All of them?" The reply is not specific, but anyhow those aimed at Calhoun and the other higher-ups of high degree.

How about Schmitz and Ruef? Are proceedings against them to be dropped as part of the price of peace? If not, why not? Why flesh of one and fowl of the other? The public would really like to know.

This paper is not disposed to wage a warfare after the Men of San Francisco have declared for peace. It merely demands that the issue shall be made so plain and so clear that the Men of San Francisco, though half of them were fools and the other half insane, every one of them should know what those issues are.

Will the Chronicle, the official organ of the Herrin-Hellman-Calhoun combination, clear the atmosphere by answering these questions, all of them? Peace is good. Exactly what is to be the price of it?

Is It a Feud or a Cause?

The sponsors for the Crocker ticket are striving to make it appear that the graft prosecutions are the result of a feud raging between Spreckels and Calhoun, a feud that is tearing the peace of the community into tatters, and that a stop should be put to it. It is not denied that it is the expectation that the election of the Crocker-Fickert ticket will restore peace in the most direct and certain way—that of abandoning the prosecutions of the grafters.

But are these prosecutions the result of a feud or of the championship of a great and holy cause, the cause of the establishment of justice in this city?

An alibi is a complete defense whenever proved. So is the institution of proceedings against John Doe and Richard Roe for felony a complete defense against malicious prosecution when, at the time of the institution of such proceedings, it cannot be known who the guilty persons really are.

So far as the cases against Calhoun, Ford and their associates are concerned the chronology of the graft prosecution movement shows that that movement took shape before the trolley franchise was acted on or the use of money in the procurement of that franchise could have been suspected. This is a complete defense as to malice against Calhoun and his United Railroad associates, and the cases against Calhoun and his associates constitute the keystone of the prosecution arch.

If these prosecutions could not have been instituted out of malice, and no effort has been made to show malice against anyone but Calhoun, then they must have been instituted for the purpose of cleaning up a very corrupt city, than which a better purpose has rarely actuated the minds of men.

Bradbury.

There is no gainsaying the pitifulness of the passing of an old man through the iron gate into prison walls. The only thing that is sadder than that is the passing of a young man through the same gate, and this California permits every day in the year with scarcely a qualm.

But justice must come before mercy even in the case of erring youth. The offense of Bradbury was rank. The occasion of it was despicable. He sought to prevent a debtor of his from obtaining a loan wherewith to redeem his property out of the covetous clutches of Bradbury that he might convert it to his own use. To this end he bore false witness. That he deserves punishment no man can doubt.

Why should not punishment be meted out to him? Is it because he is growing old? Old men are continually being sent to prison and old men are in prison by the score and small is the concern about them. Is it because he has hitherto borne a good reputation? He has not. He has spitted upon our laws and defied public sentiment, acknowledged no authority but his own will and proven as antisocial as an anarchist. Is it because it is to be feared that he may die in prison? What of that? Do not scores die in prison, many of them as deserving of mercy as Bradbury? Besides, prison life at San Quentin is not unhealthful. He will live as long there as at home. Why, then, should he be pardoned?

There is one reason and one only. He is a rich man and we have come to feel that the possession of wealth, no matter how gotten, sets men apart, as royalty and station set people apart from the common herd in countries born of feudalism. Such men are to be allowed to shirk a large share of their taxes, escape jury duty and avoid punishment when they transgress the laws.

Moreover, there is a deterrent force in punishment, not as applied to the congenitally criminal, who act first and think of it afterward, but as applied to those who have gone off wrong foot first. Many a lad has been brought into the straight and narrow way by feeling the grip of the law upon his shoulder and many a rich man will be persuaded to walk uprightly and refrain from perjury if Bradbury demonstrates that his money can't save him. If his money can save him, whose money cannot save its possessor from any penalty? He has nothing but money, no powerful combinations of rapacious interests to sustain him, no "organization" back of him. He is no higher-up. The issue stands clear. The public will not misconstrue its determination.

DIPLOMACY OR BIG STICK?

President Taft has met the first crisis in his administration. It is right that he should be judged in relation to his stewardship.

It is the theory of our government that the legislative function is to be performed by the Senate and House of Representatives. Twice only, according to this theory, may the President be heard on any issue, once when he calls the attention of Congress to it, when he may make such recommendations for or against it as he chooses, and again when, if he does not see fit to give it his approval, he returns it to the house of origin with his objections to it. If two-thirds of the members of both houses still think, after considering the President's objections, that any bill should become a law they can make it a law, otherwise it is dead and the responsibility for killing it is the President's.

It is, however, the practice of our government, and has been from the first (especially whenever a strong character occupied the presidential chair) greatly to enlarge the executive function in legislation, and the probability is that it will become so much more enlarged as to make nearly all important measures administration measures, prepared by the President and his departmental officers and forced upon congressional consideration through executive influence. This for a number of reasons.

One is that senators represent states, representatives represent districts and nearly all of them represent interests of a more or less special character, while the President alone represents the American people. It is only upon the centralized administration that the public sentiment of the nation can be focused with effect, and it is to that department of government that the people as a whole must look for the redressing of grievances, if there are grievances to be redressed.

President Taft's attitude toward Congress has been that of a diplomatist toward plenipotentiaries of equal station with himself. He observed all the properties of theoretical government up to a point where such properties became wholly ineffectual. In his message to Congress, called in extra session to consider the tariff, he scarcely hinted his preferences in the premises. During four months of discussion he withheld from Congress knowledge that he held inflexible convictions on the subject of tariff. But when the completed bill got into conference committee, where it was impossible to do more than to clip the ragged edges off a log-rolled embodiment of privilege, he stepped outside of the theoretical and ventured so far into the practical as to intimate that unless those edges were clipped he would withhold his approval.

His action is heralded as a triumph of diplomacy over the big stick. Is it? He had not so good a constitutional right to lay down his ultimatum to Congress at the completion of the tariff bill as he had at its inception. At the end his constitutional function was merely to veto and tell why he vetoed after he vetoed. At the beginning he had a constitutional right to say what kind of a tariff bill would meet executive sanction and what kind would not, by unmistakable inference if not in specific terms.

"That would have been a wielding of the big stick!" Yes, and when it could have been wielded to some purpose, but what was his ultimatum, given to the conference committee, but a wielding of the big stick, albeit to relatively little purpose? The practical difference between the policy of diplomacy and the policy of the big stick, as exemplified in executive office, is that, in the former, the big stick is reserved until the end, whereas, in the latter, it is swung at the beginning and diplomacy employed until the end.

No one can doubt that, with Theodore Roosevelt in the presidential chair, the extra session would have been started off with a recital of the facts that protection is a good thing; that a just measure of its amount must be the difference in labor cost at home and abroad; that combination, having destroyed the modifying factor of competition within the tariff walls, competition from without tariff walls must be admitted on a basis fair to the American standard of living as a regulative force in the interests of a lower cost of living to the people; that the American people demanded so much of Congress and Congress must yield to that demand or do nothing until the people elected a new congress on that issue. Then diplomacy and the power of patronage would have been used to induce Congress to respond to the appeal with, as a result, a very different tariff bill than the one to which President Taft will find small pleasure in attaching his signature.

President Taft's chastity of demeanor has been preserved at the expense of sterility of productivity. We have the big stick to thank that our future is no worse.

PRIVATE PROSECUTIONS IN ENGLAND.

A great to-do has been made over the interest which certain private individuals have taken in prosecuting the graft cases in San Francisco, as if such a thing were unknown in a civilized country. In England this is a recognized and important feature of the administration of justice, as those who follow our interesting series of articles upon "England's Better Criminal Procedure" will learn a fortnight hence, when the concluding article of the series will be published in these columns. In that country any citizen may institute proceedings against and prosecute any other citizen upon a criminal charge, and if the charge be sustained the prosecutor may recover his costs, and a fair recompense for his time, out of the property of the convicted person, if such person have property. Per contra, if the charge be not sustained, but be shown to originate in malice or culpable error, the prosecutor may be mulcted for the costs. This puts it within the power of any citizen to see to it that laws are enforced.

With us almost autocratic powers are conferred upon the district attorney. He may prosecute whom he will and whom he will not prosecute cannot be prosecuted. This is why the associated rapacities are so solicitous to name candidates for the office of district attorney. Any district attorney so named will busy himself with prosecuting common, low-browed, brutish, unsuccessful rascality, and will be so thoroughly occupied therewith as to have no time to devote to the prosecution of successful rascality of a more dangerous sort, more dangerous because it debauches the public mind rather than merely disturbing the public peace. No person needs to be told that if either Mr. Fickert or Mr. Coghlan should be nominated and elected district attorney of San Francisco all efforts to punish successful rascality would be allowed to "peter-out" if not stopped forthwith, as no one needs to be told that if Mr. Heney is elected to that office the machinery of the law will be made to do its utmost to vindicate justice and punish guilt.

Under the British system of private prosecutions for public offenses these cases could be taken entirely out of the hands of a negligent district attorney by citizens instituting prosecutions on their own behalf with their own attorneys. The liability for costs in case of failing to make out a case would deter prosecutions for other reason than that of a patriotic purpose to enforce the laws. There is much that we may learn from "England's Better Criminal Procedure," for the bettering of our own, and The California Weekly is pleased to be able to lay the essential facts before the people of California. Consequently attention is particularly called to the fifth article in this series, which will be found elsewhere in this issue.

A RESERVE POWER FOR PUNISHING.

When a debtor is sued, and sets up the claim that the statute of limitations has run against the claim, he thereby acknowledges the debt and proclaims himself a repudiator and a scallawag. The business community knows exactly what to think of him.

When a person is accused of having committed an offense against the laws, and pleads that the statute of limitations has run in his favor, he also thereby confesses that he committed the offense and a well ordered social community knows exactly what to think of him.

When any person charged with the commission of a felony attacks the indictment, assails the validity of the grand jury that found the "true bill," questions the legality of the appointment of the prosecuting officer, seeks to smother the charge in a stench of vituperation hurled at those who are seeking to bring him to justice—such person thereby makes public confession of his guilt and announces his purpose to be merely to escape, if he can, the penalties provided by law for the species of wrong doing of which he is guilty.

When a person charged with the commission of an infamous crime, does not straightway take the witness stand in his own defense and clear the whole matter up so far as lies within his power, he thereby openly confesses that it does not lie within his power to exculpate himself, but that his testimony, if given, would tend to his conviction.

The flustering defendants in the graft cases have made public confession of their guilt in every way they can, save in specific words and by entering a plea of guilt and throwing themselves on the mercy of the court. Their actions have spoken as loudly as words if to less legal effect.

It unhappily transpires that the efforts of innumerable criminals to escape the legal penalties for their illegal acts have resulted in so breaking down our machinery for administering justice that rich criminals habitually escape such punishment as the laws inflict upon poor men, but it by no means follows that society has no means of redressing its grievances against such persons. It has within its possession a reserve power for punishing, not as satisfying, to be sure, as indicted physical imprisonment incommunicado and at hard labor, but quite as effective in deterring others from committing similar offenses.

Society finds little difficulty in doing this with women known to be guilty of unchastity, and in no English speaking country on earth is an honorable public career open to any man known to be honest.

If society would protect itself from destruction it must deal with unconvicted and unconscionable debauchers of official life, with grafters, bribees, jury buyers, etc. It is so well known how to deal with debauchers of womanhood, for the public service is only second in importance to domestic life, whose sanctity must be preserved or all is lost.

Here, then, is a reserve power for punishing of which too little use has been made. It may prove to be the only power that society can employ in its own defense in the graft cases. This state of affairs may continue until a vitalized public sentiment forces such reorganization and reformation of the appellate bench as will eliminate from it judges bound to a slavish traditionalism and other judges under bondage to political manufacturers of great power and cunning. This work of reorganization and reformation may consume a generation.

Courtesans live in a world of their own. They know their place and keep it. Tar Flat has a society of its own and would not think of venturing into reputable social circles. Make it clear to grafters and their ilk that they are expected to do likewise and they will go to their appointed place. What happiness they can derive from the association of the toadies, sycophants and bloodsuckers who may still seek their company will not be grudged them, but no self-respecting citizen should any sooner sit at meat at his home or club with these self-confessed but unconvicted felons than with denizens of the half-world or with representatives of the ancient order of pickpockets.

This reserve power for punishing should be used for all that it is worth. It is a form of boycott justified by social self-defense.

JUST A CHANCE.

Very interesting reading is to be found in a series of articles on Ireland Seven Years After, written by Mr. Hugh Sutherland and published in the San Francisco Call. To be sure it will be better known what the results of the new English policy toward landlordism in Ireland are going to be seventy, instead of seven, years after it was entered upon, but it promises well. Mr. Sutherland affirms that all that those Irish peasants needed in order to become law-abiding, thrifty and happy was a chance, "Just a Chance," to rise above their poverty, hopelessness and dirt.

It is matter of everyday observation that persons who come from the hard-life districts of Europe to America, under-sized, dwarfed in mentality as well as body, rear families that stand shoulder to shoulder with the typical American, compete with him and hold their own, take up the burden of citizenship and carry it as well as he, have minds as keen and hearts as true. All they needed was a chance, "Just a Chance."

The history of Ireland has many a parallel. First there is aggression and resistance to it, then repression and reprisals for that, evictions followed by the torch or the bludgeon. Then follow poverty, degradation, disease, death and a potter's field in which tired bones may rest. All that those Irish people needed at any time within the last three hundred years was a chance, just a chance, to do for themselves. An absentee landlordism, regardless of consequences to the people so that rent was forthcoming, made Ireland a reproach to British civilization and about as comfortable a member of John Bull's family as a madman would be in the family of any citizen.

It is possible for aggression, oppression and repression to destroy a people, any other people, as certainly as the people of Ireland, but it is not profitable. It took John Bull three hundred years to learn just how unprofitable, but the lesson appears to have been well learned.

It is already too late to be sought through letting alone. It was letting alone, suffering an absentee and headstrong landlordism to work out its inevitable consummation, that produced a condition so intolerable. The British government had to become parental whether it desired to or not. It bought up, as it could through negotiation, scores of great holdings, subdivided (or redivided) and sold to peasant proprietors on long terms of payment and so gave them a chance, just a chance, to do for themselves, with what splendid results all sources of information assure us. Those districts and the people in them have experienced a new birth.

One more step remains: To compel those landlords who will not sell to sell at a fair valuation; the reconstruction of Ireland may go forward. That will be a long stride for a nation nurtured in the Common Law theory of property and the sacredness of vested interests, but it is a step inevitable. From Ireland it will spread to Scotland and its cotters, and then England itself will be the scene of a similar activity in order that some millions of persons may be given a chance, just a chance. And no government of the future, of any continent on earth, will be accounted fit to endure that does not give to all those living under it a chance, just a chance, to do for themselves. No other right will be held so certainly to have vested.

Good for Wilmington.

Those who are broad enough of mind to be concerned for all parts of the state and its commerce will rejoice that the port of Wilmington has been annexed to Los Angeles. It is to be hoped also that San Pedro may be given the grace to join the family of angels. It may be possible for Los Angeles' control of those splendid harbor facilities to give to the commerce of the country something like an open road to the world's great highway—the ocean. Otherwise a cramped and crabbed corporation will make merchandise of what should be as free as air.

Write in the Name of Heney.

Mr. Nat Coghlan betrayed no secret when he blurted out that the purpose of the Herrin-Hellman committee of alleged business men is to defeat Francis J. Heney for district attorney. The whole movement had no other purpose. If Republican voters were of a mind to do so they could give this combination the surprise of their lives by writing into their primary election ballots the name of Francis J. Heney for district attorney. There will be a space on the ticket which can be used for no better purpose. Can this information be carried to enough voters to make them thoroughly understand the value of their opportunity? It will be worth trying.

If Mr. William Jennings Bryan suffers the winds of Nebraska to blow the dust of that commonwealth off his shoe leather, preparatory to transferring his wigwag to the Lone Star state, it lies in no man's mouth to make objection, but what can Texas do, big as it is, with Bailey, Bryan and Culberson? It will be as uncomfortable as three-in-a-bed.

The campaign slogan of the Hellman-Herrin-Calhoun combination promises to be "Let Us Have Peace," at the price, of course, of suffering the grafters to go unwhipped of justice and the world to know that, in California, money rules and whoever objects to its tyrannical sway is a trouble-maker. Peace is too costly at that price.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

There are few intoxications more intense than that which comes from the sense of mastery. It rejoices the heart, gives light to the eyes, buoyancy to the soul, exaltation to the spirit, satisfaction to the soul.

We see it in the child that wants to climb to the top of the tallest tree in the yard, to climb the fence if nothing more; but to do the most difficult thing in the range of endeavor is the acme of joy to every normally constituted child. Such attempts make up the greater part of the activities of childhood. It is through the sense of mastery that childhood develops into adulthood instead of merely growing bigger. It is a natural source of inspiration and essential to human progress.

The child who is content to suffer the breaking of arm, leg or neck. Venturing to swim the swollen stream one may be dashed against a boulder or find his strength unequal to the buffeting of the currents and so drown.

But the sense of mastery, while splendidly intoxicating in its enjoyment, has its dangers, dangers to self and to others. Fundamental in its usefulness it is also a source of incalculable injustice and hardship. Like every other human instinct it must be moralized to be safe.

The late Thomas B. Reed was once asked what subject he thought was then uppermost in the American mind. With promptness he answered: "Keeping out of the way of bicycles." The bicycle was a new thing. People were just learning to master it and the sense of mastery so intoxicated riders as to make them careless of the safety of pedestrians. Disregard for public sentiment, the safety and convenience of others and risk to self are invariable attributes of intoxication, no matter whether produced by wine, by ambition, by competition or by gratifying that sense of mastery which makes us joy in achievement. The automobile is playing a great part in the affairs of men. It is destined to farther and do more, but hardly has greed created effect upon character than the automobile is producing through an abnormal and unhealthy gratification of the sense of mastery, mastery over time and space. The rights of others on the roadways are disregarded with a disdain hardly rivaled by those enjoying the special privileges of kings. Instead of being the king's highways our highways have become the special possessions of our automobiles with notice to others to keep off them or suffer death if caught in the way and, when pedestrians are run over and mangled, the sense of disclaim of the rights of others, begotten by this unrestrained sense of mastery, prompts the automobilist to speed on out of sight and out of responsibility for his act as well as out of opportunity to render succor to a victim left in distress.

The struggle for wealth attains an essentially similar climax and through a similar process. The pre-revolutionary aristocrat ran down the children of the plebeian and overrode them with his coach. Our aristocrats do the same thing both with their automobiles and their holding corporations, through special privileges acquired by graft and through raiding the stocks, or invading the territory, of a competitor with the purpose of crushing opposition and then fattening on the spoils of conquest.

There is, however, a form of mastery that hurts nobody. It inspires without intoxicating, yields satisfaction without selfishness of possession, it pushes upward and onward without thrusting anyone aside or trampling down. Its realization is the purpose of the ages. It makes its possessor a king and a bondservant to nothing. It reduces all powers to possession and makes mastery over them an unalloyed good. That mastery is self-mastery and whoever attains it is greater than he who conquers a walled city, or a nation, or a conquerable and offers an eternity of companionship with the Most High.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Forest Service and Poisonous Plants.

The Forest Service, in co-operation with the Bureau of Plant Industry, is doing a work of no inconsiderable service to stockmen in investigating poisonous plants in the national forests, and then doing what it may to eliminate the injury resulting from them. No general plan for ridding the ranges of these plants has yet been devised, but their evil effects constantly are being minimized. For example, areas where there are many poisonous plants are "flagged" by the forest rangers, and warning is thus given to the stockmen. Moreover, in some instances, fences are built across these tracts of particular danger, and the stock thus is kept from them. The Forest Service also suggests that some of these baneful plants can be choked out by planting grasses of more vigorous growth, while yet other plants can be eradicated by pulling them up. As the report says, co-operation between the ranger force and the interested stockmen promises to work wonders along this line, and it is believed that much stock will be saved by intelligent joint action.

The Taking of the Census.

It is a far greater labor to take the United States census than most of us comprehend, a labor compared with which Hercules' undertaking in the Augean stables was a mere sinure. In the first place—by way of indicating its financial immensity—Congress already has appropriated $10,000,000, and this is merely by way of starting the enterprise; other appropriations must come later. An army of more than 80,000 men and women will be enlisted to count us all and give us an idea of what we are doing; that is, just about one in every thousand of us will be enumerated in that way. Of this vast number 330 will be supervisors, or, let us say, generals in the army; 2,000 will be special agents (or colonels and majors) to pay particular attention to statistics relating to manufacturing, mining and quarrying; between 2,500 and 3,000 will be clerks in the census bureau (captains, lieutenants, etc., there), and about 70,000 will be the enumerators, scattered throughout the states, to obtain information relating to population and agriculture, and, of course, these will be the privates in the army. The enumeration of the nation's population and resources will end with June 30th of next year, and Congress has decided that the entire labor of tabulating, etc., must be terminated within a year from that time.

France Considers "Race Suicide."

It long has been charged that "race suicide" is an evil particularly affecting the French nation, and now France, herself, has become so aroused to the importance of the matter that it is probable that steps to minimize the evil will be taken in the autumn session of her parliament. Two propositions will be under consideration. The first, suggested by Professor Richet of the Academy of Medicine, is that the state shall pay a bonus to the parents of every baby except it be their first. For the second $100 would be paid, and $200 for each baby after that, the expense to be met by imposing a death duty of 50 per cent on collateral inheritances and all estates left by parents to an only child. The professor estimates that this system would increase French births from 750,000 to 1,000,000 per annum, but an attempt to find the logical foundation on which he bases this estimate not improbably would result in gray hairs. The other proposition is made by Paul Leroy Beaulieu, an eminent economist, and it runs to the effect that no person should be appointed to office until he is the parent of three children, a scheme which appears less likely to increase the French numbers than does that of Professor Richet. A bill, which landlords should note, already has been introduced in the French Chamber. It provides that to refuse to accept, or to send away, tenants because they have children, shall be a punishable offense. If the "race suicide" does not decrease in France it will not be for lack of parliamentary consideration.

Republican and Royal Expenses.

We pay our President $50,000 a year, in addition to $25,000 traveling expenses, or $75,000 in all, and, although we do not meter ourselves lavish, we feel, as a general thing, that we are doing well enough. But compare our outlay with that of Great Britain for the royal family, and then see how you feel. Annuities are paid as follows: Prince of Wales, $100,000; Princess of Wales, $50,000; Princess Christian, $30,000; Prince Louis, $30,000; Duke of Connaught, $125,000; Duchess of Edinburgh, $30,000; Duchess of Albany, $30,000; Princess Henry of Battenburg, $30,000; trustees for his majesty's daughters, $90,000. This is a neat little total of $515,000, but the expense of owning and keeping a real king has only begun. Other line items would be added to his majesty's household and "retired" allowances, $629,000; expenses of the royal household, $965,000; royal bounty ("royal," but paid by the people), alms and special services, $66,000. Here is another total, this time of $1,660,000, and the grand total is $2,175,000 all seeming to keep the crown from the royal door. But, in addition to this, the king and queen have a privy purse of $550,000 per annum, with which they can buy any small comforts that otherwise might be overlooked. Come to think deeply about it, our $75,000 does look particularly small, and it would not look glitteringly larger if we had our expenses, which are partially paid by this government, were added to it.

Telegraph and Telephone in Africa.

The management of a telegraph or telephone line in some parts of Africa is a queer sort of business and is subject to such vicissitudes as are not known elsewhere in the world. It is the wild parts of the country to which these remarks apply. In the first place, monkeys evidently look upon the wires as a trapeze put up for their special benefit, and they use them accordingly. This does not help the wires, but the damage done by the simians is slight compared with that worked by some other animals. The giraffe, for instance, has discovered that it is rare sport to tear down the insulators and the wooden arms on which they are placed. This, of course, pulls down the wires, too, which is a side issue for the giraffe, but the entire production makes trouble for the operators. Then, the hippopotamus has declared war upon the poles, and he tears them down at every opportunity, occasionally becoming entangled in the wires and being captured, or more probably killed, as the result of doing so. The elephant attacks the poles, but he is wiser than the hippopotamus and is less likely to be caught or injured. The life of a lineman in Africa must be full of surprises.

Army Versus Education in Europe.

It is a curious and significant fact that the army nation in "Christian" and civilized Europe which pays more for the education of its children than it does for the maintenance of its military establishment is the little republic of Switzerland, and it is a still more curious and significant fact that, with that single exception, the amount paid for the army is largely in excess of that paid for the schools. Next to Switzerland stands Belgium, and it pays twice as much for its military as for its educational system, just reversing the condition in the Swiss republic. Germany, which is next, devotes three times as much to its military as to educational purposes; Russia and Austria follow, with a proportion of four and one-half to one in favor of the army; then comes France, spending five times as much on brown as on brain, and Italy, at the foot of the list, thinks nine times as much of its fists as of its intellect. Apparently the day when the sword shall be beaten into the plowshare is not close at hand.

Preserve Your Meerschaum.

Let the smoker cling to his meerschaum pipe, for there is every probability that from this time forth its value will constantly increase. This, for the sufficient reason, that the world's visible supply of that product apparently is approaching exhaustion. Since the manufacture of pipes from meerschaum began, about 1750, the supply has been mostly obtained from Asia Minor and Germany. Now the German mines are about worked out, little remains except in Asia Minor, and it is said that even there the supply is failing. Nor is this all that will send meerschaum up in price, for American and British capitalists now control the output and they may be trusted to see that there is no downward tendency in the market.

This the "Meteor Month."

It will be of interest to watch nightly for the August meteors during the next few weeks. Millions of these objects will pour into the earth's atmosphere and be consumed.

These shooting stars are composed of stony materials, which enter our atmosphere at the rate of about 34 miles per second, and the concussion with the air induces combustion. Were it not for the shield afforded by the atmosphere, we should be bombarded by these celestial pellets, which form the material of which planets and comets are made.

WORTH KNOWING.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES.

TENNYSON'S CENTENARY TO-DAY.

One hundred years ago to-day Alfred Tennyson first saw the light. A little less than seventeen years ago he was buried in Westminster Abbey. The fruit of his 83 years of life is the rich and varied body of song that endears him to each succeeding generation. An estimate of his works is superfluous, but the appended outline of his long career, compiled by Warwick James Price, an American scholar, is an interesting reminder of the signal facts of a life singularly sweet and helpful to mankind.

1809 (Aug. 6)—Born, the fourth of twelve children, to Rev. George Tennyson, rector of Somersby, Lincolnshire. ("It was a veritable nest of nightingales."—Leigh Hunt.)

1816—To school at Louth (for four years. "How I hated it!")

1820—Studying with his father, "enjoying the run of a library more various and stimulating than the average country rectory could boast."

1828 (February)—Matriculated at Trinity, Cambridge, where he made many famous friends, showed much interest in questions of the day, though leaving a reputation as a loose scholar and without a degree (Feb. 31).

1830—In this and the two following years traveled considerably with Arthur Henry Hallam, who died suddenly at Vienna Sept. 15, 1833. ("For awhile it blotted out all joy from my life and made me long for death.")

1833—For nine years "lay fallow," writing little and publishing nothing; living at Somersby, in Epping Forest, at Tunbridge Wells and Maidstone, ("Hope, a poisoning eagle, burnt above the unseen to-morrow.")

1842—"Arrived" with his third collection of poems; elected to the Anonymous Club, welcomed at Bath House, and one of the Holland House circle.

1845 (September)—Pensioned by Peel with £200 a year.

1850—Succeeded Wordsworth as poet laureate, twenty-first in the line of Chaucer and Spenser; Johnson and Dryden. The post was first offered Samuel Rogers, but he declined on the score of his age—eighty-seven.

1850 (June 13th)—Married, at Shiplake Church, to Emily Sellwood, after a courtship of nearly a score of years. ("The peace of God came into my life when I married her." "She was a living inspiration at the heart of the poet's everyday."—Annie Fields.) Four years his junior, she survived him four years, dying August 10, 1896.

1851 (April 20th)—Birth and death of their first son. In the summer of the year husband and wife were on the continent together, returning to make their home at "Chapel House," Twickenham.

1852 (August 11th)—Birth of Hallam Tennyson. F. D. Maurice and Henry Hallam stood his godfathers.

1853—Bought "Farringford House" at Freshwater, Isle of Wight—"close by the ridge of a noble dune."

1854 (March)—Birth of Lionel Tennyson.

1855 (June)—Honored with an Oxford D. C. I.

1860—From this year almost to the close of his life the poet spent from one to five of every twelve months in travel.

1862 (April)—His first interview with Queen Victoria. (Her journal carries this characteristic record: "After luncheon saw the great poet Tennyson in dearest Albert's room for nearly an hour, and most interesting it was. Asked him to sit down.")

1869—Made honorary fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge.

1868 (April 23d, Shakespeare's birthday)—Laid the foundation stone of "Aldworth," near Haslemere, Surrey. ("It lifted England's great poet to a height from which he could gaze on a large part of the English land which he loved so well, see it basking in its most affluent summer beauty, and only bounded by the inviolate sea." Year after year he trod its two stately terraces with men the most noted of the time."—Aubrey de Vere.)

1884—Marriage of Hallam Tennyson and Miss Audrey Boyle.

1884 (January)—Made "Baron Tennyson" by Gladstone, having twice earlier (1873 and 1874) refused the honor.

1886 (April)—Death of Lionel Tennyson.

1889—In this year, after the news of Browning's death, the Laureate seemed to lose much of his keen interest in life, and till his death lived more quietly than ever; walking much, visiting a few friends, dabbling with water colors, and reading Jane Austin.

1892 (October 6th)—Died—in the moonlight of an early dawn—having fully lived the truth, in his eighty-three years, of his own lines—

And leave to hands that grieve a glowing page,
How excellent to bear into an old age
The poet's ardor and the heart of youth.

To keep to the last sleep the vow of truth,
And leave to hands that grieve a glowing page,
How excellent to bear into an old age
The poet's ardor and the heart of youth.

1892 (October 12th)—Buried in the Abbey, beside Browning, and before the tomb of Chaucer, with "Cymbeline" laid in his dead hands. Westminster's nave was lined by men from the Balaklava "Light Brigade," and the pallbearers were: The Duke of Argyll, Lords Dufferin, Selborne, Salisbury, Roseberry, and Kelvin; Sir James Paget, Dr. Butler of Trinity, Dr. Jewett, the historians Froide and Lecky and the United States Minister, Robert T. Lincoln.

Fame blows his cheer trumpet o'er thy sleep,
And love stands broken by thy lonely lay;
So sure the fire God gave this day to keep,
The clay must still seem holy from the fire.

OUR FIVE-FOLD SHEAF.

Kipling's Verse.

Kipling's verse is the song of the pioneer, primitive and modern both, of the pioneer of the Age of Steam, of the founder of order in Africa, of Tommy Atkins on the Afghan border, of the younger son in Australia, positively strumming remembrance of the London lights from the strings of the banjo as he sits "on a bucket upside down." The call of the wanderlust, "in desire of many marvels overseas," strong in the hearts of his minstrels; they are "blooded to the open and the sky," they are "taken in a snare that shall not fall"; they yearn for the smell of campfires and the heaving breast of distant seas. Adventure is life; discovery is triumph; death only an incident in the conquest of the unknown. All are fighters, whether like McAndrews, "the dour Scots engineer," they wrestle with the power of steam and their own souls or, like Tommy, they match rifle-butt with the knives of Fuzzy-Wuzzly at his "home in the Sowdan," or like Mullahand, the religious cattle-tender on the ship, they make converts by knocking them down and leading 'em to grace.

In his verse, too, Kipling has made the romance of the machine a poetic motive. Think of the transformation of industrial life if every factory hand had old McAndrew's vision of his engine where he saw "predestination in the stride of yon connectin'-rod," and could sing, with him, of "purritin' dynamoses" and of his smoothly-working mechanism "singing with the morning stars for joy that they are made." His verse is the song of action, blood-stirring, soul-kindling, full of the salt of the sea and the smoke of hunters' fires, and the joys and griefs and triumphs of the "man who knows his naked soul."

The ancient and admirable Seamen's Friend Society reports that nine sailors out of ten to whom its traveling libraries are accessible read the books, and that the favorites are, in order, Stevenson's "Treasure Island," Dumas' "The Three Musketeers," Stoddard's "Cruising Among the Caribbees," Watson's "Hurricane Island," Weynan's "Under the Red Robe," Wallace's "The Prince of India."

LITERARY MATERIAL GOING TO WASTE.

The editor of a half-dozen popular short-story magazines once told the writer of this that Bret Harte's stories of California were out of date and would not be accepted if offered to-day to a modern editor. That his judgment was not conclusive is indicated by the fact that the Houghton Mifflin company have just issued a new edition of Harte's works in pocket size.

This fact suggests that the pioneers who are rapidly being claimed by death are carrying with them to the grave a wealth of picturesque incident and anecdote of early days in California. It seems a pity that no author has risen with the genius to grasp more of the spirit of that day which Harte immortalized, for Harte did not, by any means, exhaust its resources of literary availability. He caught and fixed, in story form, the images of some of the more striking types of '49, and the pictures of some sides of its social life. But he did not paint his pictures on a large canvas. He rather wrought miniatures, exquisite, life-like, immortal. But the story of that day has the possibilities of an Homeric epic, with the spirit of an adventurous people for its motive.

Someone should write this bigger story of the Argonauts. Whoever would do it should make haste to catch the spirit of its setting from the depleted ranks of the pioneers.

Meanwhile, since we must wait upon the gods for the birth of genius, would it not be money wisely spent if the universities would detail students from the history classes to make a careful search for men who lived during the stirring days of the gold fever and to get from them the anecdotes and historical minutiae that are the local color of historical romance? These things, more of permanent record, will some day be incalculably valuable to some one with the gift to unify them in literary form; at least as valuable as the records of Digger Indian folk-lore for collecting which much money has already been spent.

EMERSON'S "JOURNAL."

Houghton Mifflin Company, the Boston publishers, announce that the first publication of Ralph Waldo Emerson's boyhood "Journal" will be begun by them with the issuance of the first two volumes this fall. These volumes cover the years 1820-1829.

Emerson's two rules to young scholars have often been quoted: "Room alone," and "Keep a Journal." The latter seems to have been his amusement. In college, morning and evening he wrote serious thoughts and questionings, relieved by rhetorical flights, ballads, or nonsense verses, often recording his pleasure in what he had read or heard from great men.

His early love and first marriage, the sickness and death of his wife, his zeal and his doubts as a pastor, his quiet parting with his rock, his travels and return to Concord, are all episodes which appear in the Journal. Among the notabilities mentioned are Dr. Channing, Everett, Webster, Carlyle, Thoreau, Alcott, Father Taylor, Ellery Channing, Margaret Fuller, and Hawthorne.

COAST NUMBER OF WORLD'S WORK.

The August issue of The World's Work is called "The Marvelous Pacific Coast Number," and is devoted almost wholly to articles describing the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific Exposition and the resources of California and the Northwest. One long article, "The Reducibility of California," describes the larger movements now in process of shaping the development of the state, together with an account of the New San Francisco. Several pages of photographic reproductions of California scenes and a map of California, and of Tehachapi illustrate the article. Pictures of the Seaside fair and articles explaining the railroad extensions of Oregon and Washington are also printed in this number.

MEN WHO DO THINGS

REV. D. O. CROWLEY.

Rev. D. O. Crowley.

"Catch them young"

For twenty-three years, Rev. D. O. Crowley, of San Francisco, has been "catching them young," and 12,000 boys rescued from poverty and vice are the results of his practical creed. For twenty-three years, Reverend Crowley and the "Youths' Directory" have been practically identical.

Father Crowley was born in County Cork, Ireland, in 1852. He received a good common-school education there. In his boyhood he came to America, first to Boston, where he worked for Rand, Avery & Co.; later to Nevada, where he swung a pick for years as a miner on the Comstock.

Then he gave up mining and entered St. Vincent's College, in Los Angeles, from which he was graduated. After a later course at St. Mary's Seminary, in Baltimore, he was ordained a Catholic priest. He was in charge of the parish at Dixon, Cal., until 1887, when Archbishop Riordan put him in charge of the work of building up the Youths' Directory in San Francisco.

Since that time Father Crowley's life is written in terms of boys rescued and educated and put to work with the training necessary for success. He refuses to consider his personal career at all, and even the meagre facts of his earlier life that are printed above had to be gleaned from his friends.

When he took charge of the work, a small one-story building was the sole equipment. He set about getting larger quarters. Funds were necessary. He organized St. Joseph's Union, a body of men and women who thinly disguised their charity by subscribing for a modest quarterly paper of the same name, each paying one dollar a year. To-day, $8,000 are annually received for the prosecution of the work from this source alone.

By this means and with funds raised by entertainments and benefits, a larger building was acquired in 1889. The number of boys rescued jumped from 112 in 1887, to 505 in 1889.

Ten years later a much larger building was put up. The following year the number of boys rescued increased to 668. This building was destroyed by the fire three years ago, but to-day a still larger building is going up to replace it.

What Does the Directory Do?

The Directory is a home for boys whose parents are too poor to care for them properly, for boys whose parents are drunken or otherwise unfit to care for them, for boys who are from any cause homeless, friendless, or hungry. In the Directory they are clothed, fed, instructed in morals, and provided with a playground, with good books to read, and with good beds. They are not taught there; they are sent to the public schools; but in every other respect the Directory is home to them. When they are old enough, work is found for them under conditions permitting them to learn a way to earn a living, and until they are self-supporting, the Directory is still their home. When a boy is earning seven dollars a week, the Directory finds him a home where he will be properly raised and where his earnings give him an honorable claim to the care of his foster family. Boys of exceptional capacity are kept by the Directory and given special educational advantages equipping them for higher grades of work or for the professions.

The Directory makes no distinction of race, color, or creed. It has raised negroes and Chinese, Catholics and Protestants, and found homes and work for all.

The theory of the "catch them young" motto is the now well-known sociological fact that children raised in an environment of vice and inefficiency drift naturally and rapidly into crime during youth, while these same children, if lifted from their surroundings before adolescence, may be trained to become industrious and useful citizens by proper nutrition, proper discipline, and steady employment. That is the whole of the simple theory; but California is richer to-day by literally thousands of sober citizens because of Father Crowley's practical application of it.

One addition has been made to the theory and to the practice. The addition is the supplementing of the home in San Francisco with instruction in practical farming. In 1902 Father Crowley, after years of patient work, was able to buy 1,200 acres of land at Rutherford, in the upper Napa valley, and to establish there the St. Joseph's Agricultural Institute and School of Mechanical Industry. Boys from the slums are sent there to grow up in fresh air and away from every suggestion of their unfortunate origin, and to study farming under practical instructors. They are taught how to plant vines and trees, how to prune, how to pick and prepare the fruit for market. They are taught dairying, from raising hay to making butter. A graduate at Rutherford is competent to hire out as a skilled farm laborer or to own and operate his own farm. Already, hundreds of boys have learned the fine art of farming at Rutherford. And, better, they have learned to love the country and to appreciate the solid pleasures of its fruitful labor. They have found their place in the world of industry who, but for Father Crowley's work, would have grown up, if not to a life of crime, at least to the closely-related life of industrial inefficiency.

This work has not overlapped the work of orphanages. Orphans are entitled to state aid: $100 a year for full orphans, and $75 a year for half orphans. But the boys who are helped by the Directory are not orphans; they are waifs for whom no governmental provision is made. The Directory's field is unique. Its success has been an enormous service to the public. Father Crowley is the author of that success, and he deserves, as he receives, the gratitude of all who are familiar with his work.

The public has now an opportunity to indicate its appreciation, and The California Weekly gladly and on its own initiative commends to the public the means of attesting it. Funds are needed to clear the indebtedness incurred in the work of replacing the building destroyed in the great fire, and any person charitably or patriotically inclined can further a most worthy cause by contributing to a fund for this purpose.

Knowing full well that we shall be indebted to the good we can say for his work, for hope of his forgiveness for good words spoken on behalf of himself, we rest content with the prophecy that Father Crowley will become increasingly dear to San Francisco as the years go by. As he forgot self when he entered the priesthood so, from that day to this, has he left self out of his thoughts. He is glad of his success for his boys' sake and it is a bit proud of his Directory and his big farm it is for their sakes, too, not his own. The achievements of many a captain of industry or finance, whose name is continually in the public mouth, dwarf into insignificance by comparison with the life work of Rev. D. O. Crowley.

THE GRAFT CASES.

At this writing (Thursday) two jurors have been temporarily passed to the jury box, in the trial of Patrick Calhoun, and there they will remain, at least, until the peremptory challenge lightning has been given opportunity to work its will on them. The two jurors thus temporarily accepted are Thomas Gainsford, a plumber, and Thomas Green, a retired saloon-keeper. These two possible jurors are all the wheat that has been saved from the chaff of nearly 1,500 talemens, the rest having been winnowed out of the case by either the court, the attorneys or themselves. Still, there is encouragement in the fact that both of these jury possibilities have been attained within the limits of the last week; it emphatically beats the record of the two preceding weeks, when not a single juror was temporarily passed.

 S-s-sh! S-s-sh! S-s-sh!—

His Awful Dream.

"I had a dream," said the pale man.

"Yes?" said I.

"Yes; it was an awful dream."

"What was it?"

"I dreamed that the end of all earthly things had come, and I was in Heaven. I don't know how I got there, but as the wall appeared to be unbroken, it may have been legitimately. I looked about me on the assembled throng from earth, and, as I had been acquainted with the manner in which the membership of churches here is constituted, I was not at all surprised by what I saw."

"What was it?" I inquired.

"Why, for every male angel there were a few dozen female angels. Of course, I congratulated myself, for I fancied I ought to work a fairly good time out of such a situation, and I had gone so far as to figure that my share would be about fifty-seven, when I saw something, and I awoke in a cold sweat."

"What did you see?" I asked.

"Just a sign. Oh, dear!"

"What did the sign say?"

"It said—oh, hum—it said:

TAKE NOTICE!

Male Angels, having learned how on Earth, are expected to button the Female Angels' wings down the back.

"Ah me!" said the pale man, "do you believe there is anything in dreams?"

I tried to comfort him by saying I thought there was not; but who knows?

Much of His Education to Come.

"I understand that his education is completed."

"By no means."

"Why, he has graduated from the university, has he not?"

"Yes, but he's not married."

I Never Ask for It.

In prayers unspoken oft I plead

For much of joy and blessing.

For what I wish, and what I need,

My every hope expressing.

I ask for much, the more. My "nerve"

Would rule me, and I let it;

But ne'er I ask what I deserve—

I fear that I might get it.

The Opinions of Rufus.

Most of us when we make a success hurry to tell the neighbors how we did it, but when we make a failure, we lay it to Providence.

When the Almighty hears some men say they're self-made, I should think He'd feel relieved of considerable responsibility.

The man who votes an' worships precisely as his pa did either was mighty lucky in s'lectin' his parent or he can't maintain the family's goin' ahead much in his generation.

Just listen to their talk, an' you'll find that the feller that ain't got any ideas is likely to be the first an' loudest to let you know it.

You thought she was an angel 'fore you married her, an' it's a mighty lucky thing fer you it turned out you was mistaken. You'd make a interestin' partner fer a angel, wouldn't you?

There was only One that said, Let him that's without sin cast the first stone. The rest of us say, Let him that ain't ben ketcht at it throw the stone.

Seems to me that the greatest failure in life is to succeed in doin' the thing that shouldn't be done.

It's said that order is heaven's first law, but I reckon some men are mistaken in fancyin' it's the order the lodge they b'long to is a member of.

Seems to me church an' together admit that we're miserable sinners, but we have to be all alone 'fore we admit it so hard that it hurts much.

No, I ain't afraid o' automobiles, but when you take one an' a fool in combination I must say that I feel a little nervous as long as I'm on the same row of blocks.

Thoughtful Man on the Jury System.

"I was in court the other day," said the Thoughtful Man, "and watched the lawyers trying to find a man who, under our wise and beneficent laws, was fitted by nature and environment to serve on a jury. 'Twas a beautiful and yet pathetic scene. A candidate for the jury was on the stand.

"Are you a man of normal intelligence?"
 the lawyer for the defense inquired.

"I trust so," was the answer.

"The lawyer imperfectly suppressed a hopeless sigh, but bravely went ahead regardless of the handicap.

"Can you read?" he says.

"The gifted attorney shuddered, but realizing that one hope still was left, he nobly continued.

"You say that you can read," he thundered,
 "but do you?"

"Sometimes."

"Ah-h-h!" The lawyer could not restrain his emotion, and gloom settled upon the court like a mantle. Evidently there was no hope, but the heroic attorney manfully continued, against all odds, to earn his fee.

"I can."

"Yes," he says, "but do you base opinions on what you read?"

"At times I do."

"It becomes my high duty," says the lawyer, addressing the court, "to get at the actual condition of this man's heart and alleged mind.

We cannot allow any perfidious creature to worm his way into this case and interfere with the magnificent onward march of sacred Justice.

"Now, sir," he says, turning to the candidate
 "you say that at times you base an opinion on what you read. Let us ascertain what you mean. Suppose you should read in the papers that a man had fallen from a balloon to the ground, a distance of 1,000 feet, had broken every bone in his body and crushed himself out of all human semblance—on these alleged facts would you base an opinion that the man probably was dead?"

"I presume that I should."

"Enough!" cries the lawyer in broken tones.

"We ask, your honor, that this man be excused.

It must be apparent to everyone that he is a person of violent prejudices and preconceived opin—

"Hold!" cries the lawyer for the prosecution, "We desire to ask a question." He does so.

"Suppose," he says, "it were shown by the evidence that the man was not dead, but was only joshing, what would you then decide?"

"That it was a very successful josh."

"Under all the circumstances, of course, the challenge was not resisted.

"It is by this immortal and ennobling system," the Thoughtful Man continued, "that Justice is assured of a chance to surge onward and devote more of her attention to poverty-stricken wretches who need it."

"Do you consider it a good system?" I inquired.

"Sure!" the Thoughtful Man responded. "If the system were other than it is it would get so after a time that our honored and wealthy citizens could not be held up to their own advantage with impunity. Oh, you bet it is a great system!"

The Little Old Shoemaker.

A little, old shoemaker lived long ago—

Ho and oho! but he now is dead—

And he sung a song that I very well know

Over and o'er till the day was sped;

And the song kept time to his hammer's tap.

Falling with rhythmic and jubilant swing.

And it all was sweet to the little chap

Who paused in his doorway to hear him sing:

Rat-a-tat! Rat-a-tat! Rat-a-tat, tat!—

"Worry's a phantom, a specter, my dear;

It skurries away if you say to it, 'Scat!'

There's never a trouble unless it is here—"

Rat-a-tat! Rat-a-tat! Rat-a-tat, tat!—

"Now what do you think of a notion like that?"

Thus did he sing till the sun sank low,

This little, old shoemaker long ago.

He had little of wealth that the world would heed—

Ho and oho! What matter? I say;

A very few income will fit a wee need,

And money will rarely for happiness pay—

So his face, though wrinkled, was wondrously fair.

Shining in peace and with love aglow,

As his hammer fell and he trolled his air,

Ever and ever so long ago:

Rat-a-tat! Rat-a-tat! Rat-a-tat, tat!—

"Worry's a specter we never need fear;

It skurries away if we say to it, 'Scat!'

There's never a trouble unless it is here—"

Rat-a-tat! Rat-a-tat! Rat-a-tat, tat!—

"Now what do you think of a notion like that?"

He was richer than many held wealthy, I thought, this little, old shoemaker long ago.

It was ever and ever so long ago—

Ho and oho! how the years do fly!—

And his song was lost in the anthem low

We chant o'er the graves where our loved ones lie;

And perchance—who may know?—there's a bench up there,

Over the trouble and out of the wrong,

Where he sometimes sits, with never a care,

While the angels listen to hear his song:

Rat-a-tat! Rat-a-tat! Rat-a-tat, tat!—

Worry's a fog of the workaday sphere,

It bindeth the toilers o'er valley and flat.

But here on God's summit our vision is clear—"

Rat-a-tat! Rat-a-tat! Rat-a-tat, tat!—

"His angels e'er whisper such message as

that."

And I would that my life all his wisdom might know,

This little, old shoemaker long ago.

AMERICAN LYRICS.

AUSPEX.

By James Russell Lowell.

My heart, I cannot still it,
 Next that had song-birds in it;
 And when the last shall go,
 The dreary days do fill it.
 Instead of lark or linnet,
 Shall whirl dead leaves and snow.

Had they been swallows only,
 Without the passion stronger
 That skyward longs and sings,— Woe's me, I shall be lonely
 When I can feel no longer
 The impatience of their wings!

A moment, sweet delusion,
 Like birds the brown leaves hover;
 But it will not be long
 Before their wild confusion
 Fall wavering down to cover
 The poet and his song.

Julia Marlowe will act the part of Hamlet next season.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Good Work From A State Board

The State Board of Equalization, by unanimous vote, has shovled up railroad assessments on the basis of conditions, and by far the greater part of the increase has fallen on the Southern Pacific roads. What can the matter be? Has Mr. Herrin lost his control over that formerly well-oiled and light-running piece of political machinery, the State Board of Equalization? Within four years the assessed valuation of the railroads has been put up 50 per cent. or so, and it is more than twenty years since anything of the sort happened before. It is true that the immediate explanation of the rapidly-rising taxes of the railroad companies is the adoption of the practically automatic plan, proposed by the constitutional amendment of 1908, of basing assessments on gross earnings; but how came the State Board of Equalization to volunteer to put this plan in operation in advance of a vote by the people and how came they to continue it after the people, by a small majority, had rejected it? The only adequate explanation is that there has been such a political change passing over California that the same men who would formerly have been thoroughly subservient now act in a quite different manner. By the way, when railroad traffic fully recovers from the effects of the panic, gross earnings, and consequently taxes, will increase still more rapidly, if the automatic plan of assessment continues in use.

Figures Lie When Liars Do the Figuring

In their arguments before the Board of Equalization this year, as appears from the detailed reports in the Sacramento papers, the railroad representatives renewed their attempt to demonstrate that one car mile the roads carry much less in Nevada, Arizona, and New Mexico, and the Santa Fe company even sent its chief statistician out from Chicago to help prove this paradox. To one who knows what the valleys of California are and who also is acquainted with the arid wastes of the other, common sense mentions it would appear that extraordinary mathematical skill would be necessary to make such a proposition look plausible. And yet, if you grant the premises of the railroad statisticians, they can prove their case and it is impossible to find fault with their logic, wherein they remind one of the English statesman who said: "Never make a mistake in your reasoning, for if you do you will be detected and exposed; but the facts are yours to do with as you please." The premise of the railroad people is that each mile of road earns a certain amount for each ton of freight moved over it; in other words, freight earnings are in proportion to the "density" of the traffic, and on the main lines in Nevada and Arizona traffic is denser than in California, because, although there is little local business, all of the traffic gathered up by the branches and feeders in California is brought together in solid train loads and so moved across the desert. It looks like a case of what the theologians call imputed righteousness to believe that railroads can be greater earners of money in barren Nevada than in fertile California, but the railroad traffic manager's proposition is one hard to meet.

The Pullmans Made Of Sterner Stuff

The Pullman Car company, unlike the railroads, has not been minded to pay what was right lest the people revolt. That company keeps its nerve. For long years that corporation reported to the Board of Equalization certain lines over which it ran cars and the number of cars required to "fill" those lines, as they were called. It occurred to State Controller A. B. Nye that it would be of interest to know if it did, or did not, require just the number of cars reported for taxation to "fill" those lines, so he set energies in motion to have all the assessors in the state, and their deputies, list all the Pullman sleeping cars to be found in the state, on a day certain as not far off, and read the description to the office of the State Board of Equalization. When these reports came in, were inspected and all duplications were crossed out, it was discovered that it required about one-third more cars to "fill" its California runs than its agents had reported and the company was assessed accordingly. The same sort of an investigation has disclosed a similar state of facts this year. But the Pullman car company did not pay without protest. In fact it did not pay at all and there are now three years' assessments against it. Its officers evidently concluded that, if they were not to be permitted to do their own assessing of their own company as in former years, paying, as the railroads had, what they were "minded to" and no more, they would not pay at all, but would take full advantage of the delays and uncertainties afforded powerful litigants by California's complicated and unquestionable judicial system. There are few corporations so ponderous that they cannot dodge a tax with as much facility as a calf can dodge a man on horseback.

The Philosophy of Railroad Control

The Watchman is disinclined to concede that Mr. Herrin and his associates permitted the nomination at Santa Cruz, and election at the polls, of an honest Board of Equalization through negligence. If such a board was selected it was by design or else the equalizers broke out of the reservation afterward. Perhaps the phenomenon may be accounted for on philosophic grounds. It is commonly known that there are two corner stones underlying the railroad policy of this country, and especially of California. One is expressed in "What the Traffic Will Bear," and the other in "What the People Will Stand." The first has to do with carrying the people and their merchandise, the other with running the people's government in their room and stead. During the administration of Governor Pardee the People of California got into a dangerous mood. They began to get out things. The governor and his associates talked, talked for publication, talked for the information of the people. Then came the Santa Cruz convention and the election which gave the railroad's candidate for governor 60,000 less than a majority of the votes cast although unfortunately, a plurality. That shook up the "organization" like a temblor. For twenty years the railroads had dodged $700,000 a year in state taxes. The Lincoln-Roosevelt movement gave 'em another shake-up and they did not dare to do it any more. The "organization" wanted to keep on the safe side of "What the People Will Stand." The Lincoln-Roosevelt revolt was ozone to the political atmosphere of California and the fragrance of it still lingers.

The "Hon." Dick Beamer The Back at the Public Crib

The Honorable "Dick" Beamer was for sixteen consecutive years a member of the State Board of Equalization. Those were fat years for the railroads. They assessed themselves at what they were minded to pay and the genial Richard never said them nay. When he declined to be a candidate for reelection in 1906 it was understood to be for the reason that his health was so poor as to make him unable to hold a sinecure which, it was believed, although a Democrat, he had by life tenure from the Republican powers that be. His many friends will be glad to note that he has so far recovered as to be able again to hold his head of the state treasury. State Bank Commissioner Alden Anderson has appointed him an expert accountant for his department. Expert he is, as politician if not certainly as accountant, and he should know values as well as any man in the state, but it is hard to reconcile his appointment with the concept of an entirely non-political state banking department, and any other kind will promise little better than the late unnamed State Board of Politicians. Without politics to "do" Dick Beamer would die of ennui, but we have this at least to comfort us: There is no conceivable reason why the "organization" people should wish to maintain in California a thoroughly unsound and unsafe banking system.

Theodore Bell Still Stirring Up the Animals

Although it seems a long time since 1906, when Theodore Bell, Democratic candidate for governor, made such a sensational run, he is still an interesting character, and every little while he does something to start the political gossips talking. They have recently been asking themselves what Mr. Bell means by stirring up the bankers and the other wealthy men in his home county and insuring their lasting enmity. He has had them all up before the county board of supervisors to show why their assessments and taxes should not be doubled, and in some cases the board has ordered sensational raises over the assessor's figures. It is true that Bell has a contract with the Napa supervisors that he shall get 25 per cent. or some other substantial per cent. of all the tax-money he brings in, but will that mean much to him if he offends all of the people in the county who could be good paying clients of his law office? And where is the politics of it? ask the puzzled politicians. He has been known that Theodore Bell was the real author of the Sanford bill in the last legislature intended to authorize county supervisors to employ assistants—tax ferrets they are called in other states—to discover property which the assessors have left off the rolls. The bill was killed, but his conduct has not been discouraged. It is known he contemplates carrying his campaign into other counties next year, and the outcome will be worth watching, for if he is right on some of the legal propositions he is maintaining, the assessors of the state have been very ignorant of many things they ought to know. One thing is reasonably certain, and this is that Bell has a touch of political genius which will keep him well to the front for a good while to come. His receipting to the county in full of claim for services performed in tax ferretting for a consideration of one dollar will effectually close the mouths of his critics if it does shave his own pocket rather thin.

Curry's Candidacy Looks Dangerous

The press of the state is almost uniformly recognizing, and quite generally admitting, the dangerous character of the candidacy of Charles F. Curry for the Republican nomination for governor. It is conceded that he is a strong candidate, his strength mainly consisting in his popularity with the most objectionable element in our political life, the element, for instance, most certain to vote at a primary election. Only about 25 per cent. of the registered voters in this or any other state habitually votes at a primary election, and that is precisely that portion of the electorate whose voting could be dispensed with to the greatest public advantage. It is the 25 per cent. that votes because there is something in it, for themselves or their friends and there would be "something in it" for as many of them as possible if Charles F. Curry were nominated and elected governor. That is, he could be relied on to throw his influence toward making two jobs out of the state service when there was only one before wherever it could be done, and every such job would be filled with a political friend to Curry. In Mr. Curry's political philosophy that is what a state is for.

"Peace" for The week in San Francisco politics has been very dull.

The most noteworthy activities are those of the Citizen's Committee, or the "Business Men's" Committee, who are eagerly searching for "peace." Peace, according to their idea, is the voluntary elimination of all candidates for Republican nomination but their own. This idea, though naive, is not ingenious. It has appealed with all its humorous implication to the candidates backed by the Municipal League of Independent Republican Clubs and headed by Byron Maury for mayor. The gentlemen, unperturbed by the horrible spectre of party dissension, are continuing their active campaign to beat Crocker and the organization crew nominated by Hellman-de Young and the rest. They are preparing to placard the city in the interest of their ticket, and they intend carry the fight right up to the primary polls on the 17th. The Municipal League is strongly organized, and will give the machine a hard fight.

Coghlan Out Of The Race Other candidates have, however, listened to the siren song of peace. Nate C. Coghlan, who rose with sound and fury to "beat one Francis J. Heney" for district attorney, was sidetracked by the "business" interests, and Charles M. Fickert got the right of way and full train-orders over the regular Republican track. Coghlan had a long debate with himself after the miscarriage of his plans, a debate after the manner of Shakespeare's clown arguing with his good thumb and his bad thumb. The result is that Coghlan reluctantly agreed to withdraw in favor of peace—not of Fickert. Perhaps "one Heney" would have had more pleasure in defeating Coghlan, who stands at least boldly against the things that Heney stands for, than in defeating Fickert, who stands for the same things as Coghlan, but not so notoriously.

What is it that makes some candy taste SO good.

It's the quality of the material that goes into it.

Some candy makers continually figure out scheme and experiment to increase profits by decreasing cost.

Quality then has to suffer.

Lehnhardt continually figures and tries to increase profits by making better candies.

Lehnhardt's way costs more per pound but he sells more pounds.

Which is better—to sell 1,000 pounds at a profit of 10c a pound or to sell 100 pounds at a profit of 25c a pound?

Lehnhardt prefers the former—Makes more money and more friends.

Think it over.

Trying to Beat McNab The Democrats of the anti-McNab wing are trying desperately to beat Leland at the primaries. McLeran, their nominee for mayor, has agreed to support Rock, if he himself is not successful. Rock is the third leg in the race, but is not a McNabocrat. The McNab regulars are not making an open fight, and have no acknowledged ticket, but the word has passed down the line intelligibly to those who take their politics straight, and it would surprise everybody if the regulars did not win.

Is Gallagher Slated For Chief of Police? No progress is reported in the engravers' strike noticed in these columns last week. The questions are still being asked by people interested in politics who would like to know what connection there might be between a strike and the chances of P. H. McCarthy winning the mayoralty. It is worth while at this point to ask a question that is current in the mouths of these same seekers after truth: Is it true that, in the event McCarthy is elected mayor, Andrew J. Gallagher will be chief of police?

A QUAIN CONTRACT.

The unusually careful records of our early New England settlements are of extreme interest. Though there runs through them the seriousness of Puritanism, we, their degenerate descendants, may find some humor in the direct and simple autobiographies of their troublé lives.

In the early history of Suffield, Conn., we quote an extract from Major Pynchon's diary:

An Agreement for Millstones.

John Pynchon.

THE CHILD AND THE MAN.

Upon the beach a child played, and he builded himself a house of sand, and when it was completed he laughed gleefully and was proud because of it. Back from the beach a little way were stones of which the house might have been builded, but the child liked to play with the sand better.

Then a breaker rolled in and swept the structure away, and the child wept, but the sand still was there, and so the child builded again a house which a wave swept away, and his laughter and tears succeeded each other throughout the day.

Of the golden sands upon the beach of time a man builded the structure that is known as wealth, and he held it very fair and rejoiced in it. Close at hand were the rocks of good will and faithful service and brotherly love, but the man loved the glittering sand better, and he said to all, "See how wonderful is the structure of wealth I have erected!"

Then, from out the mist-draped, eternal sea, swept the black wave of death, and the man saw his structure no more, for the wave bore him away in its gloomy depths.

Again and yet again the child builded his fragile structure, but the man could build but once and always he had known it.

Now which, think you, was the wiser, the child or the man?

NO MORE.

By B. F. Willson.

This is the Burden of the Heart,
The Burden that it always bore:
We live to love; we meet to part;
And part to meet on earth no more:
We clasp each other to the heart,
And part to meet on earth no more.

There is a time for tears to start,—
For dew to fall and larks to soar:
The time for tears is when we part
To meet upon the earth no more:
The time for tears is when we part
To meet on this wide earth—no more.

ENGLAND'S BETTER CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

V. REPRIEVES, PARDONS, AND APPEALS.
By AN ENGLISH ATTORNEY.

[This article is the fifth of a series arranged for by The California Weekly, contrasting the procedure in the criminal courts of England with the Californian procedure and showing why the English system results in a far more expeditious and even-handed justice without expending delays. America adopted the English method of administering justice shortly before England discarded that method for a better one. America has complicated a cumbersome system while England has simplified a better system. The reform of the criminal procedure in California is the most urgent problem of the day, and this article, together with those to follow, will be illuminating to all concerned. They have been prepared for The California Weekly by an eminent member of the English bar who now resides in San Francisco, and may be relied upon as an authoritative statement of the facts.—The Editor.]

There was no provision at common law for paying the costs of a private prosecutor or the expenses of witnesses, but now by the statute both the expenses and the costs of prosecution may, as said before, be paid to the private prosecutor, also such sums to the witnesses and to the prosecutor as may reimburse them for their expenses before the grand jury and before the committing magistrate and remunerate them for their loss of time. These costs and expenses are allowed on a certificate of the magistrates. The reform of the criminal procedure in California is the most urgent problem of the day, and this article, together with those to follow, will be illuminating to all concerned. They have been prepared for The California Weekly by an eminent member of the English bar who now resides in San Francisco, and may be relied upon as an authoritative statement of the facts.—The Editor.]

Verdict May Vary from Accusation.

Instead of bringing in a verdict of guilty or not guilty the jury has the right, if they find from the evidence that the facts proved constitute a lesser crime than that charged in the indictment, to render a verdict against the accused for the lesser crime, for example, a man has been indicted for horse stealing but convicted of larceny, and when the crime was not actually committed but the facts showed that it was attempted the verdict may be guilty of an attempt to commit the crime. The jury may also specially find the facts in a case and may leave it to the judge to say whether accused is guilty or not guilty or the judge may refuse to receive the verdict of the jury and direct it to reconsider the same and the jury may do so and the second verdict is then recorded. Of course all verdicts are received in open court.

In case the verdict is "guilty" the next step in the criminal process is the judgment. Upon a capital charge the prisoner is either immediately or at some convenient time thereafter asked if he has any reason to offer why judgment should not be awarded against him; after which if nothing is urged in arrest of judgment the judge pronounces sentence. If there be no appeal the only remaining way of avoiding the execution of a sentence is by a reprieve or pardon.

Reprieves and Pardons.

A reprieve or respite is merely a suspension of the execution and may be either before or after judgment, as where the offender becomes insane between judgment and execution or after conviction before judgment or where a woman capitally convicted pleads pregnancy. The power of pardon is vested in the sovereign and may be granted for all offenses excepting those injuries where the interest of individuals is concerned or in case of a common nuisance until it is abated, an offense against a penal statute where the informer has acquired a private property in his share of the penalty. Neither can a pardon be granted or pleaded against a parliamentary impeachment. Sometimes a pardon is conditional and capital punishment may be commuted to imprisonment, etc.

The last stage of criminal process is the "execution" which must in all cases in England be performed by the sheriff or his deputy. Formerly the warrant for execution was by precept under the hand and seal of the judge; but the usage now is for the judge to sign the calendar (a list containing the names, etc., of the prisoners) with the separate punishment written in the margin; as for example, in case of a capital felony it is written opposite the culprit's name "Let him be hanged by the neck."

The "Execution" of Sentence.

As to the execution of the termination of the Assizes the Clerk of the Assize makes out four lists of the courts, with the names, verdicts and sentences, leaving a blank column in which if the judge sees reason to vary the course of the law he writes opposite the name of the capital convicts, "to be reprieved, respited," etc. After these four calendars have been compared by the judge and the clerk they are signed by them and the judge and clerk keep one list each, the jailor is given another and one is given to the sheriff. This forms the latter's only warrant for the execution when he afterwards executes the judgment. In some counties in England, for example in Lancashire, the jailor does not receive a copy of the calendars but one is sent instead to the Secretary of State, and the practice of the Central Criminal Court in London now follows the practice of other courts. Of course the sheriff cannot alter the mode of punishment without being guilty of felony, even the King cannot change it. If upon a judgment to be "hanged by the neck until he is dead," the criminal revives, the sheriff must hang him again, as the first was no execution of the sentence.

The Court of Criminal Appeal.

There was formerly in England no appeal in criminal cases, but, on the 28th of August, 1907, an act was passed constituting a "Court of Criminal Appeal" and the Lord Chief Justice and eight judges of the King's Bench Division of the High Court appointed for that purpose by the Lord Chief Justice with the consent of the Lord Chancellor, for such period as he thinks desirable in each case, are judges of this court. A quorum consists of not less than three judges and the judgment of a majority is pronounced by the president thereof and no separate opinion by any other member of the court is usually permitted, the majority determines the question. The decision is final and no appeal lies to the House of Lords unless the attorney general grants a certificate that it involves a point of law of exceptional public importance.

When the prisoner desires to appeal to the Court of Criminal Appeal he gives notice within ten days after conviction of his intention to apply for leave to appeal. The act provides that a person convicted on indictment may appeal against his conviction upon any grounds which involve a question of law alone. Where a question of fact alone or a question of mixed law and fact is involved or where any other ground which appears to the Court of Appeals to be sufficient ground of appeal exists then the prisoner may appeal if he obtains the leave of the Court of Criminal Appeal or a certificate of the judge who tried him that it is a fit case for appeal. He can also appeal against the sentence passed on his conviction unless it be one fixed by law, upon first obtaining the leave of the Court of Criminal Appeal.

Wide Powers of Appeal Court.

The act further provides that the Court of Criminal Appeal shall "allow" the appeal if they think that the verdict is unreasonable or cannot be supported by the evidence or that the judgment of the trial court wrongly decided any question of law or "that on any ground there was a miscarriage of justice," otherwise they dismiss the appeal. It is provided that the court, notwithstanding that they are of opinion that the point raised by the appeal might be decided in favor of the appellant but that no substantial miscarriage of justice has actually occurred, may dismiss the appeal. If they allow the appeal against the conviction they may quash the conviction and direct a verdict of acquittal to be entered, or in an appeal against the sentence if they think that a different sentence should have been passed they may quash the sentence and pass such other sentence, warranted by the verdict (whether more or less severe), which they think ought to have been passed.

And if it appear that the appellant was not properly convicted on some point of the indictment or a count thereof, but has been properly convicted on some other count, they may either affirm the sentence or pass such other sentence as they think proper and warranted by the part or count of the indictment upon which they consider that the appellant was properly convicted. Where the appellant has been convicted of an offense and the jury could have found him guilty of some other offense and it appears to the Court of Criminal Appeal that the jury must have been satisfied of the facts which proved him guilty of the other offense they may substitute for the verdict found by the jury a verdict of guilty of the other offense and pass any sentence warranted in law, and not being of greater severity. If the jury found a special verdict and the Appellate Court consider that a wrong conclusion was arrived at by the trial court on the effect of the verdict they may, instead of allowing the appeal, order the proper conclusion to be recorded and pass any sentence warranted by law in place of the one passed at the trial. If it appears to the Appellate Court that the appellant was guilty but was insane so as not to be responsible, they may quash the sentence and order the appellant into custody as a criminal lunatic.

Orders for the restitution of property are suspended until determination of the appeal and the Appellate Court may annul or vary any order made in the trial court in relation thereto.

Ten Day Limit of Appeals.

The statute further provides concerning procedure on appeal that when a person desires to appeal or to obtain leave to do so he must give notice within ten days after his conviction and may present his argument in writing instead of orally, if he so desires. This time for notice may in all cases, except when the conviction involves sentence of death, be extended by the Appeal Court and where it does involve sentence of death or corporal punishment the sentence cannot be executed until after the time that notice of appeal has expired. The appeal or application "shall be heard and determined with as much expedition as practicable and sentence shall not be executed until after the determination of the appeal or in cases where an application for leave to appeal is finally refused, of the application."

The act further provides that the Court of Appeals may order the production of any document or other thing connected with the proceedings and if they think fit may examine any witnesses whether they were called at the trial or not. They are not obliged to examine the witnesses themselves but may order them to be examined before any judge, any officer of the court or justice of the peace, or may appoint any other person for the purpose and allow the deposition so taken to be read in evidence; and if they think fit they may receive the evidence of any witnesses including the appellant and those who are competent but not compellable witnesses and, if the appellant makes an application for the purpose, they may take the testimony of the husband or wife of the appellant.

If the examination of questions on appeal involves prolonged examination of documents or scientific or local investigations the Court of Appeals may refer the matter to a special commissioner and act on his report as far as they think fit. They may also appoint what is known in England as an "Assessor" to the court in any case where special knowledge is required for the determination of a case; the Assessor is a person who has special expert knowledge of the subject and aids the judges. Although permitted to consider evidence which was not given at the trial, yet it is provided that the Court of Appeals cannot by reason thereof increase any sentence. In the interests of justice the Court of Appeals may assign to the appellant who is unable to bear the costs of obtaining legal aid, a solicitor or counsel or both.

On all appeals the appellant may be present whether in custody or not unless the appeal involves a question of law alone, but he is not entitled to be present, unless by leave of court, in that case or on an application for leave to appeal or other incidental proceedings.

It is the duty of the Director of Public Prosecution to appear for the government in the Court of Criminal Appeals unless a government official or a private prosecutor undertakes the defense of the appeal.

Appellant May Be Bailed.

The statute further provides that an appellant may be admitted to bail by the Appellate Court pending the determination of his appeal. If an appeal on a question of law alone does not show any substantial ground of appeal the court may determine it summarily and if they consider the appeal frivolous or vexatious they dismiss it without calling any persons to attend or appear.

The necessary form and instructions in relation to notices of appeal and of application for leave, etc., are furnished by the registrar of the court to any person who demands the same and they are placed at the disposal of prisoners who desire to appeal.

Short-hand notes of the proceedings at the trial are furnished to the Appellate Court and a transcript thereof or of any part thereof is furnished to any persons upon the payment of statutory fees.

The appeal does not in any way affect the prerogative of mercy but pardons may be granted as heretofore and the Secretary of State may at any time refer the whole case or any point arising therein to the Court of Criminal Appeals for their opinion.

Technical Grounds for Delay Abolished.

Writs of error and motions for new trial in criminal cases are, since the passing of this act, abolished and all authority under the Crown Cases Act where questions of law were reserved by the judges of the trial court is now vested in the Court of Criminal Appeal which may require a case to be stated in the same manner as if the judge had reserved a question of law.

There are certain offenses, such as obstruction of a highway, a navigable river or public bridge, etc., where an appeal to the Court of Criminal Appeal does not lie but which are treated in all respects as though the conviction were a verdict in a civil action.

A SIERRA CLUB HIKE.

By Vida Sherman.

I.

Four-thirty—Boom! Boom!
Everybody crawl out!
Break the ice in the stream,
Wash your face, lazy lout.
Eat your breakfast of hard-tack,
Who cares if you choke?
Make haste, there's a hike on,
And a hike is no joke.
Strap on the knap-sacks—
A thirty-pound load;
Strike out for the tall-woods,
Make tracks on the road.

Hike!

Lickety-split! Lickety-split!
Two faint by the way-side,
One falls in a fit.
Blister your heel, let your nose peel,
No one cares a damn here how rotten you feel.
On with the hike, for you can't turn back now.
Sierra! Sierra! Wow!

II.

Dash by Yosemite,
Glance in a side-gate,
Race through Hetch-Hetchy,
Your pace is too slow.
Don't pause in Tuolumne,
Speed down the Gorge,
You've broken the record
A minute, George!
Up one side of Whitney,
Then down with a zip,
Two bounds for Mt. Brewer,
Up Lyell with a skip.

Hike!

Trampety-trampety-trampety-tramp!
Your throats are all throbbing,
Your legs have a cramp.
Wipe the tears from your eyes, choke back your sighs,
Nobody gets weary save tender-foot guys.
On with the hike, for you can't turn back now.
Sierra! Sierra! Wow!

III.

Eighty-thirty—make camp.
Everybody turn in.
Who cares now for hard-tack,
Or beef from a tin?
Ten absent at roll-call,
All women, of course;
One man with a white skin,
He rode on a horse.
Don't try to turn over—
A sleeping-bag's tight.
Hear the buzz of the skeeters?
Don't squeal when they bite.
Sleep!

Groaning and moaning—a frightful night-mare!

You dream you are falling,
But to scream you don't dare.
'Tis the end of day one, the sport's just begun, You're sorry for people who can't share your fun.
On with the hike, for you can't turn back now.
Sierra! Hike! Wow!

I DO not expect the things that I shall set down here to be believed by this generation. My friends, my children, my wife, I have in vain striven to convince. They do not believe: the world jeers. So I commit them to the calm judgment of posterity, in the faith that Science will find correct my analysis of the facts, and that History will vindicate me in the eyes of men.

I, who was the most fortunate of men, am now the most miserable; honored above most of my countrymen, I am now an exile and the most despised. For this I do not blame anyone: my sole purpose here is to show that I am not wilfully that which am. Thus, hopeless of the present, but trusting in the justice of futurity, I compose myself in this obscure hamlet of M—, an exile from my beloved Paris, in the seventieth year of my life—shortly to close, praise be to God—to write the facts concerning my calamitous career. I am a native of Paris, where my father acquired a large fortune as a dealer in oils, and my boyhood was passed in luxury. My brother Francois and I were twins, born upon the anniversary of the massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day, which accounts for my name, Bartholomew Le Doune. We were remarkable for the exact likeness of our faces and figures, a likeness so minute that not even our mother could distinguish us. Our voices were the same, and our habits of mind.

This likeness was noted until the tenth year of our age when, one day, playing boisterously upon a steep stairway at a neighboring house, Francois slipped upon the top step and fell headlong to the stone pavement, suffering a severe concussion of the brain. He lay unconscious in bed for weeks, finally recovering his physical strength, but with a complete loss of his mental powers. From this misfortune he never recovered, and from it sprang all of my miseries.

I can recall vividly the change that my brother's aberration made upon our family life. From being light-hearted and pleasure-loving, fond of the theater and of private entertainment, my parents became the most secluded of recluses. Their handsome establishment in Paris was closed, my father's business was liquidated and turned into investment bonds, and we retired to a quiet suburb of Marseilles, where we were to live in seclusion, and make no effort to become acquainted. Francois, from being the wild leader of our boyish amusements, was now confined carefully to our high-walled garden, under the watchful eye of a nurse, from whose side he was never absent except when when he slept in a closed room to which the only access was through the room of his nurse. He was not violent, but these precautions were thought necessary, as his mind was wholly a blank, and the doctor advised us that the commonest caution, to keep him from straying off, required these arrangements. Francois' body, however, despite the aberration of his mind, grew with his years, and I often shuddered to see him walking in the garden, a duplicate presentment of myself, but shut forever from human sensations and hopes.

Meanwhile, my studies were pursued as most lads are: I had a private tutor; then I was allowed to attend a private school, but only when I was considered to be discreet enough to mind the injunction never to mention the existence of a brother. At length I was regarded as the person of my age, where I attained many honors and graduated with the highest congratulations of my professors. I had fitted myself for the profession of journalism.

From the day following my return from the university I was extraordinarily fortunate in my profession. I had an opportunity at once to join the staff of Le Matin in Paris, and I rose quickly to honor and influence. My career for the next twenty years need only be sketched here: it is—humbly I say it—well enough known that I was the youngest member ever elected to the Chamber of Deputies, and that I founded and edited the journal Tout le Monde.

I married the daughter of the then premier, a very beautiful woman of exceptional intellectual powers. She was my complement in spirit and mind, and that I rose to power with

The Editor of Tout le Monde

redoubled speed because of her influence upon my life, all who know me well know. We were passionate lovers to the end—even now, eager to right myself in the eyes of the world, I can scarcely force my pen to approach that catastrophe.

My parents died, and I was left to provide for my poor brother Francois. I went to the town of M—, and found that the faithful old nurse would still care for him. I supplied her regularly with money, and thrice a year she would write me a note to say that everything was as usual.

My wife grew more dear to me every day of our lives. Our children were born into loving devotion that we both heaped upon them. Our speech in our home was full of endearment: our lives full of happiness.

Then came the change. At my desk in my office one morning a loud scream to pass by my window, the sun to be blotted a moment, and the fresh breath of spring turn dank as a marsh mist. I gasped as one choking; for a moment I fainted. Then I sat at my desk as if nothing had happened. The noise of the street rose as before, familiar; the room was the same, my vision untroubled. I laughed at the moment's delusion and returned to my writing.

The day's work passed as usual. I received a few callers—the premier was among them—I signed a new contract for the next year's supply of print paper. I cleared my desk at four o'clock and bade my secretary good-evening. I remember now that I paused at the street door to wonder where I should go for my dinner, but a cabman hailed me as usual and drove me at once to my residence.

Here when I entered, I was surrounded when a beautiful woman, her face wreathed in smiles of welcoming tenderness, rushed to embrace me, behind her a half dozen children, laughing and shouting. I felt as a man in a dream. Who were these, like a man's wife and children, greeting me, an old bachelor entering his lodgings? Wrath succeeded to wonder. A plot, thought I, a scheme to compromise me, invented by my enemies. I turned to the street, and the cabman's broad smile made suspicion conviction. He, too, was in the conspiracy to trap me, to catch me in a liaison with a demi-monde woman and a pack of hired orphans, masquerading as mistress and children to me. My rage made me desperate: with curses and blows I thrust them out of the entrance, slammed the door on them, and bolted it.

I turned at once to the work of a full investigation, heedless of shouting and weeping outside, from room to room, from cellar to garret. I found no accomplices then, but amazement grew on me at the completeness to which the scheme had been carried. Chests filled with clothing, my bureau well stocked with a woman's articles of toilet, chests stored with finery, veils and gloves in small boxes. Had I not been familiar with each article of furniture and known it was mine, even in minute arrangement, I should have thought in my madness I had invaded a married man's mansion.

Exhausted with excitement and the fatigue of my search, I threw myself on a lounge to compose myself, but the thought that the enemies bent on my destruction might bring officers to ransack the premises for damaging evidence, made me leap to my feet, and I gathered at once the whole mass of stuff from the cabinets and closets and burned it as fast as I could in a fireplace.

In the midst of this labor a maid-servant came in, an absolute stranger, and asked for her mistress. I went beside myself in my anger. Hurling a poker at her I said, "I followed it up with a hand-glass, and that with a glove-box. The creature fled shrieking, and well for her, too, for I would surely have killed if I had caught her. I locked every door now, as an added precaution, and pondered more deeply the delusional ingenuity. I had had perfected every detail of my downfall, even to stocking my house with a spurious set of primed servants.

I must have spent hours at my work of destruction, but when I had finished I prepared to retire with some feeling of security, for not a trace had I left of the plotter's devices. The ashes of dresses and the melted pieces of silver lay at the bottom of scavengers' barrels, and I fell asleep with the thought that I had escaped by a miracle of decision a blow at my fame and my honor.

I slept late the next morning, and arrived at my office an hour later than usual. Imagine my horror, upon opening Le Matin, to find a full record of all that had happened, with my name branded as that of a demonic father who had thrust out his children, a dissolute husband who had driven his wife from her home and had then made advances to his help-less maid-servant. The stupendous atrocity of the article held my eyes to the page as if I were under a hypnotic spell: I read to the end as a bird creeps to the snake's jaws. As in a dream, I picked up Figaro. The same recital of the distorted facts. Le Temps was even more bitter.

I was aghast at the conscienceless mendacity of these papers. What madness of envious folly to slander so openly by a charge so palpably false—to accuse me, a bachelor notoriously averse to the company of women, of being engaged in a scandal and, folly compounded, of being a married man into the bargain.

I have not the heart to recount the events of the year following this disaster—they are miserably familiar in the papers of that time. I thought to say that my enemies compassed my downfall; I was defeated for re-election to the Chamber of Deputies; my financial backers withdrew their support and forced me out of control of Tout le Monde. Turn where I would, I was friendless, slighted, dishonored. At length, broken in spirit and near to insanity, impoverished and in a dejected, I fled to this village of M—, where Francois' faithful old nurse still cared for him. To her I applied and she took me in, the last person on earth who had faith in my honor. She had saved a good deal of my liberal remittances for the care of my brother, and so she has enough money laid by to keep us three in decent fashion, at least, till the end.

Here, in this cloistered garden, I met again my brother Francois. I was shocked and amazed at his manner, in spite of our nurse's warning that he had changed and become in the year just passed. Whereas his mind had been a sheer blank for the last twenty years, he had suddenly taken on a semblance of intelligent life, which was all the more ghastly and pitiful that it was only partial and thus was contrasted with the vacant vacuity of his mind. He talked incessantly of a wife and her children, of the joys of a domestic establishment which, though he described it in faithful detail, he could give no location to. This phantasmagoria especially troubled our nurse, for she could not but believe it was a child's recollection of youth and our happy household of earlier years in Paris, and her tender sympathy was roused at the intimation of a struggle within him to recollect the dear associations of childhood.

I, however, to speak truth, troubled myself but little with him, sure as I was in a mire of despondency and bitter reflection upon the injustice of the public and the infidelity of friends. I should scarcely now be able to recall what he prated but for an event that branded it forever upon my mind.

One night I retired to my room rather early, complaining of an illness that I hoped sleep would recover. I felt a strange weakness of the heart, and experienced alternations of drowsiness and intense flashes of mental illumination. I would start from a doze with my mind burning with pictures of my past life, of debates in the chamber, of triumphs and failures, of men pressing forward to praise a brilliant speech in support of the government, of slanderous tongues wagging at me maliciously.

One midnight our nurse entered my room and cried out that Francois was dying, she had sent for the doctor. I must be up and dressed. I arose quickly and hurriedly dressed; I turned to the door, and there—my hair rose and my blood turned to ice—there, in the doorway, white and leering, with a madman's eyes starting out of their sockets, stood Francois, gibbering and fidgeting. He moved towards me, I standing transfixed and immovable; he crept closer, his breath mingled with mine, his bony arms circled my neck, he shrieked—

I roused an hour later to see my nurse and the doctor bending above me. In a corner sat Francois, the light of intelligence gone again and forever out of his eyes, though his body lived as before. As I roused I cried aloud my dear wife's name, "Marie! Marie!"

THE HAPPY ENDING.

In the preface to his volume of plays St John Hankin, the London playwright who recently committed suicide, took issue with those critics and laymen who complained that his plays did not end happily. Mr. Hankin, in the preface, was explaining why some of the alternative endings suggested by others seemed to him to falsify the facts and to misrepresent life. His viewpoint has an interest in view of his own act.

"In fact, I deny to the whole conception of a 'happy ending' as embodied in these suggested additions to the plays," he wrote. "Theatrical critics and theatrical audiences seem unable to conceive of any other ending to a play save a death or a marriage. But this is a wholly artificial view. In life, anything but death," says one of the characters in 'A Woman of No Importance.' Had he reflected for a moment he would have withdrawn the exception. Philosophically considered death ends nothing, not even an episode, and we really survive everything. What as for marriage, so far from ending anything it is simply the beginning of a fresh set of complications. All 'endings,' in fact, are purely arbitrary, and my play 'endings' are no more arbitrary than anyone else's. There is a sense, of course, in which nothing in life ever 'ends'—just as there is a sense in which nothing in life ever begins. With earth's first clay they did the last man knead, and, we all of us, like Melchizedek, have neither beginning of days nor end of life. We began ages before our individual birth and shall continue ages after our individual death. We exist forever in our causes and our results. But for practical purposes we find it convenient to assume that things do begin and do end at some particular point, and we divide our lives more or less arbitrarily into series of episodes of which we say 'This one began here' and 'That one ended there.'

"That is what I do with my plays. I select an episode in the life of one of my characters or of a group of characters, when something of importance to their future has to be decided, and I ring up my curtain. Having shown how it was decided and why it was so decided, I ring it down again. The episode is over, and with it the play. The end is 'inconclusive' in the sense that it proves nothing. Why should it? It is the dramatist's business to represent life, not to argue about it. It is, however, the 'ending' of that particular episode, and, as such, forms a fitting termination for a play.

"And if my plays 'end' at all they unquestionably 'end happily,' in this respect comparing extremely favorably with the average conventional comedy, which sends you out of the theater with a tolerable certainty that half the marriages which the author has so recklessly arranged during its progress will turn out disastrous failures. My plays, on the contrary, leave their characters at the fall of the curtain with a reasonable prospect of happiness in the future. That is the most that life can do for any of us and the most that can be asked of plays which represent life or try to do so."

THE SENATORIAL RETORT COURTESIES.

Both men are dead, so the story can be told. When the fight was on for the location of the interoceanic canal, and the late Senator Morgan, of Alabama, was making his last stand for the Nicaragua route, the late Senator Hanna was a member of the committee that was examining witnesses.

Senator Morgan was doing the questioning, but the habit of Senator Hanna to throw in a question now and then that turned things upside down and utterly destroyed Senator Morgan's line of procedure.

A man named Menocal was on the stand. Senator Morgan was leading him along when Senator Hanna popped in a question that muzzed things all up.

"As usual," said Senator Morgan, "the Senator from Ohio, by his method of questioning, is trying to delay the proceedings to the extent that will deprive us of a canal at all."

Senator Hanna grew purple in the face. Leaning over, he hammered on the table with his big fist and shouted: "That is a blank lie!"

Menocal, the witness, was alarmed. "Perhaps, gentlemen," he said, "I would better retire."

"Oh, no," replied Morgan, waving his hand, "it is not necessary. This is merely a little interchange of senatorial courtesies, and now, as it is nearing twelve, I suggest we take a recess until to-morrow."—Saturday Evening Post.

MARGINALIA.

Princess Victoria Louise, the only daughter of the Kaiser, is to make her debut this month.

George Randolph, the 18-year old son of a prospector in the interior of northern British Columbia, arrived at Seattle last week and saw a woman for the first time in his life. His mother died during his infancy, and his father never brought him to civilization until he struck rich dirt last spring, and resolved to leave the backwoods. Young Randolph declares women are the most beautiful things he has ever seen.

William Shakespeare is now mayor of Ilkesh-ton, England—relationship unknown.

The Kaiser has ordered that football shall henceforth be part of the training of all German soldiers.

Harriet Beecher Stowe's granddaughter, Hilda Stowe, is an actress. She will appear next season with William Faversham in "Hered."

China is in line for prohibition. Mrs. Catherine Lent Stevenson, president of the World's Woman Christian Temperance Union, is touring in China, where her work is said to be highly approved.

It is rumored in Washington that John Hays Hammond, the mining engineer, is rapidly supplanting Frank Hitchcock in President Taft's regard, and that he will probably soon succeed to Hitchcock's office of post-master-general.

Sir John Thornycroft, an English engineer, has perfected a flat-bottomed motor-boat which makes thirty miles an hour. The boat rises almost out of the water when high speed is attained, almost entirely eliminating the retarding resistance of an ordinary deep-draft craft.

C. E. Parrish, of North Yakima, Wash., is the first man to grow canteloupes in the shape of a cube. This result is achieved by putting the growing melons in troughs that shape them as they enlarge. He declares that the new shape makes the melons more profitable at market.

John Leonard Roeder, said to be the last eye witness of the battle of Waterloo, died two weeks ago today at Quincy, Ill. He lived near the battlefield, and thrilled by the sounds of war, mounted a horse and rode into Blücher's army. He bore the ultimatum from Blücher demanding Napoleon's surrender.

Prof. Simon Newcomb, recognized the world over as the greatest living astronomer, is the first American since Benjamin Franklin to be elected one of the eight foreign associates of the Institute of France. He is an LL. D. of Yale, Harvard, Columbia, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Princeton, Cracow, Johns Hopkins and Toronto.

Mrs. Margaret McCarthy, undoubtedly the oldest woman in New England, if not in the United States, died at her home, in Lewiston, Me., July 10th. Mrs. McCarthy was born near Bantry, Cork, Ireland, May 30, 1797, and was therefore a little over 112 years old. The proof of her birth is ample, as she had in her possession documents that prove it beyond question.

Miss Nora B. Andrews was recently admitted to practice in the United States Circuit Court at Sacramento. Miss Andrews has been employed as a stenographer in the Governor's office. She is the fourth woman admitted to practice in this court. Mrs. Clara Foltz was the first. She was sworn in eighteen years ago. The second was Miss Bird Wilson, who has attained a large and lucrative practice in Nevada. The third was Miss Ross, who though admitted only two years ago is said to be earning a good living.

As a commentary on the long road to success as a dramatist, it is interesting to name over Charles Klein's plays and librettos in the order of their production, and note which are at all familiar to the public to-day. They are "A Mile a Minute," "By Proxy," "A Paltry Million," "The District Attorney," "El Capitán," "Heartsease," "The Charlatan," "The Hon. John Grigsby," "Dr. Belgraff," "A Royal Rogue," "The Cypher Code," "The Auctioneer," "Mr. Pickwick," "Red Feather," "The Music Master," "The Lion and the Mouse," "The Daughters of Men," "The Step-Child," "The Third Degree."

MONA LISA'S SMILE.

A New Explanation of It.

Who ever has seen a print of Leonardo da Vinci's "Mona Lisa" and not been puzzled by her baffling smile? That smile has been a tantalizing mystery all down the centuries since Leonardo painted this portrait of the third wife of his friend Francesco del Giocondo, of Florence. Artists, critics, authors, have given varying interpretations. Still Mona Lisa sits with folded hands and cooing eyes that almost, not quite, look at you, and mouth that nearly smiles.

Francis I, to whom Leonardo sold the picture, punned the name and called it "La Joconde." The title never has seemed wholly to fit. Taine, the great critic, wrote of it, "Mona Lisa's husband was at his third wife, consequently no longer a young man. Putting beside this what we know of Leonardo, his beauty, grace, and glory, her smile may easily rail at her husband and flatter Leonardo, perhaps both at the same time."

Theophile Gautier declared that "she is flirting with the whole world; this strange creature whose look promises unknown joys and whose expression is divinely ironic."

Walter Pater said, "In this beauty the soul appears with all its affections. All the thoughts and experiences of the world have left their traces on it—the animals of Greece, the lubricity of Rome, the reverie of the middle ages, the return to paganism, the sins of the Borgias!"

Ch. Clement: "Thousands of men have listened to the lying words of those perfidious lips. That enchanting smile is implacable; it promises unknown felicities, but it will never give happiness."

A recent explanation offered by Salomon Reinach, curator of the St. Germain Museum, removes the romantic cause of the smile, and substitutes a pathetic cause. According to Reinach, the tradition that Leonardo took four years to paint the portrait is true, but the story that he dragged the work for the sake of the lady's company is false. On the contrary, Reinach proves that Leonardo let the portrait drop repeatedly to take on other work, and the long time between inception and completion was due to the fact that he worked on it only as a side issue.

But the crux of Reinach's explanation is this: Mona Lisa, married in 1495, had no children until 1499. Then came a little daughter. Reinach remembered that one of a librarian of Florence communicated to him, the great French art historian, an extract from the ancient "Libro dei Morti"—records of deaths in Florence. By this it appears that, on June 1, 1501, the little daughter (Fanciulla) of Francesco del Giocondo and his wife, Mona Lisa, was buried from the Church of Santa Maria Novella.

Why, the very costume of Mona Lisa in the picture is heavy mourning. She has no rings, no jewelry. She is in severe black. Her costume is even the heaviest mourning. Reinach proves, by letters of Isabelle d'Este and her mother, written from Florence at exactly this date, that a mantle of Irish lace over a "sombre tinted" corsage might have been worn in full mourning for a sister.

Mona Lisa is in heavy mourning. "What is she smiling at?" Her smile is a constrained smile, the best she can do to please the kindly painter who has "paid singers, musicians and buffoons to entertain her."

TENNYSON'S PENSION.

It was Carlyle who urged Lord Houghton to give Tennyson a pension when the poet was struggling in obscurity. He said to Lord Houghton, "Richard Milnes, when are you going to get that pension for Alfred Tennyson?"

"My dear Carlyle," responded Milnes, "the thing is not so easy as you seem to suppose. What will my constituents say if I do get the pension for Tennyson? They know nothing about him or his poetry, and they will probably think he is some poor relation of my own, and that the whole affair is a job." Solemn and emphatic was Carlyle's response: "Richard Milnes, on the day of judgment, when the Lord asks you why you didn't get that pension for Alfred Tennyson, it will not do to lay the blame on your constituents; it is you that will be damned."

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Some Formative Forces.

No intelligent inquiry can be made into the government of California without a brief review of California in its formative processes. In the beginning it was without form and void and darkness moved on the face of it. Its first settlers were Spaniards, then Mexicans, then a mixture of Spanish, Mexican and Indian. This, of course, leaves the Indian out of consideration as part of the civic life of the commonwealth. He participated mainly as a victim.

The Spanish harked back to the Civil Law which had a Roman and European source. Under their certain customs and land tenures took form that endured and modified to some extent the government of California, but only traces of this influence remain. The Spanish were Americanized or obliterated and their institutions few remembrancers remain.

The first Americans who came here to stay were frontiersmen who came across the plains to find homes in a new country of which they knew little or nothing. They were the true pioneers following where the pioneering instinct led them, and they came prior to the discovery of gold. Among them were some single men who had taken part in army or navy during the Mexican War, more adventurous and less steady and law-abiding.

These pioneers of 1848 required little law, but what they needed they made. The Anglo-Saxon instinct for self-government was strong within them and they carried order and obedience to elemental principles of justice with them wherever they went, but left the individual free to achieve without hindrance and enjoy without envy. This pioneering element made a good nucleus for a government, but it was soon overwhelmed by the rush of "forty-niners."

That rush was made up of all sorts and conditions of men from all parts of the earth. It contained at once the best and the worst that our country had to contribute, together with much of the worst that a little of the best that Australia, New Zealand and the South American west-coast states could spare. All came to get gold if possible and then get out of the country to enjoy it elsewhere.

There was no moral purpose involved in the settlement of California. The one purpose was gain and desire for gain amounted to a hunger. New England was settled that liberty might be enjoyed; Kansas and Nebraska that slavery might be kept out of those commonwealths. The pursuit of gain was secondary to the accomplishment of a moral purpose for which the settlers were willing to make sacrifice if needed. This was not true of California in the beginning and it has rarely been true of it in the course of its development. It has lacked the stimulation of a predominating moral purpose and lacks it now.

Nevertheless, the American element predominated in the rush of forty-nine and succeeding years and that element brought with it the American genius for organizing government and preserving property and order, being especially particular as to property. That was what men came for and unless property could be protected there would be no use in coming, so they protected it. In doing so they held human life cheaper than horse-flesh and much cheaper than gold dust. It was a hard life. Perhaps 10 per cent. of the population was essentially criminal. Under normal social conditions less than 1 per cent. can be charged with criminal tendencies. The battle was fierce and sanguinary, but property triumphed. It was made reasonably secure. The public mind was not bothering much about rights of man, the "higher law," the proprieties of civilized life. It had quite enough in hand to prevent thefts, hold-ups, robberies. The moralities and proprieties could look out for themselves.

The spirit of adventure was abroad and every man was essentially for himself. The Devil could take the hindmost if he had any use for him. The sphere for enterprise was made as open as the physical geography of the state and men were as free to acquire riches as to breathe the air. Each was just as free also to be a fool, and many availed themselves of opportunity to the destruction of their lives and substance in drinking, gambling and licentiousness. All were wide-open and unhindered, save as some community might take upon itself the office of relieving itself of undesirable persons by running them out or stringing them up.

But through all this wide-open and little-restrained era of development there was not lacking a thorough understanding of the essential principles of law and a recognition of the preeminence of law as indispensable to social well-being. These forty-niners knew the value of law and, as we shall see next week, they knew how to go to work to establish social order and security for property. They were instinctively and successfully self-governing. While the material out of which government could be made might have been better if it had been actuated by a moral purpose, it was sufficient and proceeded at once to erect a commonwealth of which no Californian need be very much ashamed. It was sound in principle and it was free.

Tinkering the Laws.

Chief Justice Beatty has given expression to a widely felt disapproval of the legislative tendency to be forever tinkering at the laws. The appellate court no sooner gets a statute twisted into a shape consonant with its view of what that statute ought to have meant than the legislature revises the statute and the appellate court has its work to do over again. This is exasperating.

But are honors so very uneven between court and legislature? The legislature tinkers statutes with the view of making them fit the need of some one special case that has arisen in the practice of some one legislator, leaving the general application of that statute out of consideration. Per contra, the court construes statutes and principles of the law with reference to hypothetical cases that may possibly arise somewhere, sometime, wherein a rule applied for doing justice in the case at bar might possibly work an injustice to the hypothetical party in the hypothetical case. The legislature enacts a statute determined by the narrow vision of a petty, but actual, personality, while the court construes that statute with reference to an almost wholly artificial fabrication of pure reason, suspended in the heavens, bounded by infinity and having about as much relation to mundane things as the philosophy of imagination.

If at the adjournment of each legislature the appellate court finds much of its work knocked into pi, so, at the assembling of each legislature, that body of solons is confronted with the fact of the judicial undoing of the greater part of what it thought it had done at the preceding session. It is the public rather than either of them that merits our sympathy.

The Tariff Commission.

The provision for a permanent tariff commission was stricken out of the Aldrich-Cannon bill. The interests have no hankering for information regarding comparative cost of production at home and abroad. Log-rolling works better. The protection doctrine is sound. No one cares to depart from it and few sane persons will care to inaugurate another tariff revision for a decade, except as exact information may make the modification of schedules a matter of justice and fair play. The need is for exact information for the guidance of Congress and, especially, for the information of the public. This a properly constituted tariff commission can afford. Senator Beveridge reintroduced the measure. It should be fought for and will probably require a ten years' contest to write it into the laws, but it will be worth the effort. Such a contest need not disturb business and probably will not, so business may get as busy as it has a mind to without timidity on this score. If the insurgents will keep up the fight they will get what they go after because it is so manifestly right that the American people will not always consent to go without it.

respectable citizens for purposes of personal revenge by sweeping the city government clean of Spreckels Phelan infection." The foregoing is taken from the Post-Globe, double-headed progeny of Patrick Calhoun, and may be accepted as authoritative. The Post-Globe is advocating the Harriman-Hellman-Herrin-committee-of-twenty-five ticket. The cat was out of the bag long since, but now the bag has been thrown after the cat with a seat for consequences. Whoever doubts the clarity of the issue is a muddlehead not safe to be trusted out of doors after four o'clock p. m. through fear of getting lost in the dark.

A Plague Upon Rodents.

A case of plague has developed in Alameda county contracted from ground squirrels. If some ground squirrels have it, so will others. Kill them. Pass the word along. Kill them, but do not touch them. They are migratory and may easily spread the disease from county to county. It is not something to get frightened over, but rather to be vigilant about. Any relaxation of effort will mean disaster. Keep at it. It is the only way. So long as there is a rat or a ground squirrel in the state, so long will there be some danger from Asiatic plague.

Luther Burbank.

Always beware of a newspaper hero. What is more important still is being wary of becoming a newspaper hero. Newspapers make giants out of pigmies and reduce their giants to pigmies again with a facility equalled only by their irresponsibility. Luther Burbank is a victim of sensation-mongers. Himself a painstaking enthusiast in a most useful department of human service, the press has made another Tesla of him much to his injury. He is not to be blamed for it, nor is he to be blamed for not making-good promises that he has not made, or claims that he has not put forward. He is an inventor rather than a scientist, an experimenter rather than a student. His reputation is fairly secure and will remain so if he can prevent his over zealous newspaper friends from taking him aboard every aeroplane that passes his way. The best thing he can do with his ten volumes of press clippings is to burn them and clip no more.

How to Get Jury.

A Calhoun organ complains that it will require four to eight months to secure a jury for the second trial of Patrick Calhoun, with the probable exhaustion of talesmen to the number of 7,000 to 10,000. There are two ways of avoiding this: Allow Judge Lawlor to select the jury with little or no interference from counsel on either side or take a change of venue to San Joaquin, Sonoma, Stanislaus or some other interior county. Either course would probably bring a jury in a week and an end to the trial in a fortnight more. The defense can ask for a change of venue. The prosecution cannot. It is up to Mr. Calhoun.

End Party in City Elections.

If party responsibility is to be a feature in the government of cities it can only be when voters can be made to stay on their own side of the party fence. It is not true that 5,000 more than half the registered voters in San Francisco are Republicans. It is not true that of 84,571 registered voters in San Francisco only 7,800 are Union Labor party men. The truth is that many thousands of voters who are not Republicans have registered as Republicans for the primary election and will vote their own party ticket in November. How then can the Republican party be responsible for its own candidates? If a party cannot be responsible for its own party candidates how can it be made responsible, as a party, for a partisan administration of affairs? While the state primary law is built on party, and while the charter of San Francisco makes the state laws governing elections its own laws, the people themselves have virtually abolished party in city elections by registering as Republicans when they are not, thus breaking down the integrity of party lines and making party government impossible. But one thing remains to be done. So amend the charter as to obliterate party lines and party responsibility. In short adopt the Berkeley plan. That was a splendid achievement. It makes the first election final as to all candidates who receive a majority of all the vote cast and nominative as to those who do not. It was a great idea and the originator of it deserves to be canonized.

The racing of many ships for American ports with the purpose of getting in before the new tariff went into effect affords a cue to whether or not the new tariff is higher or lower than the old. The importers did not issue wireless orders to crowd on steam and hurry into port in order that they might pay higher rates of duty. Human nature does not squint that way.

Mr. J. Dalzell Brown is a free man. He got off easy. Some taint will stick to him, but he is more worthy of receiving the right hand of fellowship, felon that he was, than many another who has succeeded in using the law to defeat the law and therefore remains unconvinced. Some measure of merit must be accorded the man who takes his medicine.

A PROBLEM OF CONTROL.

Those who take an interest in anything outside of their most immediate personal concerns should read with deepest solicitude our second article, elsewhere in this paper, upon "Hydro-Electric Power Development in California."

The purpose of this series of articles is not to muck-rake, but to set forth the facts as they stand that thoughtful persons may give them heed and, if possible, be prepared to cope with a great public problem when that problem shall present itself in concrete form, as it sometime will unless corporate powers are more adequately tempered with justice than California has, in past years, known them to be.

It is due from us as certainly to honor the promoters of this stupendous power developing and distributing enterprise for their achievement as it was due from us to honor the great builders of the Central Pacific Railroad for theirs; and yet the builders of that railroad so far belied their greatness as to debauch this commonwealth to its ineradicable hurt. Their greed proved so insatiable that, for more than a third of a century, they employed the great railroad system they had created in so raiding the industries of the people as to gather into their own coffers the net profits of the industry of this coast.

The people of California essayed to control, in the public interest, this vast aggregation of corporate power, with the result that the mechanism of control which the people set up was itself subjected to corporate control and has remained so subject to this day. In short the attempt of the people to control this giant of their own permissive creation resulted in the subjugation of the people themselves to the control of this giant. It made of California a conquered province the suzerainty of which was sold with the corporate stock to those corporations as a usufruct belonging therewith and conveyed in seeming perpetuity to the Harriman interests.

A look at the map accompanying our article will make it clear that we have now created a second giant, not wholly unrelated to the first, and have given it power, if so minded, to take usurious toll from every person and every industry living in the heart of California, and it can be a matter of no great difficulty to so extend this unified control as to bring under tribute every household, and every industry, in the state. Whoever furnishes us light and power stands in as close a relation to our necessities as do those trustful corporations that furnish us with sugar and oil, bread and meat. There is no escaping them.

Nor can we look to competition for deliverance, as we should not. To duplicate all the plants and distribution lines of the Pacific Gas and Electric company would be an unpardonable economic extravagance, unless done to deliver the people out of bondage, and that would be of questionable efficacy. Nor can our oil fields save us, for electric energy can be developed in our mountains and transmitted to our oil fields and there put oil-electric generating plants out of commission because cheaper.

Except for extortionate demands for gas in San Francisco there is now no public clamor against this great corporation for overcharging. That does not rob the subject of present interest, for no one can foreknow what day pressure will be put upon consumers to their hurt. The efforts heretofore made to reduce corporate giants to public control in the interests of justice have resulted only in greater injustice, in debauching representative bodies and corrupting courts. The outlook is not promising. The task may prove beyond the powers of a self-governing people. It is not impossible that we are spawning an incorporated plutocracy that will destroy free institutions and reduce American manhood to industrial and political helotism; but the tight

To Republicans of San Francisco.

Gentlemen: Several thousand voters have registered as Republicans who are not Republicans. They purpose to vote a Republican primary ticket to disgrace the party and not to exalt it. Not a man of them will vote for the nomination of Byron Mauzy or Percy Long or the supervisory candidates named by the League of Independent Republican Clubs. They will vote for the Herrin-Hellman-Calhoun clan from start to finish. There is only one way for you to avert this disgrace to your party and this degradation of your city and that is to vote at the coming primary election, vote right and get some negligent Republican friend to do likewise. It is the apathy of decent voters that enables scoundrelism to thrive.

Gifford Pinchot.

Here is a man of fortune so ample that he can give his life to the work that calls him to it without depriving himself or his family of any good thing except peace and quietude in the place of struggle against those predatory interests that would ruin the world without compunction if it promised to pay a good percentage in cash on the initial investment. The unknowing and the unrealizing call him a faddist, whereas he is only an idealist with a very practical and sane streak running all through him. The predatory interests would be wonderfully glad to see him cast out of the Taft administration neck and heels, but Taft is no bourgeois. Pinchot will stay put. The ovation tendered him at Spokane was right well deserved. No American of his time will leave a stronger imprint upon his country's fortune than Gifford Pinchot.

A Chance for Private Enterprise.

The greater part of what Secretary Ballinger reported to have said at Spokane was eminently sound. It is not proper for the national government to enter into competition with private or associated capital in the development of irrigation or other enterprises. The largest latitude consistent with justice should be afforded private and associated enterprise and the profits allowable should be as ample. Than this there is no other hope for those who have not executive capacity in sufficient degree to permit them to become their own employers, and fifteen out of every sixteen persons born into the world are doomed by nature to this perpetually dependent class.

But somehow Society must hold a restrain-ing hand upon enterprise to prevent its transformation into rapacity. The transition is easy. It is frequent. It is all but universal with those who become possessed of the power to cinch the consumer of a product held in control. We learn this every time we go to market. It is a lesson that is repeated in ten thousand forms every day in the year.

Those who oppose the policy of Ballinger do not oppose a free field and a broad opportunity for private enterprise to do its best. All they do oppose is unlimited power of organized rapacity to do its worst. Ballinger would let loose the restraining hand of government over enterprise, thus leaving capital free to be as rapacious as enterprising. Pinchot and Pardee would have Uncle Sam hold the final authority in his own hands to guard against accidents. In this Pinchot and Pardee are everlastingly right and Ballinger eternally wrong.

Placing-Out.

Of all forms of charitable work there is not another requiring so much finesse, such splendid endowments of perception, knowledge of character, discrimination, tact, as the placing of dependent children in homes other than their own to be reared as own children. Not one person in a thousand is by nature fit to undertake that task, and yet many do undertake it who have but one qualification for it, that of a sincere desire to be useful and—to find something useful to do by which a living may be eked out.

Every dependent child is a ward of the state, yet California advocates its wardship in favor, mainly, of broken down clergymen who can no longer hold a pastorate because too dead to the world to be listened to with patience. They mean well, but they don't know people for what they are. They have no tact, no discernment, and mighty little fairness.

It is better, infinitely better, that the state should thus abdicate this function than that the well-being of children should be made the sport of partisan politics, which would not hesitate to make the misery of infancy spoil of victory. But the State Board of Charities and Corrections should be beyond the spoil of politics, and with anyone but a Gillett in the gubernatorial chair it would be. That board and its agents should be made responsible for the well-being of every dependent child in California and if the disclosures regarding the Rev. H. W. Brayton, and his placing of children in abominable places, can contribute to that end he will not have lived and wrought in vain. He may mean well, but he does ill, and there is scarcely a charity worker in California who is not in a position to testify to that effect. In no department of public endeavor is there greater need for reform and revision of method than in dealing with dependent childhood in California, and placing-out lies at the root of the whole matter.

Bradbury cries for mercy on the ground that, although he did perjure himself he did not mean to. How refreshing it would be if some malefactor of great wealth would express contrition for his sin instead of sorrow for himself! Bradbury's deepest iniquity was not his commission of perjury. It was trying to prevent his debtor raising money to redeem his property from out Bradbury's greedy hands, an offense that the law cannot reach, except as a circumstance to be considered in fixing punishment for an offense it can reach.

Harry Thaw is not out of limbo yet, but then his mother's money probably isn't all gone. A different result might have been obtained this time had not District Attorney Jerome made the case his special business. Moreover, a decree of insanity does not stand alone.

Some Differences.

Gradually the character of William Howard Taft, as President, is unfolding itself. He is not a Roosevelt. He will not cross any bridge until he gets to it. Roosevelt would cross the bridge first if he could get there. Taft is by nature indolent and will tackle no task that has not been set for him if he can avoid it. Roosevelt was strenuously on the lookout for something that needed to be done and was ready to do it as soon as he found it. Taft saving the big stick to good effect at the end of the tariff controversy, Roosevelt would have swung it to better effect at the other end of that controversy, if not at both ends. But the most important difference between the two executives is that Taft will not venture to perform any executive act, or do any thing, unless he can find for it a clear and affirmative warrant of law. Roosevelt would do, and undertake to do, anything that he believed the good of the nation required him to do if the law did not positively prohibit such act. In fine, Taft is governed by the Jeffersonian principle of strict construction. Roosevelt ordered his policy in accordance with the Marshall doctrine of implied powers as enlarged by Lincoln in the doctrine that the nation cannot have contemplated its own destruction, and therefore gave him needful power to save it from destruction. If the Republican party splits under Taft's administration it is likely to be along that line of cleavage. It does not follow that Taft will be a reactionary, but only that he will not be a progressive. He holds to the letter of the law, but "the letter killeth while the spirit maketh alive."

Is Ballinger Bad?

Things leak. Secretary R. A. Ballinger had been not many weeks in office before it began to be whispered abroad that he was no Garfield. The first hard work he did was to undo the last hard work that Theodore Roosevelt and former Secretary Garfield did in the way of preventing the rebelling up, in perpetuity, of power sites, water rights and rights of way of vast value. President Taft came to the rescue as soon as he could, but the mischief had been done and that mischief is likely to prove irretrievable. The Ballinger contention is that his department can only do what the law specifically authorizes to be done and not what it merely does not forbid doing. In other words, he limits his own powers for conserving the public interest to the last degree, whereas, that those interests might be conserved, Secretary Garfield construed his powers with as broad a liberality as possible. The Ballinger policy would not have saved the nation from '61 to '65. The Garfield policy did save it. The Ballinger policy will convey the wealth of the nation into the hands of predatory interests that are fast reducing the nation to a species of peonage. As Gifford Pinchot well said at Spokane, "Rigid construction of the law works for the men who can hire the best lawyers, and who have sources of influence in law-making." Furthermore, the attitude of Ballinger toward Hetch-Hetchy implies that the Spring Valley Water company is not without influence at his court. Ballinger may not be bad. Circumstances may have conspired to do him wrong, but if there be a man in public life to-day who will bear watching better than any other it is Secretary of the Interior R. A. Ballinger.

The Smith Bill.

Elsewhere in this issue we print in full the bill which Representative S. C. Smith introduced in the House with the purpose of transferring jurisdiction over rights of way, power and reservoir sites, on all government lands except national parks and military and Indian reservations, to the several states to be used for industrial purposes. We accompany this bill with his brief in its favor for the further information of the reader.

A bill lacks very much of being a law, but an incongruous condition exists and something is likely to be done about it sooner or later. It is imperative that the right thing, and not the wrong one, be done. Has Mr. Smith proposed the right thing? We think not.

The states in which are located the greatest possibilities of hydro-electric development are those wherein are located the bulk of government lands and national forest reservations. Those states, with scarcely an exception, are politically in the hands of the predatory interests. The status of California is fairly typical. It is a political dependency of the Harriman interests and those interests can command such legislation as they desire and such interpretation of that legislation by the courts as seemeth to them good. Relinquish these powers to the states and the "tail will go with the hide," so far as public control of water powers is concerned. They will be alienated in perpetuity.

With a Ballinger as Secretary of the Interior, the public may not fare better with these matters in national control, but we cannot fare worse. These tremendous interests must not be at the mercy of the whim or caprice of a Ballinger or even of a Garfield or a Pinchot, and a way will be found for reducing control of privileges of vast value and public importance to certainty and justice. The public weal demands the largest liberty of action on the part of private and associate enterprise consistent with public safety, but somewhere there must be a reserve power to prevent extortion, or the ownership of these great utilities will ultimately involve a more oppressive exploitation of the masses than has ever yet been accomplished through tariffs, transportation charges, Standard Oil, the sugar and meat trusts, combined.

Mr. Smith's remedy would be good if the state could be trusted. It cannot.

George C. Pardee.

Here is a man who promises to be tremendously useful to the state that gave him birth and honored him by making him, for four years, its executive. That satisfied his political ambitions. Possessed of a comfortable fortune that enables him to command considerable leisure, and beholden to no one, he is free to give time and attention to public affairs from pure disinterestedness. The good that such a man so situated can do is incalculable. Therefore we find him in the fight for the preservation of the "white meat" from corporate spoliation along the Oakland water front. This week he is up at Spokane fighting the Ballingerization of the sources of water power of half a continent. He is fighting a predatory combination that seeks to sequester for private advantage for all time a public wealth of incalculable value. A man of exceptional ability and unswerving integrity, with the courage of his convictions and no purpose except to advance the general welfare, he needs only to have his health and life spared to make him of more use to California as one of its first citizens than he could possibly be as governor or United States Senator. There is no measuring the potentiality of an unselfish purpose animating a man of capacity.

Mr. Crocker's assertion that he is a free man and bondswoman to no one will remind Republicans of a candidate for governor who went up and down California declaring with profoundest unction that he was "no man's man," but there is not a Republican in California who does not now know that that wasn't so. If the public wants to know whether or not a candidate is as free as he pretends the safest way is to see who is behind him. The associated villainies generally know their man.

The Deeper Significance of Living

At Santa Cruz a clergyman recently raked the churches' fore and aft and the clergy up one side and down the other, after which he sank into his seat much exhausted in vitality but strengthened in the consciousness of having performed a most unpleasant, public service. Nothing easier.

When one compares the church with the ideal bride of the Christ the comparison is unfortunate for the church. Its short-coming is awful. But when one compares the church with the bawdy house and the saloon, or even with a legislature, the church shines like a silvery moon set over against a cess-pool.

There is cowardice in the pulpits and intolerance in the pews. It is equally true that there is intolerance in the pulpit and cowardice in the pews, and in both pulpit and pews there is stolid density of mind. But through the stained glass windows the light shines into the faces of those in pew and pulpit, too. Both see as through a glass darkly, but they do catch glimpses of better things than the daily grind enforced either by necessity or by greed.

Our reverend friend complained that institutionalism does not rise to the requirements of our time. Of course not. It never did. Christ was no institution. He was a personality, and nothing but a personality ever did rise to the requirements of any time. An institution is a machine. A church is an institution. Therefore a church is a machine. A machine is an implement used for the attainment of some desired end. A plow is dragged at the heels of horses which go ahead and tug and strain to pull the plow after them. The church is drawn in the same way by those personalities that have the power of leadership. But no one ever saw a plow slide backwards and no one ever saw the church do that either. It holds all ground it sound, if it does not gain ground as rapidly as we should like to see it.

It is not as difficult to point out a hundred faults in a church as to overcome one of them. The Moses the church is looking for is not he who can tell it of its faults, but he who can lead it out of the wilderness.

Any one of a hundred persons can walk the length of a street and out of the end in half a minute, but it will take several minutes for the procession of a hundred persons to do it. A church is a body of people. Its ability to move is due to its leadership, not to its innate power of locomotion. Sometimes it loses sight of its leadership and marks time, and then some spiritual enthusiast comes that way, turns on the light and the church, again catching sight of its leadership, moves on to a more splendid achievement in the cause of humanity.

It is true enough that the church does not lead all individuals toward a higher life and better things, but it leads all other organizations. As a power for good there is no other organization that can compare with it. Let us not lose faith in the church because it can not move with the facility of an individual. Let us not despair of it because there are those on ahead clearing the way and calling to it to come up higher in temperance, in charity, in social regeneration. If there were none on ahead then might we despair.

An army without an advance guard would blunder into an ambush, but an advance guard would be of little avail without an army. Our pioneers in spiritual and moral advancement would live to little purpose if there were not a great, powerful, albeit slow-moving, church to camp tonight where the advance camped last night and to support every forward movement with an impregnable front.

That is what the church does. It is little enough that the world would be doing without it.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

The Schools and Forestry.

Gifford Pinchot, who, as United States Forester, is doing work of notable value to the public, has addressed an invitation to the heads of all universities, colleges and schools in which technical forestry is taught, to be represented at the conference on education in forestry which is to be held in Washington next December. In his letter Mr. Pinchot says that he believes a conference thus constituted "might be of great value to the general progress of forestry in the United States, as well as to the institutions which teach forestry, and to the Forest Service, which employs so many of their graduates, and which is vitally interested in the best training of foresters." Speaking of the ends to be attained by such a conference, he says that it "might well consider the objects and methods of forest instruction, the organization and standards of educational work in the field of forestry, the co-ordination of the work of different institutions, and the needs of the Forest Service and other employers of forest graduates." It is gratifying to add that nearly all of our educational institutions are accepting the invitation and enthusiastically supporting the plan it outlines.

Coal Alaska's Greatest Wealth.

We have so long accustomed ourselves to thinking of Alaska as a sort of gold mine possessed by the United States that it is difficult to realize that gold, in all probability, is a long way from being its utmost wealth. Yet there is much evidence that the greatest riches to come from Alaska will be found, not in yellow mineral, but in black; that is, in coal. Already a surveyed area of about 100 square miles is known to be underlain with both anthracite and bituminous coal. This is an area more than 50 per cent. greater than that of the coal districts of Pennsylvania. It is estimated that it will yield about 6,000,000,000 tons of coal, which, at a dollar a ton, would be forty times as valuable as the entire gold output of Alaska to the present time. As for the quality of this coal, experts report that it is by far the best obtainable on this slope, and, further, that the entire Pacific Coast eventually must look to these lands bordering on the Arctic circle for the greater part of its coal supply. Evidently Secretary Seward builded better than he knew when he prevailed on Uncle Sam to invest $7,200,000 in Alaska.

Armor Plate That Stands the Test.

The twin sciences of killing man and preventing him killing heretofore have gone pretty well hand in hand. Did one inventor manufacture an explosive more ingeniously deadly than any previously known, almost immediately another inventor stepped to the front with a device for utilizing the explosive effect of that explosive. And so the merry competition has continued, with odds, it must regretfully be admitted, in favor of man-slaughtering devices, which have continued to kill quite regardless of preventatives. Just at this moment, however, it is pleasant to record that the preventers are having an inning. A young Canadian inventor named Harold A. Richardson has devised an improved process for manufacturing armor plate which is said to be far more effective than anything hitherto known. The inventor claims that it is 125 per cent. stronger than the best armor plate heretofore used, and, whether or not this be so, it is certain that it has withstood some extraordinary tests. For instance, from a distance of but 120 feet, an armor-piercing capped shell was fired from a 9.2 inch gun at a six-inch plate. Plate heretofore used would have endured such a test, but in this test the plate was unharmed, while the shell was shattered into fragments. The inventor intends to give Great Britain the sole benefit of his process.

Taking the Census in Mexico.

Mexicans are Mexicans, and their average attainment in literacy and enlightenment—be it regretfully written—is not high. A notion is prevalent among vast numbers of them that a governmental census is a dark and devious device for securing recruits for the army, and, holding this view, they naturally are "ferminst" the census. As a result, the taking of a census among our neighbors to the south of us is both a difficult and delicate operation, and a large amount of finesse is required to make a success of the business. Of what super-quality this finesse must be is illustrated by the fact that Mexico's ablest statesmen are employed in securing the census. For example, in the census now about to be undertaken down there, President Diaz personally is to take that of the neighborhood where he lives, members of his cabinet will take it in the vicinity of their own households, the Archbishop of Mexico will take it in his own quarter, and effort will be made thus to employ prominent citizens in general. It sounds strange—think of President Taft and the members of his cabinet taking the census in the localities where they reside!—but different conditions demand different treatment, and probably Mexican statesmen are doing that which they feel must be done.

The Simple Life to the Limit.

Speaking of the simple life—and almost everybody speaks of it more or less in these days—the people of the island of St. Kilda, in the Hebrides, come nearer to enjoying the real thing than almost anyone else of whom one might read. There are seventy-two of these people, unless one or more of them have died since the yearly steamer from Glasgow visited them last May, and year in and year out, decade in and decade out, this number scarcely varies. Within the last sixty years but three of the residents have permanently left the island. Here, on nineteen square miles of rock and soil, these people live while generation succeeds generation, and the great and exciting event of the year is the arrival of the steamer which carries to market the tweed they manufacture. The women spin the wool obtained from the sheep, and the men weave it. The men are both tailors and dressmakers for the population, manufacturing the clothing of the women, as well as their own. Necessarily they live under a system of communism. Certainly it is the simple life they live, but so is that of a clam.

Belshazzar's Palace Being Excavated.

Bible students, as well as those who are not students but merely sometime readers, will be interested in the excavations which Germans now are making in that palace in which, according to the old book, the "mense uparising" of the Lord appeared unto Belshazzar. The site of the palace lies beneath a great mound, known to modern Arabs as El Kasr, which, being interpreted, is The Castle, on the Mesopotamian plain. The work of excavation will require many years, but already the great irregular inclosure of the palace has been laid bare. One of the walls thus exhumed is more than seventy-two feet in thickness, and it is illustrative of the immensity of the proportions on which the entire structure was built. In the dry soil of Mesopotamia the brick of which the city was constructed have been little injured, and it is believed that much of deep interest to archaeologists will there be unearthed.

Man as an Earth-Burrower.

Man is not classed among earth-burrowers, but he does considerable burrowing nevertheless, and the figures in connection with the London subway system illustrate the fact. There now underlie the great city more than 150 miles of subways, nearly all in operation, and all soon to be so. By the use of transfers a person could travel something like a hundred miles (say, as far as from San Francisco to San Jose and return) underground on one fare. The longest of these subterranean railroads is the Metropolitan line, which is seventy-one miles in length; the next is the Metropolitan District, with twenty-eight miles, and from these they decrease in length to the shortest, which is the Waterloo and City line, with its two miles of subway. The total authorized capital of the nine companies which own and operate the subways is about $305,000,000.

By Airship to the North Pole.

That most indefatigable of monarchs, the German Kaiser, is supporting Count von Zeppelin in his latest project, and it now appears probable that an attempt soon will be made to reach the North Pole by the airship route. To this end a dirigible balloon larger than any heretofore built by the count will immediately be constructed. Professor von Hergesell, of wide reputation as an aerologist, will accompany von Zeppelin in his enterprise. The permanent base for the expedition will be at Cross bay on the west coast of Spitzbergen, and all next summer will be devoted to short trips for the purpose of gathering the data essential to success, if success be attainable. From Cross bay to the pole is about 800 miles, and von Zeppelin already has shown himself capable of negotiating this distance in his dirigible. Whether he will be able to negotiate that distance and return remains to be seen. It is presumed that the effort will be made in the summer of 1911, and, doubtful as the result seems, the venture is believed by many to have in it more of the elements of success than any expedition which heretofore has been undertaken to the pole.

WORTH KNOWING.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Perry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge a clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a square deal plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.

Hugo's "Les Misérables."

Someone has said that Victor Hugo's "Les Misérables" is "the greatest thing done for democracy in modern times."

That is true, in a sense, but it is only a part of the many-faceted brilliancy of the book. It would be as true to say that it is the greatest plea for humanitarian treatment of criminal offenders; or that it is the greatest popular treatise of scientific sewage disposal; or that it is the most vivid picture of the French Revolution and the fall of Napoleon; or that it is the most powerful drama of modern times.

Dozens of later dramatists have borrowed plots from the incidents of "Les Misérables." It is a storehouse of dramatic characters and episodes. The nun illustrating the sublimity of a lie; the French color sergeant illustrating the heroism of an obscenity; Gavroche illustrating the heroic potentialities of the street gamin; Valjean illustrating the triumph of the human soul over injustice; picture after picture of domestic felicity, industrial misery, the inexorable of the law, escapes, capture, births, deaths, battles, barricades, cavalry charges. Destiny at odds with the Man of Destiny, God called from heaven to dispossess Napoleon from his too-great power, Nature an accessory to the affairs of men—how the panorama shifts and darkens, lights and fades.

And lifting above the swirling stream of struggling humanity, the head of Jean Valjean rises in serenity, growing from the savage peasant criminal to a character nearest like to Christ's of any character in history or fiction in modern days. No more ennobling or inspiring or human figure appears in modern literature.

Strange anomaly, that Hugo, fiery, rhetorical, melodramatic, theatrical, contentious, ungovernable, should have evolved the portrait of such a character, who is the apotheosis of patience and long-suffering. The book itself reflects Hugo's versatile and tumultuous soul; Valjean described by Hugo is a paradox, but the world is richer for it by the most absorbing story in any modern tongue.

THE RETURNING PAMPHLETEER.

Are we about to witness the return of the literary pamphleteer? We had supposed that the stupendous exploitation of periodicals had buried this species forever by making the circulation of writers' eccentric ideas so easy that the pamphlet would be an expensive and inefficient medium by comparison.

But some signs seem to point to a revival of pamphleteering. In the first place, publishers the world over, beginning to realize that the present relatively expensive books will soon be replaced by half-dollar first editions of even high-grade novels. If this fashion comes into vogue, it is likely that the public taste will be educated back down to an appetite for good reading in unpretentious bindings, and from that taste the descent is easy to a popularization of ten-cent or twenty-five cent paper-back literature. Once this is accomplished, the public may expect to see the pamphleteer grasping his opportunity, and loading the bookstores with his facile expressions of urbane ideas.

Other signs point towards this catastrophe. Our best writers are showing an eagerness to air their theories and convictions in this way. Some time ago, Owen Wister, roused by the assaults of the simplified spellers upon the ancient incommunicabilities of our spelling, rushed to the rescue of the established forms by publishing a pamphlet entitled "How Doth the Simple Spelling Bee." It was good reading, and aside from that Mr. Wister's prestige would have secured to get it published in some periodical where its circulation would have been a thousand times greater than in pamphlet form; so it is hard to understand why he preferred to publish it as a book where the obvious devices of big type and wide margins scarcely sufficed to disguise its pamphlet size, form and substance.

Mark Twain, too, has caught the spirit of the pamphleteer. His attack on the identity of Shakespeare as the author of the plays is published as a book, but it is a book subject to the same comments as Mr. Wister's. It is bald, pamphleteering, literary controversy palmed off at a high price, which should have been sold in paper-backs at ten cents a bushel.

Heaven forbid that we should be entering upon a literary epoch similar to Milton's day, when the best writers shall waste, in writing controversial trash, the time they might spend upon developing the uncritical productive faculty for the enjoyment of the public.

CRITICS' ERA OF GOOD FEELING.

If a critic of a hundred years ago could return to earth to-day he would be stupefied by the book reviews that appear in modern periodicals. His ancient slashing criticism has disappeared; a modern Poe calling a modern Longfellow a milkop is unlikely; Griswold calling Poe a thief and a drunkard, impossible; delicate and inoffensive Keats buried under an avalanche of abuse, unthinkable. The old-time critic carried an ax in one hand and a syrup pitcher in the other, and whomsoever he did not slaughter he drowned in a sickening bath; but the slaughter was the more popular treatment.

But behold to-day the gentle crew of critics, mildly laudatory of everything that issues from the press. Since heaven's first harmonic sound was heard there has been no such unanimity of men or angels as the current chorus of critical praise. The newspaper reviews praise everything that comes to them, with rare exceptions, and even those whom they damn they partly praise. Magazines and weeklies refuse to publish reviews of books that they cannot commend. Even satirical Life, true to its anti-universalist creed, flays only when advertisements are administered to the victim.

Much of this seeming good-will is, we suspect, sheer indolence on the reviewer's part. Either that, or utter weariness; for the torrential flood of publications coming to his desk these days is enough to drown any such active passion as inspired the old reviewer.

Another matter is the commercial side of book reviewing. Publishers advertise; they dislike unfriendly criticism; the counting-room may have influence that reaches the reviewer's desk.

Still another matter is the publicity agent of the publisher. If you review books, you receive favorable reviews of nearly every book as soon as it is published, and if you are lazy, the shears and paste will save you a half-day's work. It is violating no confidence to say that more than half the book reviews we see in the daily papers are written in the offices of the publishers.

Good will in modern criticism, though thus partially explained, may not be such a bad thing. Perhaps good-will, even of this sort, encourages good writers. Or, maybe, the old savage critic spurred better results out of his friends, or enemies, the authors. Or—and we suspect more truth of this than either—perhaps the author is not, nor ever was, helped or hindered by the critics, only pleased or hurt. As for the public, publishers know that in the long run, what sells a book is a friend's recommendation to a friend, by word of mouth. The hand-me-down criticisms are balloons to hoist a book to enough ready-made success to make a quick profit. Genuine successes are their own reward to author, publisher, and public.

Mrs. Annie Besant, president of the Theosophical Society, in an interview upon her recent arrival in New York, declared that California has a larger number of clairvoyants than any other place in the world. Mrs. Besant's home is in India, but she considers the climate of California even more favorable to clairvoyance, though what the connection is she did not attempt to explain.

CALIFORNIA POET'S CORNER.

"His name does write on walls," this epitaph, which was one of the world's great poets proposed for himself, was not appropriate to him, and neither does it befit those hunter-bards who, dying young, have left behind them even a few lines worthy of being preserved. One such was Charles Philip Nettleton, a young Californian, whose poems, after his premature death, a few years since, were collected in a small volume, "Glimpses." Perhaps the most notable of these poems is in the Emersonian style and would be not unworthy of the Concord sage if he had written it.

GLIMPSES.

By Charles Philip Nettleton.

Set before thy high-born soul
Nothing smaller than the Whole.
Earth is great but thou art greater.
Would'st thou be her self-translator?

Pass behind her veiled face:
Hidden deeply lies the grace
Thou art kin to, waiting thee,—
Grace of love and purity.
Parts are parts but thou art one;
Satisfy thyself with none.
When thy high soul, infinite,
Throbbing, bounding, will admit
Songs of beauty from all spheres,
All eternity's full years,
And the Master!

Good is one,
Soul of beauty and bright sun
For thy thought and agony;
Come thou home, mortality!
Child, who vivid vision sees
Of pain's possibilities,
Visions mirrored from the past,
Striking pale the face agast,
Thinkest thou that for thee
God ordained a public?
Brother, love! Great love within Killeth pain and covereth sin.

All things call thee to rejoice;
Hast thou heard their still, sweet voice?
Be their meaning well inferred,
For these voices are as seeds;
Follow, if thou wouldst have bread,
Deeper, deeper than all creeds,
Broader far than sages thought,
Higher, holier than have sung
Poets, by their rapture taught,
Is the soul that still is young
After speech has set a bound—
Young, but old from wandering.

Nature's mountain-tops await,
Half-explored, her equal mate;
Glories infinite surround
Each and all; they cannot bring Light to those who love the part
More than God's great circled Heart.
Nature, Beauty, Good, enthroned
High the soul that knows its own.

CURIOSITIES OF LITERATURE.

The Diary of Samuel Sewell.

Samuel Sewell was a member of the governor's council of the colony of Massachusetts from 1690 to 1722, a judge of probate in 1692-1718, and chief justice in 1718-1725. He sentenced nineteen persons to death during the "witchcraft" delusion, but afterwards became convinced of the wrong done by his court and manfully assumed most of the blame for it. The extracts that follow are from his Diary.

During a voyage to England in 1688:
"November 27—Ate my wife's pastry, the remembrance of whom is ready to cut me to the heart.

"December 7—Breakfast on one of my wife's plum cakes. Dreamed much of my last night. Gave me a piece of cake for Hannah Kett; was in plain dress and white apron."

During the witchcraft agitation:
"Monday, Sept. 19, 1662—About noon at Salem. Giles Cory was pressed to death for standing mute."

On Feb. 8, 1714:
"Sloop run away with boy and whale out of a good harbor at the Cape. How surprisingly uncertain our enjoyments in this world are."

A HAZARD OF FAITH

By ARTHUR J. PILLSBURY.

Major C. W. Bourne.

of indignation that invites exaggeration, yet it misses the truth by far fewer than forty rows of apple trees.

Nevertheless, there is need for orphanages and the right sort of an orphanage can do a splendid work for neglected childhood. The Children's Industrial Farm, at Lytton Springs, is, or wants to become, the right sort of an orphanage. It is a Salvation Army institution and the spirit of the Army is in it and upon it. It is trying to set tumbled-over humanity upright upon its two pins so that it can stand alone.

There is many a benevolence which, if probed to its core, will disclose a job as its essential factor. If it were not for the job afforded the benevolence would not be called into being. That is not true of this one. Here is the scale of salaries: Major W. Bourne, head of the institution and his wife, head matron, receive, aside from their rent and food, ten dollars per week for their joint efforts, out of which they are expected to clothe themselves and their two children, pay for all their vacations, luxuries and gayeties and lay up that competence for old age which occupies the little divided attention of all the rest of us. Adjutant Wilson, assistant matron, receives $3 per week. Captain Gilmore, who has charge of the babies, receives $2.50; Captain Mechanic and instructor in mechanics, $2.50; Capt. C. A. Bryan, the solicitor commands the highest salary in the schedule, $9 per week. It should be borne in mind that all of these people are more than usually capable, and could command good salaries if they were to work in productive enterprises. They are doing the work they have in hand solely because of the Salvation Army spirit that gives to their lives the energizing impulse. There are no jobs lurking in this charity. The charitably disposed need feel no hesitation on that score.

The pressure of its social rehabilitation work bearing heavily upon it, the Salvation Army made a characteristic hazard of faith and bought, on credit, the old, unprofitable but picturesque and valuable Lytton Springs health resort in Sonoma county above Healdsburg from which it is distant four miles. There were buildings enough to serve the purpose and 638 acres of land of varying quality. Anyhow it was a good place for children and children and the nucleus of an orphanage started elsewhere was transferred to this place. Here are rolling hills and little valleys, meadow and pasture, a small vineyard and orchard, some tillable land and as much of God's out-of-doors as pent-up childhood can require.

Here are some two hundred children of both sexes and all ages, all colors and races, dispositions and previous environments, having but a simple bond of union, an all-pervading dependency and urgent need to be brought up to usefulness and a moral life. It is a great big family to be fathered and mothered, made to behave and sent to school, taught how to work and not to be afraid of work, fed with substantial, kept good and healthy, associated with live things and learn to love them, and permitted to have things that are their own by right of having earned them. It costs $15 per month on an average to maintain each inmate.

The farm itself, with the help of the children, contributes enough to bring this cost down to $12 per month. This difference is a fund from which children may be paid according to their ability to earn. Two have earned and bought horses of their own, two others cows, some calves, pigs, ducks, and chickens. Their earnings are expended for extra clothing, band instruments, some thing of desire that stimulates industry. If nothing else, then a savings bank account.

There are on the grounds schools with four teachers. A few of the eldest children go to the high school at Healdsburg where, last year, one was editor of the school paper although in the junior class. The records made in these schools have been uniformly good and now a teacher of mechanics is being added to the advantage of the institution. Institutionalism is reduced to a minimum. This summer the boys, with no man over them, cut, cured and stowed away hay from 100 acres. They milk and care for thirty-five cows and hustle out in the morning before daybreak without being driven.

But it is hard work, all killing hard work, and Mrs. Bourne has been so nearly crushed under it that she is now suffering from nervous prostration. She has hazarded her life on this hazard of faith, and it does seem to all of them that, in view of the unselfish devotion to the work in hand, there should be enough who can and will help them to procure help enough so that the children in their custody need not be neglected and that the staff officers need not break themselves down and suffer invalidism. Mrs. Alice Bourne is a capable woman, better able to stand hard knocks than most of her sex, but she has seen twenty years of service in the army and, veteran though she is, the mothering of two hundred children from babyhood to adolescence, has proven too great a task for her. Help is wanted and money to pay it with.

Half the inmates of this orphanage go back to their own homes in two or three years. The story of childhood dependency is a story of broken homes. It is a drunken father or a renegade, now and again a bad mother, that breaks up the home. Sometimes death does it. Whatever the cause the surviving parent, by being tided over a period of adversity, makes another home somehow and gets the children together again. It is this bridging over from what Jack London calls "the thing" to getting the crushed upon their feet again that gives an orphanage its best right to exist. It saves the family tie, without which society is a herd, a band of pariah dogs, and makes the most of that tie.

This is not written with the view of encouraging the sending of more dependent children to the Children's Industrial Farm. They do not want more. They have too many now, more than they can take proper care of with the help they have. The purpose of it is to encourage those who can, and are willing to do so, to lend a hand in a good work and especially to lighten the load of over-work that the good people in charge are undertaking to carry. The land is not yet paid for. The running expenses exceed the income. It would take $5,000 to put the institution abreast of its needs without having touched the mortgage. Great was the hazard and great the faith that hazarded it. Who will help?

More than twenty Frenchmen are now operating flying-machines, among them being Bleriot, Latham, Farman, Coudron, Paulhan, Sommer, Esnault-Pelterie, Santos-Dumont, Delagrange, Gastambide and Herber. Bleriot and Latham, whose work is best known, Farman, Sommer and Paulhan have all made flights of more than an hour.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

"Help Thou Mine Unbelief."

Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief.—Mark 9:24.

Thy little ones, the babes who need Thy care.
Are broken in the mills to feed man's greed.

Their lives all stunted, desolate and bare,
Till, God, for them a burish heart might bleed;

Their tiny bodies old before their day;
Wee, man-made bondsmen unto toil and grief—

Dost Thou, unnoted, heed and guard their way?

Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief.

Sad wrecks of men go staggering to and fro,
And women harter all to women dear:

To Vice triumphant oft we bend us low,
And give to warring Right a frown or jeer.

Crime robed in silk may tattered Virtue flee;
If but the theft's successful, praise the thief—

Doth Thy great Day of Justice e'er draw near?

Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief.

Out of the mists I come, I know not whence;
Into the mists I go, I know not where.

"Wherefore?" I cry, and out of thine immense
No voices answer to my spirit's prayer.

Oh, blindly groping in a darkened land,
Dazed by earth's problem horn of sin and grief,

Comes yet the day when I shall understand?

Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief.

After Just One Look!

When I first met Leonora—twas a year or so ago—she was plump and nicely rounded, and her curves a pleasant show. She was fashioned like a Hebe, was this queen of all the dears, but I saw her yesterday, and—excuse these falling tears.

Yes, I saw her yester even. Oh, my tortured, anguished soul! She was shapeless and was hipless, and was fashioned like a pole, like a pole that's slightly lumpy but is not; a thing to please, and her waist, that once invited, had descended to her knees.

Wept I then to look upon her; weep I yet as I recall how she, once so sweetly rounded, now has naught of shape at all. Waist at knees, or waist at collar, sparsely straight or straightly spare, all her luring curves have vanished—but she makes them up in hair.

Hair from Spain and hair from Turkey, hair from Greece and Ballarat, hair from Timbuctoo and China—all are holding up her hat. Hair in wads and hair in masses, hair in puffs that beauty queers, hair instead of winning graces—oh, these bitter, bitter tears!

Leonora, Leonora, tell me, darling, was it well first to look quite like an angel, then to look so much like—tell me, dearest, tell me quickly, help my broken sob and moan, for I got just one look at you—and I'm weeping here alone.

By Way of Friendly Advice.

Now that Miss Vergilia Bogue, queen-elect of the Portola carnival, is to have a book published, and remembering what all of us remember—

Let me pray you, let me plead,

Let me urge or hint it:

Don't let papers print it.

Major Grattan is mistaken. Fossilizing implies change, but Lauck is just as the Almighty made him, and the rest of us can't help it.

A Talk With Agamemnon.

You are going to do great things, my Agamemnon—sometime. The world will be filled with the story of the glory of your deed—sometime. I know, for I heard you say so. You are not doing these great things to-day, for, unfortunately, you had another engagement, and you will not do them to-morrow, for that is the date of the picnic, but you certainly will do it—sometime.

Agamemnon, my boy, you do not realize what a mighty army you have joined. The world is full of men who are going to do splendid things—sometime. Why, even I, looking as I do, once was a non-commissioned officer in that army, and a right gallant lot we were. Not a man of us all was there who was not going to belt the world with the reflected light of his fame—sometime. But, alas! the days came and went, and we occupied them with petty pleasures and petty cares. To-morrow would be time enough, we said, but to-morrow never came, and our great deeds, I fear, are part of that hadean pavement of which we have read—a glittering pavement, but uncomfortably warm to the feet of those who tread it.

Dear boy, if you are going to do great things, take my word for it that right about now is the time to begin doing them. It is easier to wait for to-morrow, but, oh, to-morrow is so deucedly uncertain.

Thoughtful Man on the Press.

"The Press, sir," the Thoughtful Man observed, "is the Archimedean lever that moves our modern civilization, and the editor is the man that manipulates the lever. You wouldn't think it in looking at some of the editors, but, as somebody has truthfully remarked, the Almighty moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform, and He can take an editor who looks as if he couldn't drive tracks and make of him a tremendous influence in the community; in fact, He frequently does. The situation in San Francisco illustrates the case. There had been a saturnalia of grafting—

"'Tell with the grafters!' cries the people as one man.

"'Do you mean the bribers as well as the bribed?' somebody asked.

"'You he, we do,' says the people.

"'Something must be done about this critical situation,' says my friend Calhoun.

"'Why so?' says I, and then in my enthusiasm I added, 'Tell with the grafters!'

"'Hush, man!' he says, 'You know not what you do.'

"'Why, what's broke?' I naturally inquired.

"'My friend,' he says, 'all innocent, spotless and of lamblike purity as I am, I have been held up by my friend Abe Ruef, the agreement between us being that he was to receive 3 per cent. and I 97 per cent. of the profits.

"'Twas a laudable business enterprise, but I cannot forbear a shudder or two when I hear you say 'Tell with the grafters!' Woe's me!' he says, 'The law is so unreasonable. 'Tis getting so that a man cannot be held up and rely on making anything by it. I must get my two varieties of newspapers to working for me.'

"'What two varieties do you mean?' I inquired.

"'Why,' he responded, 'the decent indecent, like the Chronicle, and the indecent indecent, like the Oakland Tribune, the Globe and the Los Angeles Times. You handle the former with a bath towel and the latter with tongs.' So he did as he said.

"'The graft prosecutions are spoiling business,' says the papers; hence it must be evident that Calhoun is innocent.

"'The government didn't pay Henry $23,000 till after he had earned it; it follows that Calhoun is not guilty.

"'The prosecution of this poor rich man is a per-secution, and therefore he is guiltless.

"'So they dropped their bait for suckers, to adopt a piscatorial simile, and the result is inspiring."

"How so?" I inquired.

"'Why, one-half of them think that he is guilty but didn't do it, and the other half think he is innocent but did it.'

Amended Maxims.

(As revised and brought up to date by the Business Manager.)

Honesty is the best policy—so long as it is not permitted to interfere with business.

Virtue is its own reward—but the reward of being judiciously held up frequently is larger.

Honor sinks where commerce long prevails—but so long as commerce does prevail, why need we worry?

Thou shalt not steal—but, of course, if you're held up it's different.

Laws grind the poor, and rich men rule the law. (Evidently this was handed to me by mistake; it needs no revision.—Business Manager.)

Insulting—in Some Instances.

"How did he do it?"

"Asked him how he made his money."

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

There are few citizens of California who know as much of her early history as did Winfield J. Davis, who recently died in Marysville. He had filled many public positions and in all of them had earned the encomium spoken of old, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

State Mineralogist Aubrey estimates the production of oil in California in 1908 (48,306,910 barrels) to have been worth $26,566,181, or about $6,000,000 more than the output of gold.

Lodi shipped her first crate of Tokay grapes to the East last week. It is expected that large quantities will be ready for shipment by the last of next week.

It is announced that the Fresno trustees probably will close the saloons of that city on October 1st. In the event that they do, their action, it is anticipated, will be fought by the saloonists.

At a depth of 700 feet a large flow of excellent natural gas has been struck at Petaluma. Another well now is being sunk, and the gas will be piped throughout the town.

On July 31st the biggest shipment of fruits ever made from the Sacramento valley in one day was sent East by the California Fruit Distributors. It consisted of 221 carloads of various fruits.

A "double-header" proposition will be submitted to the voters of Glenn county on October 12th, when they will be permitted to decide by their votes whether the entire county shall go "dry" or only such precincts as so desire.

Citizens of San Rafael have decided that a great Labor Day celebration shall be held in that city. Labor organizations throughout the county will be invited to participate.

Alexander Fawcett, aged eighty-five years, who long ago was a resident of Grass Valley, recently returned to that city after an absence of nearly a half-century, and located a claim which he discovered at that earlier time. It is claimed that the ore will go $200 to the ton.

The board of supervisors of Glenn county has decided to levy a tax of two cents on the hundred dollars for the purpose of creating an advertising fund.

On September 18th the electors of Solano county are to vote on a proposition to bond the county in the sum of $300,000, $250,000 to be used in the construction of a courthouse and $50,000 in the erection of a jail.

MAGAZINE HARVEST TIME.

There is a sharp difference between the activities of the editorial department and of the business department of a great magazine in the matter of variation in the amount of necessary work. Editorially, a magazine is a fixed quantity. So many pages of reading matter to be filled every month means a fairly constant outlay of energy and brain work to achieve the desired novelty and literary quality. It is just as important and requires just about the same outlay of money and force in July as in December.

But in the matter of obtaining subscribers, July is relatively negligible, while December is the climax of the subscription harvest efforts. Practically all the new subscriptions to magazines, and renewals as well, are gathered in the months of October to December, both inclusive. This is for the same reason that nearly all luxuries are purchased in the fall, and that the biggest month of nearly all businesses is Christmas month. The farmer's crops are in and the money for them is in the banks, the railroads are working overtime, everybody who ever has a surplus has it then, and people feel free to gratify their desires for whatever they want above the necessities of life.

After the Christmas holidays, everybody feels "broke"; in most parts of the country people then face the dourdest of the winter weather, which does not incline them to letting go their money; spring calls to the open, and summer is too hot for any but the lightest and most casual reading; early fall is the season of harvest.

So the late fall is the time that magazine publishers deluge the country with announcements of alluring numbers to come, with circulars describing the attractions of their publications, and with insinuating and ingratiating appeals for subscriptions. Whatever the harvest, this is the time to reap.

And the returns from these appeals are a fairly accurate barometer of business conditions. When the country is prosperous, people buy luxuries, of which periodical literature is one of the most quickly responsive. When the country is poor, magazines feel the effects among the first of those to suffer from national economizing.

Curiously, though, the advertising pages of magazines sometimes indicate business conditions by a reverse process. Many businesses make it a rule to advertise the most extensively when business is duller on the theory that then business needs advertising most; and diminish the space used when business is so good that advertising looks like a work of supererogation. The advertising barometer, though, is less accurate than the circulation barometer, for circulation depends directly upon the public at large, which feels industrial fluctuations the most keenly. And, too, the most successful advertisers advertise consistently through storm and shine, on the theory that "general publicity" always pays, if not immediately, surely later.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

A Bit of Bouffe A most urbane and graceful proceeding was that of Messrs. Grauman and Keil in going through the motions, in front of the drop curtain and in full glare of the footlights, of withdrawing from the mayoralty field by the interests of Calhoun's man Crocker. Of course they did not really withdraw from the field. How could they when they were never in it? It is improbable that either of them had the backing of a baker's dozen. But it was a nice bit of bouffe introduced to make it look as though things were going Crocker's way. To be sure the effect was marred by Grauman's ghostly appearance. The Call had knocked the life out of him. Mr. Countryman is in the wings waiting for his cue to go through a similar performance. It will be less diverting because of what has gone before. The audience will be onto it.

The Deep Damnation Of the Calhoun Plot It is to be no political opera which the people of San Francisco are to witness on the 17th. Nor is it a morality play. It is a tragedy. It has been well staged by the Herrin-Hellman committee of twenty-five. The supernumeraries have all been engaged and have rehearsed their parts. The stage properties are in place. The plot is the crucifixion of San Francisco in the house of her friends. The state is watching, the nation is watching, the world is looking on. The denouement of the plot will proclaim to the world whether or not San Francisco is to be in the keeping of honest men or in possession of as sordid a set of hard-visaged materialists as ever sunk a ship or made a merchantman's crew walk a gang plank.

The Mayoralty Ranks Second It is important to San Francisco to have a good mayor. His appointive power is of vantage. But more than his power is what he stands for, not openly and avowedly, but by token of that backing that determines his position in the public eye more certainly than proclamations. Let the Crocker following be as mum as they have a mind to be and suffer Mr. Crocker to protest as much as he may, nothing under heaven can make it appear other than that Crocker and his administration will do all they can to deliver the bribers out of that purgatory where they have spent three uncomfortable but impotent years. The whole movement has that purpose in view, and no other. The city will accept his nomination as a proclamation to that effect and so will the state and the nation. No tidal wave can wash out the stain of Crocker's nomination.

Bad for The Party The nomination of Crocker for mayor will be a blow for the Republican party in San Francisco to sustain, a blow for which Republicans will not be wholly responsible. Thousands have registered as Republicans who are not Republicans, and they have registered that they may commit the Republican party to a disgraceful policy. They will vote the Republican ticket at the primary but will not do so at the polls. They will vote to set the grafters free, however they may be set free, and will have no other solicitude. The Republican party of San Francisco stands to be shamefully entreated by those who are masquerading as Republicans. They purpose to do it injury by assaulting the city in its name.

Different With Byron Mauzy Leaving out of consideration the unimpeachable personal character of Byron Mauzy, as we may leave out the personally unobjectionable character of William Crocker, what are Mauzy's political assets? Not one voter who is not a Republican has registered as a Republican for the purpose of voting for the nomination of Byron Mauzy as the Republican candidate for mayor. Not one man who is supporting Mr. Mauzy in this campaign is in favor of having one law for the rich and another law for the poor, or in favor of abandoning the prosecution of malefactors of great wealth until such time as the proved inability of our criminal laws to mete out justice to rich and poor shall arouse the state to action to compel such a revision of the laws as will make such men punishable. Finally, Mr. Mauzy stands before the people as typifying that citizenship that stands for a moral purpose, for a clean city with an honorable reputation at home and abroad. The city knows this to be true, Republicans know it, the state knows it, so does the nation and so will the world. The primary vote on the mayoralty contest next Tuesday will make such a proclamation to all men as no sophistry can obscure, no outpouring of verbiage explain away. The measure of the city is to be taken in plain view.

The Supervisors Are the Citadel The Calhoun-Hellman plotters realize that they cannot beat Francis J. Heney before the Citizens' committee and they are waging this whole campaign. Therefore they must do this in some way other than by going before the people against him alone. This they hope to accomplish by electing a board of supervisors that will not appropriate money for carrying on the graft prosecutions. The law forbids private philanthropy and good citizenship to bear any part of the cost of conducting suits for the punishment of crime, a provision of law owing its existence, no doubt, to a well-studied effort to prevent the punishment of offenses that the political powers that be do not wish to see punished. If such a board of supervisors can be elected Mr. Heney, though elected District Attorney, would be powerless for want of funds to prosecute the felons who remain unconvicted. It is a nice scheme and that is the plan of campaign against one who the Chronicle will find small reason for doubting. It has the merit of being perfectly efficacious if a Calhoun-Hellman-Harriman board of supervisors can be elected.

A Preposterous Supervisorial Ticket The "Citizens' Committee" has selected a ticket of eighteen candidates for supervisors that is an insult to the intelligence and the conscience of the voters of San Francisco. Five of these candidates were openly adherents of Abe Ruef during the Ruef-Schmitz regime. They are P. A. Bergerot, A. M. Wallen, H. Fred Suhr, Jr., Theodore Lunstedt, and J. F. Jewell. Bergerot was also, before Ruef's day, a follower of Boss Crimmins. Another candidate, John B. Carson, was also a Crimminian man. "Tim" Sullivan, a marine bosslet, is represented by four of his followers: G. W. Bayreuther, George W. Bell, James C. Bride, and Fritz Gercke; and two other of the candidates, F. L. Hansen and Thos. P. Galvin, are "satisfactory" to him. One candidate, E. W. Briggs, has had a cigar-stand in Mike de Young's building for years. William M. Crowley is a stenographer and holder of appointive offices supposed to be in the gift of the Southern Pacific company. Frank J. Weiss and M. J. Winter have no record at all. Gus B. Risso was dismissed by the board of supervisors, as possible, but was lugged in by other interests. L. B. Bernhard was put on the ticket by John C. Lynch, the Southern Pacific political fixer.

Weaklings and Political Hacks The candidates offered by the Citizens' Committee for mayor and district attorney are bad enough—bad in the sense that they are nobodies who stand for nothing except what their backers tell them to stand for—but it was almost inconceivable that their ticket would be filled out with such an unsavory aggregation of supervisorial candidates, more than half of whom have a political record that should make it impossible for them ever to venture to ask again for the votes of the men of San Francisco. The majority of these men have actively participated in crooked politics under one or the other of the two worst bosses in San Francisco since Chris Buckley's day—Ruef and Crimmins. How they or their proponents have dared to expose them to the indignation of the public in this way is a mystery.

The Chronicle's Crooked Fight The attitude of the San Francisco Chronicle throws much light on the question. The Chronicle has fought and is fighting the graft prosecution. The Chronicle fought the bonds to acquire municipal ownership of the Geary Street road. The Chronicle is opposed to the reduction of gas rates. The Chronicle is opposed to a settlement of the Market Street railway monopoly on terms just to the public. The Chronicle is the friend of every public service corporation in its fight to keep the public from escaping corporate greed. Mike de Young has been in constant consultation with the Citizens' committee and has dictated the nomination of its candidate for sheriff and of its candidate for at least one supervisorial district.

Chronicle Slandering Best Supervisors Again, the Chronicle has repeatedly slurred the present board of supervisors. The Chronicle has published a series of articles damning the construction of the fire reserve cisterns, and claiming that the board of supervisors were allowing the city to be robbed by paying for leaky cisterns. These cisterns, according to the testimony of expert engineers, are triumphs of concrete construction. Official tests have proven that the fall of water in a two-foot manhole at the tapering top of a 75,000-gallon cistern is one inch in twenty-four hours. That rate of leakage indicates a water-tight tank that is considered phenomenal in fresh concrete. Only three cisterns have been accepted. The Chronicle has published an article describing leaks in others not accepted, knowing when it published the article that the cisterns were not completed and would not be accepted until they passed test.

Chronicle's Misleading Statements about Funds The Chronicle has attacked the board of supervisors for the expenditure of bond moneys voted for schoolhouses, which the board apparently applied to other purposes; but the Chronicle knew, but did not tell its readers, that the unexpected premium at which the bonds sold and the unforeseen drop in price of building materials before the money was spent, permitted the construction of all the buildings demanded by the home town and left a surplus which, rather than throw the board applied to extending school yards, a most necessary and laudable accession to San Francisco's public school system.

Mike de Young vs. Graft Prosecution In short, the Chronicle has tried to discredit the best board of supervisors that San Francisco has had, while the proprietor of the Chronicle was busily engaged in helping select the worst conceivable list of men to be their successors. Why? Is there, or is there not, a very obvious connection between Mike de Young's political attitude towards an admirable board of supervisors and Mike de Young's activities in selecting men whose whole record would indicate that they know how to "take orders"? And is there an obvious inference to be drawn from the effort to elect such a crew to the board of supervisors, and Mike de Young's antipathy to the graft prosecution? Or from the effort to elect such a board, and Mike de Young's friendship for Hellman, Jr., of the Spring Valley Water company's directorate? Or from the effort to elect such a board, and Mike de Young's friendship for the officials of the Market Street railway and of the gas company?

Mike de Young vs. Good City Attorney One more question. Why has Mike de Young and his Chronicle fought the reelection of Percy V. Long to the office of city attorney? Is it possible that Long's valiant efforts to carry through the Hetch-Hetchy municipal water project may be unpleasant to de Young's friend Hellman, of the Spring Valley directorate? Is it possible that Long's services to the people in the gas rate litigation are distasteful to de Young's San Francisco Gas company's friends?

A Subtle Plot to Tie Henry's Hands The answers to these questions are too obvious. The Republicans of San Francisco cannot afford to be fooled by the most preposterous ticket offered by the Citizens' Committee. The success of that ticket is inconceivable. It would mean the tying of Francis J. Heney's hands in the graft prosecution; it would mean the surrender of the Hetch-Hetchy project; it would mean the surrender to the greed of the United Railroads and the gas company.

The Men That Ought to Win Compare the ticket of the Citizens' Committee with the ticket of the Municipal League of Independent Republican Clubs, led by Byron Maury. Political expedients and political hacks are pitted against clean and honorable men who stand squarely for the public interest. It will be to the eternal shame of the Republican party in San Francisco if the Independent Republican ticket is not nominated at the primary. For the information of Republican voters it is reprinted below. Clip it out and carry it into the voting booth as a reminder of the names not only of the principal candidates, but of the supervisors, who are the crucially important issue:

Mavor	Byron Maury

What is it that makes some candy taste SO good.

It's the quality of the material that goes into it. Some candy makers continually figure and scheme and experiment to increase profits by decreasing cost. Quality then has to suffer. Lehnhardt continually figures and tries to increase profits by making better candy. Lehnhardt's way costs more per pound but he sells more pounds. Which is better—to sell 1,000 pounds at a profit of 10c a pound or to sell 100 pounds at a profit of 25c a pound? Lehnhardt prefers the former—Makes more money and more friends. Think it over.

THE GRAFT CASES.

Since the last issue of The California Weekly no progress has been made in securing jurors for the trial of Patrick Calhoun. Still the two possible jurors who have been shored since their places awaiting opinion less companions, and still such companions have not been found, although the lawyers are laboring zealously to attain that far-away end. Thus far 1,500 talesmen have been summoned to court—many were called, and two were chosen, perhaps. Of the 1,500 who were called, but 353 reached the box for actual examination; so that little more than one-half of one per cent. of these succeeded in escaping the network of legal snares set for their feet and reaching the stage where nothing but peremptory challenge can put them out of the juror line of business. It is reasonable to suppose that the Californian soil will be wet by winter rains before the case goes to the jury.

"Bear in mind, Willie," concluded the teacher, reproving a pupil for a first offense, "that these temptations can be resisted if determination is used. Always turn a deaf ear to temptation." Little Willie's lip trembled. "But, teacher," he answered, "I ain't got a deaf ear."—Tit-Bits.

"Mother's compliments," said a youngster to a butcher who keeps a shop in a busy suburban thoroughfare, "an' she's sent me to beef you the big bone brought with the piece of beef this morning." "Tell your mother next time I kills a bullock without bones in it I'll make her a present of a joint," said the man of meat with a grin. "Mother's compliments," continued the boy, "and she says next time you find a bit of sirloin with a shoulder of mutton bo'd in it she'd like to buy the whole carcass as a curiosity."

Chug-chug! B-r! br-r-r! Honk! Honk! Giggling-giggling! The pedestrian paused at the intersection of two busy cross streets. He looked about. An automobile was rushing at him from one direction, a motorcycle from another, an autotruck was coming from behind and a taxicab was speedily approaching. Zip-zip! Zing-ging! He looked up and saw directly above him a runaway airship in rapid descent. There was but one chance. He was standing upon a manhole cover. Quickly seizing it, he lifted the lid and jumped into the hole just in time to be run over by a subway train.—Cleveland Plain-Dealer.

Mark Twain was waiting for a street car in Boston when a young girl approached him, smiling. She was a lovely girl, fresh, blooming, ingenious, bubbling with enthusiasm, and evidently on her way home from school. "Pardon me," she said, "I know it's very unconventional, but I may never have another chance. Would you mind giving me your autograph?" "Glad to do it, my dear child," said Mr. Clemens, drawing out his fountain pen. "Oh, it's so good of you," gurgled the girl. "You know, I've never seen you but once, Chief Justice Fuller, and that was at a distance; but I've seen your portrait so often that I recognized you the moment I saw you here." "Um-m-m-mm!" said Mr. Clemens, noncommittally. Then he took from her eager hands her nice little autograph album, and wrote in bold script these words:

"It is delicious to be full.
But it is heavenly to be Fuller.
I am cordially yours,
Melville W. Fuller."
Mr. Clemens has not heard from Chief Justice Fuller yet.

HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER IN CALIFORNIA

II. THE PACIFIC GAS AND ELECTRIC COMPANY.

By E. FRENCH STROTHER.

The Pacific Gas and Electric company is the largest concern now engaged in the business of generating and selling hydro-electric power in California. The accompanying map of its field of operations is a map of the wealthiest and most populous part of the state, and shows in a vivid way the fact that this one company touches the lives of more than half the people of California in one or another of their public utilities.

This company operates in twenty-nine counties of California. It supplies current to thirty individual lighting companies and to twelve electric railway companies. It sells current direct in forty-two cities and towns in California, as follows: Belmont, Belvedere, Berkeley, Browns Valley, Burlingame, Chico, Centerville, Corte Madera, Grass Valley, Loomis, Marysville, Mayfield, Menlo Park, Mill Valley, Mountain View, Mokelumne Hill, Napa, Nevada City, Newcastle, Oakland, Palo Alto, Penryn, Petaluma, Redwood City, Rocklin, San Anselmo, San Francisco, San Mateo, San Jose, San Rafael, Santa Rosa, Sacramento, San Andreas, Sausalito, Sunnyvale, Tiburon, Woodland, Yolo, and Yuba City.

Besides selling direct to the above-named, it sells current wholesale to companies that supply light or power at Davis, Dixon, Elmira, Winters, Rio Vista, Wheatland, Rosevale, Lincoln, Vacaville, Washington (Yolo county), Richmond, Suisun, Pinole, Sebastopol, Alta, Dutch Flat, Gridley, Biggs, Auburn, Colfax, Folsom, Stockton, Tournay, Vallejo, and Santa Clara.

In addition, it supplies part or all the power used by the following electric railway companies:

The Oakland Traction Company and the "Key Route," which together operate all the railways in Oakland, Berkeley, Alameda, Fruitvale, Melrose, Emeryville, San Leandro, San Lorenzo, Elmhurst, and Piedmont.

The Sacramento Electric, Gas and Railway company, which operates the street railway system of Sacramento;

The Stockton Electric Railroad company, which operates the street railway system of Stockton;

The San Jose Railway company, which operates the street railway system of San Jose;

The San Jose and Santa Clara County Railroad company, which operates in Palo Alto and which, when building now under way is completed, will connect Santa Clara with San Francisco;

The North Shore Railway company, now absorbed by the Northwestern Pacific Railroad company, which connects Sausalito, Larkspur, Mill Valley, Ross, San Anselmo, Fairfax, and San Rafael;

The Vallejo, Benicia and Napa Valley Railroad company, which connects Vallejo and Napa and, through its subsidiary company, the San Francisco, Vallejo and Napa Valley Railway company, connects Napa and St. Helena;

The Petaluma and Santa Rosa Railway company, which connects Petaluma, Santa Rosa, Sebastopol, and Forestville;

The Northern Electric Railway company, which connects Barber, Chico, Marysville, Oroville, and Sacramento, and which will extend to Gridley and Yuba City;

The Presidio and Ferries Railway company, which connects those points in San Francisco;

The United Railroads of San Francisco.

In short, if you live anywhere within a radius of 150 miles of San Francisco, or travel within that zone, you can scarcely avoid paying something to the Pacific Gas and Electric company for the use of electric power, either in the way of bills for lighting or for carfare. Not counting the United Railroads of San Francisco, the Pacific Gas and Electric company supplies electric power to run 473 passenger trolley cars over 550 miles of track, besides the power to run more than 100 freight cars.

And 76 per cent. of all this power, and of all the power sold for lighting purposes as described above, is generated by water-power in the Sierra Nevada mountains.

are also controlled by them through filings upon water in excess of the water necessary for the plants already in operation.

To provide against dry years the company has built thirty-one reservoirs, having a storage capacity of 25 billion gallons of water.

The reservoirs are also insurance against the variations in "load," as electricians call the quantity of power being delivered over transmission lines at a given time. This load varies enormously. During the rush hours of street railway traffic and during the early night, when most of the lighting is done, it approaches the maximum capacity of the plants. After midnight it drops far below that capacity. The average load thus falls much below the rated maximum capacity of the plants.

But "during the twelve months ending June 30, 1907, the output of electricity for lighting and power purposes was equivalent to 351,578,335 kilowatt hours [53,780 average continuous horsepower], of which 76 per cent. was produced in hydraulic plants." This is quoted from a prospectus issued by N. W. Halsey & Co., soliciting subscriptions to the "Proposed Issue of Thirty-Year Unifying and Refunding Mortgage Gold Bonds by the California Gas and Electric Corporation," a constituent corporation of the Pacific Gas and Electric company. In other words, the average constant generation of electric power by this company was, two years ago, equivalent to the power generated by steam-engines of 40,872 horsepower capacity working twenty-four hours every day.

The value of this power is explained in the same prospectus. The gross income of the company, for six months ending June 30, 1907, from electric light and incidental power, was $2,322,606; and from power for mining, electric railways, and general manufacturing operation, $787,864. At that rate, the company's gross income from electric power for a whole year would be $6,220,940. Of this, 76 per cent., generated by water, would yield $4,727,914, a pretty tidy gross income for any business.

Naturally, a business of such proportions requires a large investment of capital. The company is capitalized at $30,000,000 and is authorized to issue bonds to the sum of $10,500,000. It has outstanding $18,558,000 in bonds of principal subsidiary companies.

One company of these proportions did not spring, full grown into being, overnight. It is the result of a process of consolidation, absorption, and growth, culminating in the formation of the Pacific Gas and Electric company as a holding company for a number of large corporations which, in turn, were each a consolidation of a number of smaller corporations.

The Pacific Gas and Electric company was organized in 1905 to hold the stock of the California Gas and Electric Corporation and the San Francisco Gas and Electric company, besides such other public utility corporations as might be desirable. The other corporations now controlled by it are:

California Central Gas and Electric company, Bay Counties Power Company, Valley Counties Power company, Standard Electric company, of California, South Yuba Water company,

A glance at the map will show the location of the power-houses of the company, which are indicated by the black squares. Two are on Big Butte creek, northwest of Chico; two are fed from the main Yuba river; two are on the South Fork of the Yuba; three others, though the map does not indicate it, are fed with water taken from the South Fork of the Yuba above the Deer creek power house and led through conduits and canals to the power-houses; one is on the American river; and one on the Mokelumne. More than half the power are in the hands of this company. A very large share of the resources of the other rivers

MR. SMITH'S POWER BILL TO SETTLE CONFLICT OF STATE AND NATIONAL JURISDICTION.

By S. C. SMITH.

A BILL

Granting certain rights of way over the public domain.

[Introduced in the House of Representatives, July 29, 1909, by Congressman S. C. Smith, of Bakersfield.]

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the use of any unappropriated public land not included in national parks, Indian and military reservations, necessary for the construction, maintenance, and operation of works for storing and controlling water for irrigation, mining, manufacturing, domestic or municipal use, the generation of power, and for the transmission of power over, upon, or under the surface of such land, with convenient telegraph and telephone lines, is hereby granted to the several states wherein the land is situated, in trust for the benefit of the people of said states, respectively, subject to the conditions herein provided. The easement shall extend to the land occupied by the water of any reservoir and of the canals or conduits of all necessary or convenient types and fifty feet on each side of the marginal limits thereof; and to one hundred feet by power stations and substations and the hundred feet on each side thereof; to transmission telegraph and telephone lines and fifty feet on each side of the center line thereof; also to the right to take from the public lands adjacent to the lands herein specified earth, stone, and materials (except timber) necessary for the construction of said works.

Sec. 2. That the several states may, by appropriate legislation, provide for the use and enjoyment of said easements by persons, companies, or corporations, upon terms created by the several states, respectively.

Sec. 3. That a state desiring to avail itself of the terms of this statute shall present to the Secretary of the Interior an application for the particular lands desired, accompanied by appropriate maps, the name of the person, company, or corporation that is to enjoy the use of the easement, and a full statement of the terms and conditions upon which said easement is to be enjoyed by the state, grantee or licensee. If the land sought is not required by the Government of the United States for any public purpose (other than for a forest reserve) the application shall be filed by the Secretary of the Interior, and thereupon the grant herein shall become effective. Provided, That changes in the route of a conduit or transmission line or the location of a power station or substation may be made by a proceeding as in the case of a right-of-way, and upon the filing of the new selection the portion abandoned shall revert to the Government and be relieved of the easement hereby granted. Provided further, That timber taken from said land herein conveyed shall be paid for according to the reasonable value thereof; and parties constructing and operating works within a national forest shall comply with the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture as to preventing or extinguishing fires on said land.

Sec. 4. That nothing herein contained shall prevent the alteration, amendment, or repeal of this Act.

By an act of Congress, approved July 26, 1866, Congress turned over to the public land states for the benefit of the people thereof the free use of the waters flowing in non-navigable streams, and at the same time granted a free right of way over the public domain for all ditches, flumes and canals, this easement to go to the person or company authorized by the state to appropriate and use the water. The water is still subject to disposal by the states, and uniformly has been subject to appropriation and use by individuals and companies without money and without price. The only condition imposed is that it should immediately and continuously be devoted to a beneficial purpose.

There has been no complaint at such free-handed disposal of these water rights in so far as they were intended for use in aid of agriculture and mining. But since the great value of these privileges for the generation of electric power has been seen, it has been the source of much regret by the states that terms more favorable to the commonwealth at large had not been imposed as conditions precedent to the acquisition of the water rights. In scores if not hundreds of instances, individuals have gone through the simple formula required to secure a water right—generally all that is required is to post a notice of claim or appropriation on the bank of the stream at the point of proposed diversion and then record the notice at the county seat—and forthwith they were in possession of rights which they could capitalize at millions of dollars. This process has proceeded until, alas, practically all of the water rights at available power sites have been acquired; could the states now recall these valuable privileges there is little doubt that in granting them again, conditions would be imposed which would bring them back to power over the users and secure a substantial revenue therefrom.

By the act of February 15, 1901, the free right of way for water conduits was changed to a "use permit" or revocable license, the application therefor to be approved by some executive secretary or bureau chief before becoming effective; and of recent years the practice has been to withhold approval, to give it to whichever one of several applicants it pleased the officer to favor, or to grant it on such conditions as he was pleased to impose. Some permits have been revoked while construction work was under way, and one at least, I am informed, has been revoked after an expensive hydroelectric plant was completed and in operation; and irrigation has been hampered and home-building retarded. This element of uncertainty of tenure, I need not argue, ought not to continue. Invested capital should not rest on such an insecure foundation.

The purpose of House Bill 11932 is to pass the right of way over to the states, they to treat it as an indispensable adjunct of the water right, the expropriation being that the states will grant permanent easements or licenses, and also that they will, with their added knowledge, impose such conditions to this grant as they might and should have laid on the grant of the water right. The latter will be readily seen, is the more important consideration of the two. The states have unwittingly given away the major factor of a concession of very great value; if they be now clothed with full jurisdiction over the other factor, the right of way it will aid them greatly in recouping their lost opportunity in connection with the water right. It will readily be observed that a water right is of little avail without a right of way for the conduit, etc.; and conversely, the easement

THE days had lengthened until the Gail Club had small use for lighting up until the session was half over, and out-of-doors was held to be much pleasanter than in-doors anyhow.

Knocking the ashes from his pipe, and heaving a sigh, Abner Appleby suggested that when the club adjourn it adjourn until September.

"Not unless the Professor is ready with that Matrimonial Philosophy we have been waiting two or three years for," declared the newspaperman. "I propose to talk against myself, if I need be, to prevent adjournment until the mystery of that philosophy is revealed to us."

"If it will avert that disaster," replied the Professor, "I will unbosom myself of it here and now. The alternative would be fearful to contemplate."

Early in my college course I made a category of human powers, tendencies, and capacities and at the end of it I drew cross bars beyond which I indicated the unknowable, in which realm of interest I proposed wasting little or no time or effort. I regarded that as dreamland and if I made excursions into it it was in the way of recreation. On the hither side of that double lined bar I sought for facts, facts, facts, employing the scientific method painstakingly and with patience.

One of these facts was matrimony. I found it well nigh universal in the human family and I found that the birds had practiced it in advance of the human species. Marriage is older than the human family. I accepted it as unquestionably a good thing for the race.

How about the individual? I could not be inensible to the matrimonial shipwrecks cast up all about me and I studied them. I found that these wrecks grew out of two principal causes: folly in blundering into the contract, and natural cussedness in seeking to avoid compliance with the provisions of the contract when made. Therefore I early made up my mind that I would not make a marriage contract until both parties to it thoroughly understood all its provisions and, that if I did enter into such a contract, I would spend the rest of my life trying to observe its conditions to the letter. Happiness is to be looked for there if anywhere and its attainment was well worth the risk and trouble.

Now the purpose of matrimony is progeny. The world must be peopled. I loved children and had resolved to spend my life in their education. I wanted a wife to bring me children and wanted for a wife a woman fit to become the mother of children as well as to take premiums over other children at the fair as anybody's calves, colts, pigs or chickens were to take premiums over scrub stock.

In my category of human qualities I placed reason at the top. I regarded it as as certainly God-given as inspiration and rather more easily verified. I placed inclination farther down the scale than instinct, with which I found man not very plentifully equipped. Thus equipped, at a proper time, I took the subject of matrimony under serious consideration. At the proper time, as I saw it, was when I had developed an earning capacity fit for two persons with a prospect of increasing that earning power sufficiently for taking another member into the firm each two years until we should number ten all told. Then I proposed to close the stock books and proceed to fit the product for market.

By this time I had become principal of a public school, had held the place one year and had contracted for the second, had four or five thousand dollars in bank and felt the ground tolerably secure under my feet. With the contingencies of sickness or death I did not concern myself. We must all take chances with those and if marriage is postponed until these risks are insured against it is ordinarily too late to permit of the marriage relation being fortunate.

There was another reason why I desired to precipitate, after reasonable preparation, My primary teacher was a dumpling. She was so intensely kissable that I could with difficulty restrain myself. You have all known such women, women made to be loved, adored, fondled, treated as small children are cared for, caged like a bird, defended like a reputation. Such a woman makes of her lord a gnarled oak, a granite gate post something to be leaned up against, entwined with tendrils arms, an object of pride if not of adoration. When in her presence I felt the ground slipping under my feet, my reason reeling and my sound philosophy going to pot.

You have, all of you, in your boyhood, looked into the depths of a crystal clear spring and there seen your own image reproduced with distinctness and fidelity and, if you looked closely, you also saw gentle currents of infowind water coming from veins in the earth that kept the spring supplied to a gentle overflowing. So it was that I looked down through this woman's big limpid eyes into her soul and saw the sources thereof, and I saw, too, my own image reflected clear and knew that it was treasured there.

You have, all of you no doubt, with your own mouth fairly watering, seen a nice juicy peach blushing with ripeness hanging from a limb ready to drop at a touch into your outstretched hand. Well, she was my peach ready to drop into my hand and I knew it and knew that she knew it too.

"Old fellow," I said to myself, "if you wish to beget canary birds, if you wish to help fill the world with sweetness and light instead of with enterprise and virility, there is the wife for you. You have only to hold out your hands as a father to a child and say 'come' to make her your own." I knew all this to be true, but I heard posterity calling, calling for the right to be born with strong pulses, robust reasoning powers, stern judgments, whereas, with her, everything melted into affection, sentiment, soul for she was extenuated, he called spirituelle without being invalid. I wanted a posterity that could do as well as be, not a mere pervasive influence but a compelling force.

So I shut the chambers of my heart with a slam, stifled inclination as many a desperate mother has smothered her babe, turned face about, took to my heels and ordered my matrimonial destiny in obedience to the dictates of sound judgment, not the heart. I was not selfish in the matter. I knew without being told that this was sacrificing my own greatest happiness, and very likely hers, in the interests of my children, but I knew that I should sacrifice myself a hundred times without hesitation after their advent. Why not before?

I returned at once to where I had taught school two years before and made an early call upon my former assistant who had now, although a woman, become principal. She was no dumpling. She was a sane, self-poised, capable woman who had not taught school long enough to make her real bossy, but was drawing near to the danger line. I had liked her well, but had exterminated no thoughts of loving her. She was thoroughly wholesome, of good stature, good health, had a clear understanding and an analytical brain. I invited her to go for a walk down by the river where it was cool and the shadows threw the trees upside down upon the waters.

"Miss Clemens," said I, when we had grown weary of casting pebbles into the river and had grown silent listening to the gurgling of the ripples running under the shelving rocks, "you have taught school as long as is good for you. What do you say to our getting married and settling down to live like other folks?"

After thinking half a minute, "your proposition does not betray any transports of sentiment," she said, "but it looks good to me and I rather think I'll accept." I took her hand, drew her to me and kissed her and so our troth was plighted. We were married within a fortnight, honeymooned in the mountains for a few weeks, went back to my school and again took up the thread of life.

Meantime, my little dumpling had thrown up her place in our school and gone down into the valley to teach in the country, where she married a young fruit grower who fell in love with her and there she still lives rearing ducks and chickens, and other things that need to be mothered, including a few children I believe. I have not seen her since.

My wife has our eighth baby in her arms and her first in the high school football team preparing for the university. Our children are all sturdy and self-reliant and I am troubled with few fears for their futures. We treat each other with courtesy and consideration, seldom with any demonstrations of affection, and yet we have grown extremely fond of each other. There are two of us. We do not always agree, but we never quarrel. We have not been unhappy, nor have we basked in bliss. We have a common purpose and to that we are devoting all our energies, the tiring of our eight children for useful, fruitful, forceful American citizenship.

Often I have wondered if I did the right thing. Often I see the eyes of that dumpling looking up into mine with a light in them that was never seen on sea or land and certainly not in the eyes of my wife. Then I look over at my wife and say, "You splendid creature! What a model wife and mother you have made!"

That's it, gentlemen. "I don't see so very much philosophy about that," observed the Judge.

"Nor do I," said the Doctor. "I was expecting you to predict a matrimonial philosophy that would tell the rest of us whether we did right or no as well as to warn the rising generation what to do or not to do with regard to marriage."

"He has given me a chill with his cold, calculating, unfeeling concern for posterity," complained the newspaper man. "You must be a nice family of icicles over at your house."

"I felt in my bones that that much vaunted matrimonial philosophy would peter out," declared Abner Appleby.

"Well, it hasn't petered out," retorted the Professor, "and if you fellows get bumped with what follows remember that you brought it upon yourselves." With that he returned to his philosophy as to a bunch of switches, resolved on sparing no back that needed basting.

"I am going to begin with you, Len Harper," the Professor began, "and your whimsical notions of you and your wife raising children in the likeness of your dead sweetheart and her dead husband. Gentlemen, whenever you see a man wholly prudent look out for a countervailing soft spot somewhere. It's there. Len can repeat all of the 'Lady of the Lake,' 'Lucile,' and more than half of 'Lallah Rookh.' That is evidence enough as to his essential mellowness, no matter how good a bargainer he is."

It is said that there is as much of a tree below ground as above. Very well, cut off the top at the first branch and you have a fair representation of the family tree of every human being on the globe. Fancy that root system reaching back to the first man and woman that ever were, gathering up germs from every pair in the strain since then, and focussing them all on that individual. The pedigrees of all of us are exactly the same length, but alike in nothing else. Each individual from start to finish has contributed a germ to that living stream. Those germs are more numerous than the sands of the sea. Out of the confluence of two of these germs two germs meet, seize each other and a new cell is formed. That is at the instant of conception. The character of that cell is there fixed for all time. There is not another one like it in the universe. It grows, divides and grows again, only to repeat the process millions of times until an adult person is produced, sustained, dead and buried. At the instant of the creation of the cell heredity has done its complete work. After that the issue is one of nutrition and environment which may modify but cannot change the essential characteristic of that individual being.

That, then, becomes of your fancy that you and your wife have been rearing children in the likeness of John Marshall and Minnie St. John? It is absurd. There has been no harm in it, and I would not have smashed your pretty conceit if you fellows had not clamored for my matrimonial philosophy, and a true philosopher cares nothing for broken heads or hearts. Where you did wrong was in being dead in prudence, as some persons are said to be in sin, instead of alive to the main currents of your own being. That cost your sweetheart her happiness and her life, your mother's days were shortened, and you have lived a melancholy man ever since. You have been punished enough, and so I pass on to Abner Appleby.

Here we have a strong but unlovely character. All the human love you were capable of, Abner, went out to your Helen, but your greatest love was in acquisitiveness and the mainpring of that love was pride in personal prowess. You were obsessed. You think now that you loved Helen beyond all things, but you knew then that you loved best the exercise of your own robust, keen-sighted, indomitable power for acquisition. By a tender nurture of the soul of you she might have buried the flint of you under a wealth of humus and made you productive, but her task would have been risky and she might have lived a more intolerable life with you than without you. Only the grace of God working through Helen could have changed your character, and his grace you have not sought. There is no sympathy to be wasted on you. Your son was wisely begotten under a leaden opportunity was afforded him to grow normally. He made sure of his Helen first. God bless him for it! I congratulate you on the progress your family is making from father to son.

Now, Doctor, for your scalp. You came out with a love for a girl behind you to whom you were engaged, an ordinary woman in every way. Your practice threw you into possession of the whole heart of a most extraordinary woman and you lacked the perception to see your path of duty clear. You blighted her life, have burdened your own life with hypocrisy and made of your married life a partnership when it should have been a composite with great possibilities for your progeny. And all because you lacked the moral courage to withdraw your promise made to a surgeon who would wield you the knife when it hurts awfully, but you do it to save a life. We can't get through life without giving and receiving hurts. They must be borne, but our instincts are safer guides than our conventions, and you allowed a conventional concept of manly honor to blind you to the admonitions of your profoundest instincts, and it is these instincts, not knowledge or judgment, that hold the world together. Whoever follows his profounder instincts, his deeper promptings, the main currents of his being, will not go far wrong, only one must be sure that they are the profounder instincts, deeper promptings, main currents and not waves of feeling. To make this sure we must sometimes sit down, wait, cool off, and learn to know ourselves.

Now, Ward Whipple, I'll attend to your case and that of your old match-making Aunt Susanne. Where her nephews and nieces missed it was in being fools more concerned for property interests than for happiness. Where she missed it was in undertaking to breed children as she would animals without considering that people have souls and animals probably have not. Nature has provided for the perpetuity of the race on purely animal lines, but having done this, the God of nature has left vast scope for variation by attraction and repulsion. Sex attraction is fundamental and sufficient for the maintenance of the animal man, and it is probable that marriages in plenty have no other foundation, but who knows why two germs out of thousands should rush from the stream into each other's arms to form a new creative cell whilst all the others flow on to destruction? That is a physiological fact inexplicable by science, or philosophy, but there is a psychological fact as certain it is as inexplicable and that fact is love, not wholly separable from sex love but transcending it. Your aunt left that fact out of consideration and failed as miserably as the whole world has failed in basing marriage on convenience, on interest or family authority, instead of upon that power of attraction which certain personalities, like certain chemicals, have for each other. No fact has been more potent in debauching the world than this of marrying property with property, and title with title. There was a property basis for all that your aunt attempted to do in intermarrying for physical or temperamental ends, and all the ends she sought were contemptible in comparison with the psychological influence that should have dominated. These influences work like divine grace without observation for it goeth and cometh as it listeth, yet with a certainty that disarms doubt. You folks got about what was coming to you and deserved more suffering than you endured.

The "Mysterious Experiences of a Matter-of-Fact-Man" were mainly a dream. The late Professor Oliver Langworthy hypnotized our friend the Judge and took him on a merry mental chase while sitting under the magnolia at St. Augustine. Portions of the judge's narrative I cannot account for in his presence and will not try. Who can account for hypnotism itself, or that autohypnotism that Langworthy evidently practiced upon himself, probably to his own destruction as it might easily have been to the destruction of one of his subjects. The influence that he possessed over Genoa, even when operating at a distance, is inexplicable rather than extraordinary. Paddling along the shores of eternity and a limitless space, what can we know of what lies beyond? But we have all the less reason for casting aside a well-grounded philosophy and the scientific method of investigation to launch uncharted and without compass upon a sea of disordered conjecture. We shall do well enough to navigate the air without essaying an airless, immeasurable space. When Langworthy insisted that a perfect matrimony unites the twain into one indissoluble being he was wrong. We are dual beings as we are, each of us, flesh and spirit, but when we die we shall put off the flesh and be spirit only. That will terminate duality, and sex is of the flesh, not spirit, and it, too, will end with death.

When we come to the Judge's own matrimonial experience we are on firmer ground. It is another case of two germs leaving the flood of life and flying into each other's arms. Their romance was short, simple and exquisite. Happy is that marriage that cannot be made the foundation for even a short story!

Now, Si, just a few words concerning you and your non-scantalious affinity. You fell in love with your schoolmate and she with you after she had married your mutual friend many years her senior, and you ran away, carrying your misery with you and leaving her and her unhappiness behind. Your John Henderson did wrong to take even an unsought advantage of a child's confiding and susceptible heart. He should have known that sometime that heart would reach out for its true mate and find it. The sorrow should have been his, not yours and hers, but here is where our conventional morality comes in to play the mischief. It prevents the undoing of a wrong and robs life of its profoundest joy. We but try to against the marriage contract and accept that as final. I am no free-lover. I abominate divorce, but I never was partial to vicarious punishment. Your Aunt Susanne, Mr. Whipple, cut in pieces a villainous assortment of conjugal knots and in doing so did right. The only thing that she did that was right. You and Alice, Si, should have done the same thing that your aunt did for her group of incapables. That you did not was very brave and foolish of you both.

I'll be fair with you fellows, continued the Professor, after the storm had subsided, and treat myself as unsparingly as I have treated you.

My early matrimonial philosophy was a hoax. Reason is not man's highest quality or best guide. His safest monitors are the instincts of his race. These reasons may modify, hold in check, regulate, but it has no right to supplant them. By listening to the imaginary call of my progeny, instead of the promptings of my heart, and running away from my dumping of a primary teacher, I made the blunder of my life and have known it every minute since. Someday I shall prostrate myself at her feet and crave her forgiveness. My judgment has been justified by visible realities, but the invisible realities are the real realities. Had I married her we might have given the world a richer man, by their harmonious organizations, might have leavened the human lump instead of merely doing material things.

Our institution of marriage is much like our institution of law, needful because of the hardness of men's hearts. As humanity grows into that anarchy that abides no law because it needs none, marriage contracts will pass away and men and women will dwell together in dual blessedness, correcting mistakes as they discover that they have made them, with a minimum of suffering and a maximum of benignant self-sacrifice. The future will lead head to interfere as little as possible with affairs of the heart and suffer the main currents of being to flow on unvexed from that exhaustless urn from whence also cometh the flood of years. As well, almost, may we shut the door of our hearts to the face of the Holy Spirit as the door of the heart to the face of that love that lightenth and beautifeth the world. Only beware of whims, obsessions and that counterfeit of love which we call infatuation, as cruel, as jealousy and as selfish as Satan. The supposition that our heavenly Father placed us here without power to scent our way to marital happiness is as certainly an impiety as to suppose that he placed us here without power to discern the way that leads to eternal life.

"I move we adjourn," demanded Abner Appleby.

"Carried!" declared the Judge in the midst of a storm of eyes.

And the Galoot Club went out.

One of these companies, the California Gas and Electric Corporation, was the pioneer in the long-distance transmission of electricity at high voltage. About twelve years ago it began trying out the idea, first at about forty miles distance, later running the line up to over a hundred miles; and later still to much greater distances. These experiments were considered risky at the time, and much credit is due Mr. De Sabia, then president of the company, for having the nerve to back them financially. Their success has vastly increased the usefulness of hydro-electric enterprises the world over.

From the list in the second paragraph preceding this, one may tell through what company he pays directly to the revenues of the Pacific Gas and Electric company. Three or four of these subsidiary companies supply gas only; most of them supply electricity.

With this list in mind, and with a glance at the map, the significance and force of the following quotation from the same Prospectus quoted above may be gathered.

"The business of the Company is so diversified and covers such a varied territory and the Company is so well equipped for economical production on a large scale and has such a strong grip on the situation through the ownership of distributing systems in the chief cities and towns—that it would be difficult for any competitor to do it serious injury."

This quotation is exactly true. The Pacific Gas and Electric company now has a practical monopoly of the power market of Central California, maintained "through the ownership of distributing systems in the chief cities and towns"—to re-quote a part of the preceding paragraph. Though the quotation is two years old it is true to-day. The company is still doing everything in its power to retain its control of that market by extending its own lines and by acquiring the ownership of further distributing systems.

A statement in a government engineer's report is interesting in this connection.

"A consolidation of the present holdings of the California Gas and Electric Corporation, the Western Power company, and those of the Pacific Light and Power company, allied companies on the San Joaquin river would practically control the power possibilities and market of Central California."

Such a consolidation, though not inherently probable, is a possibility that should be considered in any discussion of the policy of state or national regulation.

To quote again from this engineer's report: "Nearly all the plants of this company are located on land that has passed out of Government ownership."

Under the state laws, no charge is made for the right to develop electric power from the streams of the state.

In short, the Pacific Gas and Electric company is making a gross revenue of more than $4,500,000 a year from the utilization of streams under state control without paying the state anything for the use of those streams.

over the land is of no value unless the holder thereof has water to convey over it.

There is another factor of some moment involved in this question. It is settled that the states have certain powers over the appropriators of water and may to a degree regulate the service and the rates charged, the use of the water being considered a public service. Now come some at least of the federal officials who have the power of approval or rejection of a right of way and assert that they should and will retain a supervisory power over the permittees as a condition of the approval of the right of way. It is admitted, I believe, that this power in the federal officer, if it exists, is contractual and not an act of sovereignty. But nevertheless the dual right of supervision is claimed, and of course that cannot be tolerated. Both the state and a federal official cannot make rates for the same company at the same time, nor can both acting independently make regulations as to the character of the service. Sooner or later one or the other must be given exclusive authority, and one of the purposes of this bill is to settle that point in favor of the states. It is to be observed that the power claimed by the federal officials in this direction is not born of any jurisdiction specifically conferred on them by act of Congress; they are merely authorized to approve or not approve an application for a right of way, and with that much power they

The Old Constitution of California.

California's first constitution was completed October 10, 1849, and adopted by the people November 13, of the same year. With some amendments adopted in 1862 it stood as the basic law of the new commonwealth for thirty years and a very sound document it was.

The convention that framed it assembled at Monterey. It contained forty-eight members, although not so many participated. There were few in that convention whose names loomed large thereafter in the history of the commonwealth. It had not the alleged big men who drafted the new constitution. No great formative power of statesmanship was needed at that time. Plain common sense served better. The special committee having immediate charge of the task had two good state constitutions to guide them, those of New York and Iowa, the latter being at that time the latest and best product of constitution-building in this country. One element in the committee and convention leaned toward the New York form, the other toward the Iowa. The latter was the stronger and the greater part of our organic law was adapted, if not adopted, from the constitution of Iowa, although the product was not unaffected by the New York instrument.

There were not in those days any great reforms pressing upon a corporation-ridden commonwealth as there were thirty years later. The need was for a government that would protect property and give individual enterprise the utmost freedom to do its best. The task was simple. It had been better if the organic law had followed more closely after the form and substance of the national constitution than after that of any of the states, but no other state had accepted the national model for state purposes no one thought of taking that model for California. The states derived their forms of government from the original colonies rather than from the nation and California saw no reason for departing from the general tendency.

The preamble to the constitution of '49 reads thus: "We, the people of California, grateful to Almighty God for our freedom, in order to secure its blessings, do establish this constitution." In those days California was a free commonwealth. Under that constitution the people became self governing. That they have not remained so is to the shame and humiliation of those who came, or were born into, the state after the Argonauts. But there were then no great corporations allied in an offensive and defensive compact (more offensive than defensive) to subvert popular government in the interests of an incorporated plutocracy. Thirty years later that same preamble, with the addition of the words "and perpetuate" became the preamble of the new constitution. Thirty years later still, in 1909, if the new constitution were drafted, the preamble would, in very truth, have to declare its purpose to be "the recovery" of self government. Thanks to God, rather than to the manhood of this commonwealth, the power to recover the prerogatives of free government is still in our possession, but the thing itself, in very essence, has been in the custody of organized rapacity for a quarter of a century. For that length of time, if not longer, California has been a political dependency of a group of greedy corporations. Unless the rising generation can be made to see and know this the powers of free government will so slip out of the hands of the people that they can not be recovered and an incorporated plutocracy will exercise the powers of government for as many years as Satan was kept a prisoner in the pit.

The old constitution contained 156 sections of which 109 were practically taken over into the new constitution bodily. The old constitution occupies 37 pages in the book in which it is printed. The new constitution, as we now have it, occupies 98 pages in the same book. The old constitution was what every constitution ought to be, an organic law. The constitution as we now have it contains more legislation than organic law and is vociferous of a popular distrust of representative government, such distrust being based upon a firm conviction in the popular mind that representative government does not represent public sentiment but is prostituted to represent special interests antagonistic to, and subversive of, public interests, but that belongs to another chapter.

The old constitution was a sound document and reflected much credit upon those who compiled it. It was based upon the theory that ours is a representative government and that persons elected to represent the public interest will generally prove faithful to their charge. That instrument gave to the executive, to courts and legislatures, all powers needed for establishing and maintaining a stable, responsible government. The new constitution was a confession that these powers had been misused, as indeed they had, and the hopes of the people betrayed.

have assumed the rest. The statute recites that the Secretary of the Interior is "authorized and empowered, under general regulations to be fixed by him, to permit the use of rights of way through the public lands. Provided, that such permit shall be allowed within or through any of the said parks, or any forest, military, Indian or other reservation only upon the approval of the chief officer of the department under whose supervision such park or reservation falls and upon a finding by him that the same is not incompatible with the public interest." Thus the Secretary of the Interior may act only when some bureau chief says he may, and the latter may or at least does say the word only when the applicant has entered into such stipulations as are prescribed by him. The Secretary of the Interior may, if he be so minded, make further conditions. Thus the so-called federal power of supervision and the claim to a federal tax or annual fee from the ones using the right of way rest upon the contract exacted as the consideration for approving the application, backed by the power conferred by the present law to revoke the permit at pleasure and with out without stated cause. The states on the other hand, exercise their supervisory powers as one of the functions of sovereignty. Since one of these conflicting powers must give way, can there be any question as to which one it should be? Will the states be asked to abdicate one of their inherent powers and duties in favor of an executive officer having only contractual powers? To state such a proposition is to answer it.

It is submitted that the bill referred to will effectually and properly settle this question of jurisdiction, and at the same time strengthen the hand of the states in dealing with these very important and valuable concessions.

It is proper to state in this connection that the present Secretary of the Interior has not yet been called upon to act in these matters and nothing contained in the foregoing has any reference to his attitude in the premises.

Betwixt Now and December.

There are now three months and more before Congress meets again. During this interval, besides swinging around the circle, President Taft must make ready his message to Mr Aldrich's Senate and Uncle Joe Cannon's House of Representatives. He is commissioned by the whole people to speak on their behalf to those two assemblages, representative, respectively, of states and of subdivisions of states. What will he say to them? It is reported that he and his cabinet are wrestling with the Interstate Commerce Commission and the anti-trust laws. These are hard nuts. Perhaps he can crack them. The American people will dearly love to see him make the effort. Not in many years has a message been watched for with so much interest as this one will be. The people are anxious to have their president say something. He has been too still by half. They long to hear his voice.

Decency or Death.

The temperance forces in Sacramento, wearying of compromise and an ineffectual conservative movement against the dives and deadfalls, have thrown down the gauntlet and are waging a campaign to make the capital city a dry town. A Sacramento in which nothing spirituous could be had to drink approximates the unthinkable, but the only way to make the American saloon decent is to force upon it the alternative of decency or death. It may even then prefer hark-kari to being clean. Somehow all this talk about the breweries and wholesale liquor interests joining in an effort to make the saloons decent eventuates in precious little. In few instances have hours been shortened, dives closed, the number of saloons decreased or the characters of saloon men been improved. "Decency or Death" does not make a bad war cry, and in not a few cases has it resulted in death to the saloon and greatly to public advantage. Sacramento liquor men right well deserve a first-class shanking up.

Congratulations to Los Angeles.

If pluck and luck can win, Los Angeles will rank next to London in territorial expansion and make San Francisco look to its laurels as a commercial metropolis. It now extends from the foothills to the sea and brings within its jurisdiction what is to become the most important port on the American South Pacific Coast. It will require a vast expenditure of money and an unflinching loyalty of the people of Los Angeles to their city's commercial interests to free their access to the sea and keep it free, but we mistake the temper of that people if they prove less than adequate to the task in hand. By manipulation of successive boards of supervisors of Los Angeles county, and by corraling and converting to their own use the not too self-reliant town of San Pedro, predatory interests had well nigh reduced the harbor possibilities of that port to exclusive possession. Los Angeles will now secure adequate access to the world's highway, without discrimination, for all who would fetch and carry between that port and the maritime markets of the world. Not only is Los Angeles to be congratulated on the absorption by that city of Wilmington and San Pedro, but congratulations are due all Southern California, the territories to the east and the country as far as the Mississippi river. Benefits will accrue to at least one-fourth of the area of the United States. The Pacific Coast is not so rich in harbors that it can afford to permit one of them to be bottled in the interests of any one or two lines of transportation.

Ocean to Ocean.

Again the report is current that the Harriman interests have secured control of the New York Central railroad, the Vanderbilts dropping out. We are not among the number of those who fly to arms every time they hear the name of Harriman pronounced. We hope that this rumor will prove well founded. Ocean to ocean consolidations of transportation lines should work out to the public interest, if not immediately, then by and by. A unified control of connecting lines should make for expedition, economy in handling traffic and for cheapness. It should facilitate commerce. The Harriman interests are highly energetic. The Vanderbilts are a spent force. It would be good news that the Gould and the Hill interests had perfected a similar ocean to ocean consolidation, as the Hawley interests are near to doing, but the Harriman interests should somehow be pried loose from the Sunset Route. The unification of parallel ocean to ocean lines is as clearly against public policy as that of single systems is favorable to it. No one man, or set of men, should be permitted to master the transportation of the continent.

Those Boy Bandits.

It is not surprising to learn that the Santa Clara bank robbers are under eighteen years of age. There would have been occasion for surprise had they proven to be mature men. The desperate age of a criminal's life is between the ages of 17 and 22. During that period he has all the tendencies toward criminality that he will ever have without a particle of sense as to their manifestation. He has daring because he does not know how to estimate risk. He takes life with impunity for the same reason that a five-year-old will torture the cat or baby sister. He is without realization of what cruelty means. Nor does it follow that he is a hopeless case and should be put out of the way. It is entirely possible for the Santa Clara bank robbers to yet become convinced that a life of crime is not desirable and that there are better ways for getting a living, but to make such a conviction effective they must be taught how to make an honest living, how to perform some service that the world wants performed and is willing to pay for. With a State Reformatory in the hands of practical penologists, and not politicians of the Warren Porter stripe, California can set such youngsters upon their feet and make good citizens out of them, but out of the spoils system of maintaining reformatory institutions no good thing can come. California must redeem itself from that system before it can redeem untrained youth from criminality. For the edification of those to whom nothing unaccompanied by the dollar sign is intelligible, we beg leave to add that it costs the state $200 a year to maintain each criminal in prison and $2,000 a year out of prison, whereas the average annual value of each adult citizen of good character to the commonwealth exceeds $1,000 a year.

Justice Through Private Enterprise.

Great is private enterprise! We all believe in it. The desire to "let government do it" is born of weakness and a sense of inability to cope with hard conditions. The splendid progress made in ravaging our continent was made by private enterprise. It has proved itself equal to every emergency which the spirit of exploitation has been compelled to confront. If we can direct some of this energy and capacity to the task of establishing justice in this country we shall have it established so summarily and effectively as to make the criminal head swim. Why not give it a chance?

Elsewhere in this issue of The California Weekly we give the concluding article of a very interesting and instructive series on "England's Better Criminal Procedure." That justice is more expeditiously, certainly and cheaply administered in England than in America no one conversant with the facts will question. A potent factor in that consummation is that, in England, private, or associated, enterprise is as free to undertake the apprehension and prosecution of any criminal as are the officers of the law. The negligence or wilful dereliction of duty on the part of the public prosecutor does not stop the wheels of justice. Any citizen or group of citizens may set those wheels in motion and keep them going until the issue has been tried to final determination, and a public prosecutor, beholden to a special interest, cannot stop the proceeding or shelter the accused from confronting his accusers. Our laws afford no opportunity for public spirit and private enterprise to act in this regard, except through the public prosecutor. They should be so amended as to enable any citizen to be a vindicator of justice.

WHO SHALL SET THE PACE?

The Democratic party, by its policy of negation, compromise and fusion, has eliminated itself from authority and influence in the affairs of state and nation.

Nevertheless there still exists in the political life a progressive and a conservative element, and both of these elements are now to be found within the ranks of the Republican party, where the conservative element verges upon the reactionary. While this line of cleavage may not disrupt the party, it is certain to precipitate a contest for the control of the party and the formulating of its policies.

The machinery of the Republican party, in California as in all other corporation-ridden commonwealths, is in the hands of the ultra conservative, or reactionary element. This element stands for all the vested wrongs which antiquity and immemorial custom have bequeathed us. It holds to the doctrine that if the policies of the state and nation are such as to afford all the privileges and perquisites which "big business" requires prosperity will somehow filter down to the commonality. It holds that the ambitions of the commonality should be satisfied with wages; its frugality, with opportunity to invest its savings in promotion enterprises; its independence of spirit, with making choice between two candidates for office, both of whom were named in advance by an alliance of the political bureaus of affiliated corporations, and either of whom will prove equally satisfactory to that alliance. Whatsoever is more than these the forces of a reactionary conservatism look upon as demagogic, socialistic and dangerous.

The progressive element is not satisfied with political and economic conditions as they are. It knows that they can not remain as they are however satisfactory they may be, for, by an immutable law of nature, change is ceaseless and humanity must either go forward or backward. The progressive element desires to go forward. It was that spirit that brought the Republican party into being, and it is only by a continuous manifestation of that spirit that it can remain in being.

The progressive element in the Republican party now stands, in brief, for a permanent commission of tariff experts to advise the public, the President and Congress as to how much protection, if any at all, is needed for being at once just to producer and consumer; for the non-alienation of any part of the common heritage in perpetuity except for agricultural use and settlement; for the power to levy a national income tax; for such a revision of our criminal laws and procedures as will permit the conviction of millionaire malefactors whose guilt no one denies or disbelieves; for the direct nomination by advisory vote of party candidates for United States Senator; for a non-partisanly elected judiciary; for the emancipation of the party from corporate control.

Which of these elements within the Republican party shall set the pace for the party in California? Shall the pace be set by the hired political professionals of the Aldrich-Cannon school, or by such volunteers in the cause of justice and progress as Roosevelt, Dolliver, La Follette and Cummins, in the East, and of Pardee, Rowell, Gates, Lissner, Stimson, Davis, Forbes, and a host of other willing workers in our own state? It is important to the future of Republicanism in California to determine who is to carry its banner and what is to be emblazoned thereon.

It is not too soon to take in hand the planning and organizing of the campaign of 1910. If Republicanism in California is to stand for a progressive and constructive policy, if it is to be anything else than a haven of refuge for a spiritless materialism that condones and excuses successful rascality, the cohorts of political righteousness must get busy. The Lincoln-Roosevelt movement failed of accomplishing all that it hoped to for the reason that it lacked that degree of organization which would have enabled a sound public sentiment to express itself with effect. The Direct Primary will make such expression easier than it has been in the past, provided that the influences that work for good are not dissipated among innumerable, impossible candidates while the forces of unrighteousness mobilize and cast a compact vote for candidates representative of a reactionary, instead of progressive, Republicanism.

It is time to mix the war-paint.

ON THE EBB TIDE.

There are times when the vitalities of men sink low. This happens in each person's organism twice each twenty-four hours, usually at about 4 o'clock a. m. and p. m. Afterward the return tide of vitality surges back and we are ourselves again.

The same thing happens in every public movement. There is a time when enthusiasms surge to the highest pitch and when they recede to a mere lapping of the mudflats of endeavor. It is of no use to quarrel with this flux and flow of moral vitalities. They are part of our natures and we must bear the burden as best we may.

San Francisco is out on the ebb tide relative to the graft prosecutions. It is sick and tired of them. It wishes there could be an end to them. Thousands remained away from the primary election because they wanted to wash their hands of the whole miserable business.

All know in their hearts that Calhoun and his fellow grafters are guilty, but they see no possibility of convicting him or them and they are ready to vote, as tens of thousands voted in 1864, that the war is a failure and peace should be had at any price, even upon terms as ignoble as those suggested by the groveling, foot-fawning San Francisco Chronicle. The manhood of San Francisco is unmanned. This tide is out. The moralities are at their ebb.

But there are yet more than two months in which that tide may return. The California Weekly counts on its return. It anticipates that the red corpuscles in veins and arteries will shine through the skin with the return of the flood. Then look out. The persistent campaign of falsehood and misrepresentation carried on by Calhoun, at infinite cost to himself and immeasurable shame to his mercenaries, has deceived many but not all. By November the men of San Francisco may be made to see things as they are and to know that if liberty is to be preserved, if free institutions are to survive, criminals who debauch the representatives of the people must, if they would be set free, set up some plea other than that they are rich.

Let it be remembered on behalf of a tired people that they have withstood this onslaught for three years; that they have faced all the forces that associated millions could command and that heretofore at every trial at arms they have achieved a notable victory. If they faltered this once are we to despair of them? Not so. The battle royal will be fought in November. Bide the time, meanwhile, and keep the powder dry. It was a long way from the Wilderness to Appomattox, but by fighting it out on that line Appomattox was reached, free government was saved and the union preserved. Our institutions are as truly in jeopardy now as they were then. This nation can no more endure with one law for restraining the poor man and another, or none at all, for controlling the millionaire than it could have endured half slave and half free.

AS OLD AS HISTORY.

It was during the days of the Tarquins in Rome that a body of young patricians resolved, "That a king is a human being from whom one may obtain where right or where wrong may be necessary; that there is room for favor and for kindness, that a king can be angry and can forgive, that he knows the difference between a friend and an enemy, that laws are dead, inexorable things more beneficial and advantageous for the poor than for the rich; that they allow for no relaxation or indulgence if one transgress bounds; that it is a perilous state, amidst so many human errors, to live solely by one's integrity."

These words were penned by Livy perhaps a decade before the dawn of our Christian era and were written regarding a time 250 years earlier. Ever and always the patrician, prosperous element has been struggling for special privileges and exemptions, but very willing that "dead and inexorable laws" may be looked upon as beneficial and advantageous for governing the poor if not for the rich.

This was the essence of that controversy which waged for centuries between the patricians and the commons in Rome and which resulted in the overthrow of the republic and the establishment of the empire. Again it became the vital issue under the empire and was waged until it overthrew that. Not for one year, one day or one hour has that issue ceased to be in conflict in the affairs of men. It put France through fire and sword and it now cleaves Russia from center to circumference.

This is the issue which the men of San Francisco have just decided, thrice in a single day, in favor of the patrician element. It was so decided in the nomination of Crocker on the Republican ticket, of Leland on the Democratic and of McCarthy on the Union Labor. Whether, in the November flip of the political coin it comes up heads or tails or milled edge the patrician element will win, the result will mean the enforcement of the law against the poor with all its inexorableness while the predatory rich will be dismissed from custody, not because they are guiltless, but because their conviction, under laws which they have made for their own advantage, is a matter of vast difficulty.

Fortunately November may retrieve the disaster of August. It is possible, but not with any one of the three tickets now in the field. So far as the equal administration of justice is concerned it is not to be looked for from either of them. For salvation San Francisco must now look to either the Good Government League or some kindred organization embracing men who stand for equality before the law, whether the accused be rich or poor, patrician or plebeian.

Heretofore in the world's history the patrician element has always won out, but only to involve all in a common, irretrievable run followed by a social reorganization. There is something in the nature of man that will not suffer any state long to exist or social order to perpetuate itself on any basis other than that of equality before the law. If the patrician element in San Francisco desires to inaugurate another era of sandlotism they are doing exactly the right thing to bring it about.

What of the Good Government League?

All eyes in San Francisco will now be turned to the Good Government League. It has saved the day before and it can save it again. The three "regular" tickets in the field are regular in the sense that they are all equally affiliated with the political bureau of the Southern Pacific company and allied corporations. True to past policies the people are given their choice between candidates all of whom were named by and in the interests of special privilege and an inequality before the law. It will make no more than a trifling difference to the Harriman-Herrin-Hellman combination whether, after election, that combination deals with Crocker, Leland or McCarthy. With Crocker or Leland the dealings will be among gentlemen of essentially equal station. If relations must be sustained with McCarthy there will be a trifling sacrifice of patrician dignity, but that will be all. Less than half the men of San Francisco have spoken and, of these, nearly half have declared for right things. They will so declare again if opportunity be afforded them. As for the remaining half of the whole no one can speak with authority, but we must always believe in the people until there is no longer room for faith in them, and it is seldom that an aroused public sentiment does not declare for the right. It is up to independent minded men to set before the people, by agitation and discriminating endorsement of candidates already nominated, such a ticket as may claim the suffrages of free men determined that free government and an equal administration of the laws shall not perish from this city and from this commonwealth. Never had any political organization a better opportunity to show its metal than now afforded the Good Government League.

Why We Bolt the Ticket.

The California Weekly has no use for party politics in municipal affairs. Neither has the voter. Party organizations are merely convenient mechanism for foisting upon the voting constituency candidates whom they do not want.

Fraud vitiates all contracts, obligations, allegiances. In the primary election just held in San Francisco thousands of Democrats and Labor Party men of easy civic virtue registered as Republicans with no other purpose than to degrade the Republican party by voting for Calhoun candidates for Republican nominations. They are not, never were and never will be Republicans, for which true Republicans may thank their good angels. Not one of this ilk voted for Byron Mauzy and if any of them voted for any good man he did so blunderingly and without intention so to do.

There were Republicans who voted the Crocker ticket. Not all Republicans are clear-headed or of sterling character, and not a few are suffering a species of heart sickness elsewhere described in this paper. We make no apologies for them. They have humiliated their party, for, if all Republicans had stood up and voted right, a different result would have been achieved.

The point we make is that there is no moral obligation resting upon any Republican to support the Crocker combination merely because it masquerades under the name of Republican. Not being named by Republicans it is not Republican. It is spurious.

Finally, even though named by Republicans, the Crocker combination ought not to be supported by Republicans who value their manhood and their city's honor. The right to scratch a ticket is divine. It is unalienable. It is the only method left, in the last stages, of curing evils in our political life. This voters understand perfectly well and only hide-bound, slavish adherents to party knowingly swallow swill because it chances to be poured from a wine bottle bearing their favorite label. The Republican ticket named last Tuesday in San Francisco can be immensely improved by vigorous scratching.

Was it Nothing to Them?

The registration showed 84,571 voters in San Francisco qualified to vote at the late primary. Very likely the 4,571 could be stricken off as representing fraudulent registrations, absentees and others from one cause or another, disqualified from voting. There were 36,998 votes cast at such primary. For every such vote cast there was another vote that might have been cast but was not. Did this selection of party candidates mean nothing to them?

It may be assumed that every citizen with an active civic conscience, and every citizen without any civic conscience, voted. Those who stand for right things got to the polls and found there awaiting their coming their brethren who know no inspiration that a crass materialism does not prompt, no deity but the dollar. All of these men performed their obligations to their city as they were given to perceive them and so stand acquitted of the sin of indifference.

What of that body of political protoplasm that remained unmoved, uninterested, uninspired and indifferent throughout the campaign? To the credit of the direct primary let it be recorded that the vote was nearly what it would have been under the old system. Something near 50 per cent. of the total vote was cast, whereas, under the old system, barely 25 per cent. usually turned out, but even that degree of success falls short of what must be if this is to become and remain a government of by and for the people. It is just as certainly impossible that men shall neglect to use the right of suffrage and not lose that right as that they can neglect to use their arms, legs and brains and not lose the power to make them serviceable.

Heney the Issue.

While it is tremendously important to have a man of character at the head of the city government in San Francisco, important to the entire state as well as to San Francisco (inasmuch as the character of San Francisco gives color to the state), nevertheless, the pivotal office is that of district attorney. Under our system of misgovernment the district attorney is all powerful. Though he cannot always accord justice to those who rightfully demand it he can refuse justice to whom he will and no power but the ballot can call him to account. Mr. Heney stands for an enforcement of the law. Mr. Fickert, by open confession of the Herrin-Hellman-Calhoun organ, the Chronicle, stands for letting unconvicted felons go, so that they be rich and their conviction attended with consequences disagreeable to themselves and their friends. Mr. Heney expected to be a candidate by petition, but more than 7,000 of his fellow citizens voted for him upon his own volition and his name is before the people. He has offered his life that justice may be had and if this city refuses to elect him district attorney in November the wrath of the nation will be visited upon it in a way that will be felt in every counting-room within the city.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

There are times when the soul grows weary with the struggle for justice, when the way of the rascal is seen to lie along paths of prosperity and pleasantness leaving nothing to be desired, when the surging of the heedless, heedless crowd toward its own unrelieved misery threatens to ride down and run over all who would turn it in a contrary direction. There are hours of dejection that come to all those who would make the world better if they could, hours when the heart waxes sick and the courage fails. At such times it seems the part of wisdom to eat, drink and be merry while we live lest tomorrow we die and lose our opportunity for enjoyment.

The members of a church receive no dividends, but are forever paying assessments to keep the institution going. No moral movement ever paid its own way, and no iniquity ever failed to yield a profit. Few of those who stand habitually for right things in political life are honored with office, while time serves, and the henchmen of political criminals, coddle their carcasses on soft cushions and grow fat on the bounties of dispensers of patronage. We see daily before our faces a crass ignorance growing increasingly influential while a cultivated intelligence is shouldered out of the counsels of public affairs.

In industry we see thousands of children deprived of their childhood, women forced to bear the burden of bread-winning at wages that would hardly suffice for or gratuity for slaves, while vast forces combine to mulet the unheeding multitude for the appeasing of an insatiable appetite for a wealth which the possessors of it cannot use and which, if left to their children, will as surely ruin them as the degradation of poverty will ruin their victims. These things are done, the heart sickens, and we would be of little use to try to disguise the malady that gnaws. A strain is put upon our faith that God is in his world and that he doeth all things well. In anguish one cries out to know why good health was not made catching rather than disease, why the policy was preferable than bad, why the service of righteousness does not command larger salaries than the service of iniquity, and why, in the nature of things, multimillionaires are not made rather through an unselfish service of mankind than by the questionable benevolence of the pinch.

There is no telling. We simply can not know why the universe was ordered as it was or why this world was not laid down on different lines. We have to take the beneficence of our Creator and the desirability of justice, as we take hope of immortality, unreservedly upon faith, faith in God and faith in man, faith in the value of unselfish service and faith in that inviolability of the laws of right that will mete out to those who do wrong and inflict injustice the due recompense of wrong-doing and the wages of the unjust.

Of this we may be certain, and in this we may take comfort, without gloating aforesaid over the miseries of those who are to be come up with in eternity, although they avoid the thunderbolt during this life. No one of us can desire to see any Dives with parched tongue pleading for water, the more especially if he also plead that those who follow in his footsteps may be warned of their danger, but there is comfort in the thought that if there be those who escape justice here they can not escape it hereafter; that if they crush our laws and put our courts to shame, there are laws that never can be broken and there is a court whose decrees never can be set aside, whose procedures can not be confused. The cry of the soul for justice, articulate or inarticulate, is a cry that has gone up from the earth through all the ages. It is the one ceaseless quest of the race. To doubt its inevitability is to doubt God, and to doubt God is to be a fool. Therefore we take courage to press forward. Thereby the sick of heart are made well.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

France to Have First Airship Line.

France is to have the distinction of establishing the first airship service which the world has known. Airships of the Patrie type will begin to fly regularly between Paris and the provinces during this month and September. There will be five of these steerable vessels of the air, and their five routes will be from the French capital to Fontainebleau, Rouen, Lyons, Bordeaux, and either Pau or Nancy. Each vessel will carry from eight to twenty passengers besides their crews, and their main docks will be at Issy. That the new species of transportation, however, will not immediately become popular is indicated by the prices that will be charged for a trip, the proposed fare for a journey of, say, thirty miles being from $10 to $20, or 33 to 67 cents a mile. The inference that most Frenchmen still will walk is unmistakable. The airship will beat the automobile as prima facie evidence of the wealth of its occupant. So France scores one in the record of progress, but not by a great majority, for it is promised that Germany will have an airship service established by next summer.

Flammarrion Dreams of a Hole.

Camille Flammarrion, astronomer and visionary of visionaries, is advocating a project of very audacity of which entitles it to be counted among dreams worthy of consideration. This is no less than the digging of a vast hole, far wider and deeper than any heretofore attempted by man, in the surface of the earth. The mere statement sounds prosaic, but it appears less so when the immensity of the excavation he contemplates is considered, for, according to his dream, it is to be 300 yards—about three ordinary city blocks—in diameter, and from three to five miles deep. This, it will be observed, would be quite a hole. But what would be gained by the excavation of such a pit? Well, in the first place, we would learn something about the earth we inhabit, and a Flammarrion scarcely was needed to inform us that we now know little of anything save its surface. In the second place—this according to Flammarrion—we would be likely to add greatly to the world's riches by such an enterprise. The tendency of the heavier metals is to sink through the earth's soil, and the French dreamer believes they would be found in quantity far beneath the service. Moreover, he fancies that much would be added to man's supply of radium. As for the heat of the interior, he doubts that it would increase continuously, and, anyway, he would trust to science to alleviate it. Flammarrion claims to have the indorsement of various scientists, as well as the financial backing of millionaires, for his project.

A World-Increase in Taxes.

While a certain element in the United States Congress was vainly struggling to decrease taxes, as indirectly represented by the tariff, our British cousins were strenuously protesting against a tremendous increase in taxes over there, among other things urging that it would result in driving Britons from Britain. To these protestants the chancellor of the exchequer has replied that, let Britons go where they will in Europe, they will find taxes high and prices correspondingly so. The chancellor was right; the cost of living, because of taxes, has greatly increased throughout Europe during the last few years. Take Germany as a fair illustration. Not very long ago living there was very cheap; so cheap, indeed, that it was much sought as a place of residence by foreign gentilefolk whose income was rather scant. In those good, cheap days an excellent meal could be purchased at a first rate restaurant for 35 cents. A similar meal now would cost more than 50 cents, and a proportionate increase has been made in nearly all the necessities of life. But this is not all, nor the worst, for under taxes just going into effect the price of many articles of consumption will be further increased from 20 to 50 per cent. High taxes and correspondingly high prices; unto these the civilized world appears to be moving (thanks largely to man's warlike tendencies) and the task of adjusting wages to the new scale is not going to be wholly pleasant.

The Mad Mix-up of Royal Families.

When we pause to consider the facts of the case, the wonder is, not that European monarchs sometimes are insane, or again are scrofulous, but that they ever are anything else. For generations they have been setting at defiance all laws of virtue and healthfulness by intermarriage upon intermarriage, until, save that they had some far-away ancestors of particularly striking gifts, it would seem that they must have become mere wrecks ere now. Take Prince Alfonso of Orleans as an example of what has taken place. He is so Bourbon that the very smell of rye should be obnoxious to him. Both of his parents, all of his grandparents, and all of his great-grandparents except one were of the Bourbon family. The normal individual has sixteen great-grandparents. Alfonso has eight; intermarriages have resulted in the average, in his being descended twice from each one of them. Four of his great-grandparents, too, figure twice in that capacity, and four of these great-grandparents maintained the double capacity of husband and wife, uncle and niece. As for the cousins who were intermarried, there were practically no others except those who held a closer relationship. Philip V of Spain died in 1746, and Alfonso is descended from him in sixteen different ways. It should not be difficult to prove that some members of the European royal families are both their own uncles and their own nephews. Yes, the wonder is that they average as well as they do.

The Prizes Aviators May Win.

The Wright brothers, by means of their successful airship, have earned $30,000 from the United States Government, and Bleriot has won a prize of $5,000 for successfully crossing the English channel, but these are only the beginning of rewards which still are within the reach of fortunate aviators. An incomplete list of prizes which have been offered for designated feats, some with and some without time limitations, foots up more than $190,000. These prizes vary in amount from one of $50,000, which is offered to the first aviator making a trip from London to Manchester in 24 hours with not more than two men, to one of $200, offered to the first woman who flies a kilometer (about five-eighths of a mile) in a circle. Three of the prizes relate to the English channel, one of $20,000 being offered to the first Englishman who makes the trip in an English-made machine, another of $5,000 to the first aviator who crosses the channel with a passenger before December 31, 1909, and another of $2,500 to the first aviator who, before January 1, 1910, crosses the channel on a second or fourth Sunday of any month.

H. G. Wells Is Heard From.

The apparent pre-eminence of Americans, Germans and French in the matter of navigation of the air, and particularly Bleriot's feat in successfully crossing the channel, has stirred up H. G. Wells, the novelist, and he is out with a roar in the London Mail which calls for an amen or a malediction, as the reader may chance to feel. Having asked what Bleriot's achievement means, Wells continues: "It means first and foremost that the world cannot wait for the English. It is not the first warning we have had. It has been raining warnings upon us—never was a slacking, dull people so liberally served with warnings of what was in store for them. But this event—this foreigner-invented, foreigner-built, foreigner-steered thing, taking our silver streak as a bird soars across a rivulet—puts the case dramatically. We have fallen behind in the quality of our manhood. In the men of means and leisure in this island there was either enterprise enough, imagination enough, knowledge nor skill enough to lead in this matter. I do not see how one can go into the history of this development and arrive at any other conclusion. The French and Americans can laugh at our aeroplanes, the Germans are ten years ahead of our poor navigators. We are displayed a soft, rather backward people. Either we are a people essentially and incurably inferior, or there is something unbending in our atmosphere and circumstances." There is more of somewhat similar style, but this is as good a place as any for that amen, or that malediction and, by the way, is it not probable that there might be considerable justification for either, or both, the one or the other; in other words, something to be said on both sides?

WORTH KNOWING.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Perry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

MARRIAGE A LA MODE.

Reviewed by Arthur Inkersley.

"Marriage a la Mode" is the result of Mrs. Thomas Humphrey Ward's recent visit to the United States. It is clever and excellently written, as anything by the brilliant lady who was Mary Augusta Arnold, niece of Matthew Arnold, and grandniece of Dr. Thomas Arnold of Rugby, could hardly help being. But it is a purpose novel, and it is a type that rarely shows its author to the best advantage. Mrs. Ward was greatly impressed (as well she might be) by the appalling frequency of divorce in the United States and by the triviality of the grounds upon which married couples abandon relations that are supposed to be severed by death or the gravest causes only. "Marriage a la Mode," then, is not a mere story, but is intended as a vehicle of the author's idea upon a subject that she conceives to be highly important and upon which she entertains clear views.

The plot (there is no other) is quite simple. A handsome, well-born, attractive young Englishman, of the Eton and Oxford type, Roger Barnes by name, is left almost penniless by the death of his father. His mother, Lady Barnes, strongly urges on Roger the necessity of marrying a rich but nice girl. Roger comes to the United States with good letters of introduction and is made much of in society of Washington—the only city in the United States that possesses anything like a society organized on reasonable grounds. His fancy is attracted by a pretty girl, whose father was a rough, self-made Irishman, and whose mother came from Buenos Ayres. The daughter, Daphne Floyd, inherits the faults of both parents, plus the petulance and insolence that one finds in so many daughters of the over-rich. But youth and good looks gloss over her grave faults of character, manner, and temperament. Roger and she marry and go to England to refit the family mansion and take their place in the county. Daphne quickly shows her innate vulgarity and lack of breeding. So far from feeling that tenderness towards the old home that all wellbred Americans almost inevitably experience when brought into close contact with its venerable antiquity, its caressing beauty, the stability and grace of its society, Daphne falls foul of everything and everybody. She displays the pride of money in the coarsest manner and renders herself altogether offensive. Conscious of her husband's charm, she develops an exaggerated jealousy, to provide fuel for which she forces him into meetings with an old flame, Chloe Fairmile, who had been engaged to him, but had dropped him promptly when he proved to be poor. Mrs. Fairmile, whose husband is in India, flirts with him rather outrageously and puts him in a somewhat compromising situation. Daphne bursts into a fit of uncontrolled rage, and, after a stormy scene with her husband, rushes back to the United States, where, by her fabricated evidence, and the use of abundant money, she secures a divorce and the custody of her child, who is the apple of Roger's eye. Poor Roger, never of very strong fibre, takes to drink. Through the agency of an American army officer, who is deeply sensible of the misery wrought by the divorce habit in the United States, Daphne is brought to some sense of her folly and wickedness. She returns to England, where she is still Roger's wife, the miserable Dakota divorce not being recognized there. She offers to live with Roger again, but he, far gone in consumption, refuses, and they part.

The story is interesting and, though it will have little or no effect upon those for whose good it is intended, may contribute towards an aroused sentiment against the epidemic of divorce. One of our most disastrous results of the evil is the presence in American boarding-houses, hotels and society generally, of many divorcees. These women, dissatisfied with their own lives, and though vehemently asserting, not quite sure of the justice of their cause, serve as disturbers of the peace and fomenters of discord among the married women of their acquaintance. Many a breach between man and wife striving for a modus vivendi has been induced by these pestiferous creatures, who have lost the innocence of the maid and the trustfulness of the wife, without gaining the charm of the widow. These unhappy and discontented women are the apostles of the doctrine of conjugal independence—for the woman. It is far better that some wives should be compelled to live with harsh and unkind husbands than that a whole sex should come to regard matrimony as a state of life from which, if it does not yield them all they think they ought to have, they can escape readily, shedding their obligations and wifely duties as unceremoniously as a snake its skin, and carrying with them as large a slice of their husbands' fortune or earnings as a complaisant judge (in whom flattery of women and sycophancy to popular ideas have been ingrained) may be disposed to grant them.

I cannot forbear a slight reference to a comment on Mrs. Ward's book condemning her as ignorant of "the merits of the case" and superficial. One cannot be ignorant of what has no existence; the case has no merits; it has only demerits, upon many of which Mrs. Ward, in her eager castigation of others, has not touched at all. As to superficiality, it is hard to believe that Mrs. Ward's keen and highly trained intelligence, developed by daily contact with a society in which every kind of achievement of human intellect and energy is honored, would not arrive rapidly at the heart of the matter. A greater formality with the situation would not bring the noted Englishwoman to a different conclusion, but would merely supply her with a fuller body of facts and a more deadly equipment of weapons. She would, for example, learn that her statement that one marriage in twelve ends in divorce falls far short of the truth in some cities; in San Francisco one wedding in seven, and in Los Angeles one matrimonial union in forty ends in the law court. More than twenty years' continuous residence in the United States (except for visits to Mexico and British Columbia) have left me quite unaware of the merits of the divorce system—if a tangled confusion of conflicting state laws can be dignified by the term "system"—and have filled me with an abounding detestation of it. Familiarity with a thoroughly bad thing may dull one's sensibilities and dampen the fires of one's indignation, but can hardly produce in any sane mind a conviction of its meritlessness. HUGO'S MYSTERIOUS DAUGHTER.

Adele Hugo, the daughter of the poet, whose sad and tragic history aroused the sympathy of the world, still lives. As a girl she was kidnapped by Guernsey by an English officer. Her parents searched Europe for her without obtaining a trace of her whereabouts when, several months later, a girl was found wandering alone, apparently demented, in the streets of New York. "I am the daughter of Victor Hugo" was all she ever said. She was sent back to France to her parents, but with wide-staring eyes she kept her lips sealed and the mystery of her martyrdom, perhaps a stranger and more absorbing drama than her father ever wrote, was never revealed. She never entirely recovered her reason and since the death of her father has lived in his villa, morose, solitary and alone, seldom speaking and never of the past. Occasionally she goes to Paris to witness, from the back of a darkened box, the reproduction of one of her father's plays, but otherwise she lives in seclusion, having no friends and never receiving visitors.

Hart Lyman is the present editor of the New York Tribune. Who is Mr. Lyman? By the way, did anybody, forty years ago, have to ask "Who is Horace Greeley?"

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF.

Browning's Simpler Poems.

Many of Browning's poems, to the writer, at least, quickly soar out into unintelligible space, but there is a rich body of his verse that is among the simplest, noblest, most melodious song in English literature. No one can read "The Lost Leader" and fail to catch its meaning or its inspiring melody. No one will miss the exquisite dexterity of rhythm and the glowing beauty of description in his "A Portrait." And "My Last Duchess," for all its subtlety of insinuation and veiled phrasings, is as plain and as delightful as such things can be.

But the chief charm of Browning's poetry is its revelation of the poet, a strong, bluff, brave, tender, God-fearing, mankind-loving, sincere and truthful man, whose rugged spirit chafes at the restraint of conventional forms of verse and struggles passionately to give expression, through a rugged and unequal medium, to the abounding vitality of his ideas and ideals. At all times Browning's poetry is Browning; and, so revealed, he stands out as one of the manliest men who ever wrote, clean in mind, fighting always and valiantly and fairly to establish what he thinks is good and true and beautiful. "Prospect," reprinted on this page some weeks ago, is characteristic of him, even in the face of death serene and unafraid.

His song is the hymn of the beauty of the spirit, wherever the soul of man strives against its earthly barriers to achieve to righteousness, to wisdom, to joy in the appreciation of all forms of beauty. Even where his lines are rude there is admiration for the struggle; and when his muse does loose unfettered wings, a very nightingale's shower of melody rains down from his lofty flight.

CALIFORNIA POETS' CORNER.

(Of the earlier generation of writers of California, the contemporary of Bret Harte, now left a pleasant memory, than Benjamin F. Avery, older, tried, earnest and poet of the better kind. He served California as poet laureate and the poet laureate of the state, but the best service of all was rendered in the field of journalism and literature. The poem which follows first appeared in the Overland Monthly.)

THE OLD AND THE NEW.

By B. P. Avery.

In no white winding-sheet goes out the year,
Stiff, straight and cold, with mourners by its bier.

As in the hard Atlantic clime,
Where bare-branched trees make desolate the sky,
And dreams are stilled but winds are piping high.

And vapors turn to stinging rime.
Not typical of death our old year's end,
But rather like the parting of a friend
Who leaves a grateful smile behind;
Or like a maiden loved and wedded late,
Who goes to meet her joy with mien sedate,
Yet calmly happy in her mind.

The long dry summer sits upon the hills
In memory yet her tresses colorfully fill,
The distant scene with mellow tints;
Only the spring that swells to meet the cloud,
Or acorn-dropping oak, or south wind loud,
Another mood of nature hints.

The red geranium gleams along the wall,
The petunia leans her tresses colorfully tall,
While roses blush in open air;
And oft in sheltered spots, 'mid friendly calms,
The calla lily lifts its broad, green palms
And blossoms into saintly prayer.

Soon all the tawny hills that thirst for rain
Will don an emerald robe with golden train
Of yellow poppies glowing like a flame:
The summer from her dusty chrysalis
Will waken to a life of winged bliss,
And spring will be its happy name.

A REST-ROOM FOR WOMEN

WHERE WORKING GIRLS MAY REST AND TAKE LUNCH.

Mid-Day Rest Room for Working Women.

This modest sign appears on a door at No. 126 Sutter street, San Francisco. It calls attention, in a characteristically modest way, to one of the most gracious and tactful and useful aids toward making the career of working girls not only livable, but attractive as well. Up two flights of stairs a whole floor is devoted wholly to this room. The purpose of it is simple. Any working girl may bring her lunch to this room between the hours of 11 and 2 o'clock, midday, and, for a fee of five cents, have the use of a table on which to eat and be served with a cup of coffee, tea, milk, or bouillon. When she has finished, she may retire to the front of the room, where lounges and easy chairs invite to a restful half-hour or so in which to doze or chat or read the books and magazines, with which the library table is liberally supplied.

This room has been in operation since the fifteenth of last February, and daily between 225 and 250 women and girls have availed themselves of its hospitality. Many more have come, but lack of room has prevented the accommodation of all who have applied. It is a courtesy for accepting which the working women abate no particle of their proper pride and independence, and for which they are adequately grateful to the Daughters of the King.

This organization of women, at the suggestion of the local president, Mrs. S. L. Abbott, undertook the work last spring of providing these conveniences. An association was formed and now has more than 200 members, each of whom contribute $3 a year to a fund to guarantee the expenses. The association supplied the necessary furniture, dishes and rented the floor of the building now used for the rest-room. Three regular women attendants were employed; a matron, an assistant matron, and a dishwasher. In addition to these, four women, members of the Daughters of the King give their services free every day to wait at the tables and see that the convenience of the girls is promptly and properly served. There are many chapters of the Daughters of the King in San Francisco and the neighboring bay cities. Each chapter has agreed to supply four of its members for one day, according to a schedule arranged by Mrs. Abbott. So far, the women who have volunteered have been most faithful, and the work of carrying on the rest-room has run along smoothly.

When the writer of this visited the rest-room he was deeply impressed with two things that differentiate it from similar experiments in the East with which he is familiar. One thing was homelikeness and daintiness and freshness of the room. The lunch section might have seemed a little bare, had not that possibility been forestalled by vases of flowers that made it as tasteful and attractive as a private dining-room. The rest-room section did not suggest anything so much as the den of some girl who often entertained her girl friends in her own distinctive way. The arrangement is simple without being either bare or formal. It is, rather, cosy and homelike.

The other notable difference was the absence of the odor of food and cooking. In other such places he has visited, the writer has been oppressed by a mustiness like that which often hangs in the air of a boarding house. Here, there was no such thing. The freshness and wholesomeness and daintiness of a model private house are preserved intact. No food is cooked here, which partially accounts for this fact, but even the odor of coffee had disappeared within the hour after the luncheon time was over.

The association has under way plans to rent another floor in this building, to provide room in which to accommodate a hundred more girls every day. The necessary alterations will take some time, but by the fifteenth of next month they should be complete. The upper floor will then be used wholly as a lunch room; the lower floor will be divided in half, the front supplying a rest-room much larger than one now available, and the rear supplying a room in which only tea will be served.

The work of the association is partly, but not wholly, self-sustaining. The difference is made up by the subscriptions of the members. The association would welcome new members to the number of 300 or more. Its work has been eminently successful. It has earned and received the sincere gratitude of hundreds of girls to whom its quiet and refined quarters have supplied an escape from the noisy cheap restaurants, and a place in which they may really rest for an hour in the heat of the day's work.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

On September 7, 8 and 9 festivals will be held in Napa, Calistoga and Aetna under the auspices of the California Grape-Growers' Association, the object being to advertise the medicinal benefit of grape juice and secure a state holiday at the opening of the grape-gathering season.

A Sanger man claims to have discovered a radium mine in Madera county, and now proposes to take steps to have the National Government work it, which the Government may or may not do—after it has been convinced that he has discovered a radium mine. A bloodless war concerning vaccination now is being waged at Watsonville, the Board of Health demanding that the vaccination law be enforced, while the school trustees insist that it shall not. The issue probably will be decided in the courts.

According to a statement given out by Chairman Leonardson of the State Prohibition party, Del Norte, Imperial, Kings, Orange, Riverside, San Diego, Sutter and Ventura counties now are wholly "dry." Plumas since has been added to the number, while, with the exception of Alturas, Modoc county belongs in the same list. Precinct option exists in Alameda, Colusa, Lake, Los Angeles, San Bernardino, Santa Barbara and Yolo counties. The wholly "dry" cities or towns are Azusa, Corona, Corning, Fowler, El Centro, Imperial, Kingsburg, Montevita, Ontario, Oceanside, Pomona, Porterville, Selma, Tulare, Upland, Whittier, Winters and Brawley.

Members of a Modesto hunting party claim to have found the ruins of a city of considerable size, and apparently built by a somewhat civilized people, near Adobe valley on Red mountain, on the west side of the San Joaquin valley.

The people of the Livermore valley are attempting to secure, from the Southern Pacific Company, a motor service to connect its towns with the cities about the bay.

There is considerable excitement in the central San Joaquin valley over a gold strike which recently was made at Fresno Flats. The original discoverers are said to be taking out the yellow metal in paying quantity, and about fifty claims have been located.

On September 18th the people of Merced county will vote on a proposition to bond the county in the sum of $745,000 for the construction of good roads.

From Glamis to Blythe, a distance of 65 miles over the desert in Southern California, the mail is carried by automobiles, stages having made frequent failures of attempts to get the mail through on time.

It is reported that the Sacramento river above Colusa now is more impeded by snags and sand bars than it has been at any time within a half-century. This condition is attributed to the high water of last winter, which shifted the channel in many places.

After long and insistent demand from the people of the Ojai valley, the Southern Pacific Company has established a service of two trains daily between Nordhoff, Ventura and Oxnard.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

The World That We Live in Is Queer.

A smile for the crowd, but a frown for home—
It's hey for our dual lives!—
A word of good cheer when abroad we roam,
And a snarl for our babes and wives;
The best of ourselves for the heedless crowd,
The worst for the ones most near;
Good fellowship, even save where it is vowed—
It is ho, but the world is queer!

Best for the rabble; at home it is missed—
It's hey but our style is absurd!—
"A really good fellow," the people insist,
But wait till his wife is heard.
Type of beneficence out on the street;
Type of—you name it—at home.
("Mary, this breakfast ain't decent to eat!")
It is ho for the world where we roam!

This cap is, of course, for another man's head,
And neither for me nor for you,
But, still, when we rise from the wrong side
Of bed,
As the very best people will do,
What is it we say, and how do we act?
Meaning you; I admit nothing here,
But what do you do? Oh, it's clearly a fact
The world that we live in is queer.

Mr. Thaw's "Literary Work."

The Associated Press has announced, apparently without a shudder, that Harry Kendall Thaw is going to devote the rest of his life, in Matteawan asylum until he gets out of it, to "literary work." It may be work (if Mr. Thaw can be imagined doing anything so useful as labor of any kind), but I would bet a dollar and a quarter that it will not be literary. It requires something more than a man-slaying record and an ego that is asinine rather than insane to write literature. Yet there is one book he could write, were its English but babbled, which would interest the public, and it would be entitled, "How a Rich Man May Go to the Asylum When a Poor Man Would Go to a Gallows-Neck." Though he has been legally declared insane, Thaw's mind is not so wrecked that he will tackle that subject, and, until it is, he will do the public a favor by letting his pen rest.

A More or Less Perfumed Fable.

The Society of Indefatigable Polecats Organized for the Suppression of Anything Above Mediocrity was in session. A gray and revered member rose from his seat and addressed the chairman:

"It has been brought to my attention," he said, "that a certain man has Done Something" (groans from the assemblage) "which Amounts to Something" (deeper and more prolonged groans). "Under these distressing circumstances, I beg leave to submit the following resolutions:

"Whereas, it is alleged that a Certain Man has Done Something which Amounts to Something; and

"Whereas, Such conduct is an insidious attack on the basic principles on which this Society was organized; and

"Whereas, We could not do such a thing ourselves; and

"Whereas, We never have; and

"Whereas, We never will; and

"Whereas, Even if he did do it, we don't believe it; therefore, be it

"Resolved, That he didn't; and

"Resolved, That he ought to be ashamed of himself for doing it."

"But," said a young and inexperienced member before the resolutions were put, "if the Certain Man Did Something which Amounts to Something, I don't see how our resolutions will affect the fact."

"You forget," the chairman explained, "that they will carry our own peculiar style of perfumery with them, and it will not be pleasant for him."

So the resolutions were carried unanimously. Moral—It ought to be about time for some other person or association to take a whack at Luther Burbank.

The Opinions of Rufus.

The theory that words was invented to conceal ideas is knocked all to pieces by some people that talk the most. They don't have any to conceal.

Especially I've observed, a Soshalist generally is a man that hasn't got much money. Sometimes he gets it, and after that he ain't.

Somebody said that the rise 'n' fall of the Calkins Syndicate is like that of a sky-rocket, but 'tain't. A sky-rocket has a bright head, but 'tain't.

If a burnt child really reads the fire, I wish you'd tell me why the records show that grass widgers almost alters gill married again.

I spose the reason the justice of Heaven is fixed 'n' unchangeable is 'cause there ain't any appellate court to appeal to frum its decisions.

I'm like some of the rest of you: I b'lieve Mr. Calhoun is innocent, but I'll bet he wishes he hadn't done it.

The angel at the gate said he realized that Rockefeller had piled up his treasure fer Heaven, but he said it smelt so he reckoned Rockefeller 'd have to take it down stairs 'n' burn the oil off it. Then I waked up.

Let's be grateful that we have state prisons, brethren, fer ef it wasn't fer them there'd be no place to put criminals that ain't got money to hire able lawyers.

"Just One Mistake."

I went to school long years ago—no doubt you did the same—

And learned what little now I know of the scholastic game;

I learned to read, and eke to write; I learned to cipher, too.

Although the latter warped my mind and filled my soul with rue.

Oh, oft I've sat above my slate and figured, figured till

I felt that imps had made my brain a figure-grinding mill.

But all in vain. Then master said to me, in sorry plight:

"Just one mistake in summing up, the answer's never right."

I have a seat ('tis somewhat back) in Time's tremendous school,

And here I add the sums of life, or wisely or as fool.

To duty, oft the problem runs, add pleasures best forgot;

Subtract the thing you fain would shirk, and now the answer's—what?

I've figured on that problem much, to make it run so nice

That I could do just as I pleased and never pay the price;

I've figured long, I've figured much, and yet—oh, thought to light—

I must have erred in summing up; the answer was not right.

About me are the boys in school, the girls are also there,

And some are adding carefully, and some without a care;

Some from the duties of the day some pleasant sins subtract,

And smugly trust the Lord of Hosts won't catch them in the act.

And so the pupils in the school life's mathematics learn,

To find full oft the answer's not the thing for which we yearn,

But this we know, for this we've learned in darkness or in light:

Just one mistake in summing up, the answer's never right.

Thoughtful Man on Hell.

"A distinguished Eastern divine," remarked the Thoughtful Man, "has just come out footed with the assertion that there is no hell. This is both consoling and reassuring to a large number of us, and yet I should feel more convinced, and better all around, if I could be certain that the reverend gentleman had taken a ride on a west-bound Market-street car about 5 or 6 o'clock in the afternoon. Until I can be assured on this point I shall feel it to be possible that he spoke without sufficient information.

"As a considerable number of the eminent citizens who have found it to their interest to be held up in this city are church members in good standing, and likely to continue so, you will realize how much this divine's doctrine means to them. To be sure, as Mr. Calhoun explained to Abe Ruef, there is scriptural authority for the little enterprise in which they engaged in the 117th verse of the 119th psalm, which reads: 'Hold thou me up, and I shall be safe,' but although Mr. Ruef was satisfied, Mr. Calhoun later remarked to me that he sometimes feared that David, in promising safety, had in mind the earthly courts instead of the one above.

"Now, however,—presuming that the divine has ridden on our street-cars and is otherwise posted—all is well. We may be held up, provided, of course, there is enough in it for us, without any duty concerning what may happen after we have departed to that 'mysterious realm.' This removes the last obstacle to the 'higher-ups' joining the church and thus adding to their unimpeachable respectability, although the obstacle has not interfered with them much heretofore. No hell. It is a beautiful and comforting thought, isn't it?" said the Thoughtful Man.

"I guess so," said I.

All of Us Wake Then.

I have plenty, more than plenty,
And the joys of life abound.

Do I need to tell you this?

In my pocketbook 'tis found.

I have treasure beyond measure;

I have riches by the heap;

I have every style of pleasure—

In my sleep.

I've a palace very splendid,

And 'tis there that I abide;

Walls of sard and onyx blended,

Pictures fair on every side.

Ope a gate there that admits me

To a fairy-haunted lake—

Then a draughted nightmare hits me,

And I wake.

Might Have Been Expected.

The wress went out of business—

Now, what do you think of that?—

The bed was warped exceedingly,

The type were melted fat;

The pressman cried, and wrung his hands

To show the pain he felt.

"Vergilia's book was on the press,

And something had to melt!"

She Kept Her Vow.

"I judge that she is the woman of her word."

"Probably. What makes you think so?"

"Why, I have heard her vow a hundred times that there was not a man in the world whom she would marry."

"Yes?"

"Well, you know, she married young Sap-leigh."

Better Skip This.

I don't approve it, never could;

The thought I can't abide;

And I condemn, as e'er I should,

Infanticide.

But in my home—a babe is there—

Last night my ink was "pied;"

I sat down in it on my chair—

"Infant!" I sighed.

"DOWN THE HEEL."

(For The California Weekly.)

In the midst of Tia Juana's
Many floras, numerous faunas
And more numerous cantinas,
One particular cantina's
Sign we ambled up before
And inquired at the door:
"Tell us, where is Salazar,
"Abelino Salazar?"
And the man who rum dispenses
In return for recompenses,
In response to our appeal,
Pointing, answered: "Down the heel."

"Down the heel," so sloping, sandy,
"Down the heel," our Herbert dandy,
"Down the heel," he slid our "Peerless"
Till we saw a joint not cheerless,
On whose white-wash, seen from far
Was the legend "Salazar"— Unmistakable from far:
"Abelino Salazar."

Then we shot our raucous klaxon
And a maid with hair not flaxen

Mounted quickly to the porch.
Oh, her eyes were Cupid's torch!
Oh, her form so plump and sleek!
Oh, the roses on her cheek!
Voice and smile of liquid honey!
Gentle manner wide and sunny!
"Abelino," said she neatly,
"Salazar," she added sweetly,
"Eez not cen!—he has been
"Gone to cetee; pleeze come cen."

"Pleeze come cen!" Ah, did I dare
"Pleeze come cen!" to one so fair!
"Abby," "Lena," "Sally," or—
Oh, thou child of Salazar,
Sweetest bud of the canteen,
Art thou Eve, or Imogene?
Loveliest of all nameless ladies
I have met from here to Cadiz,
I have come, and I have seen,
But I dare not "Pleeze come cen."
No, I'll stay within my "Peerless";
Katharine and Mildred, fearless,
As they hitherto have been,
If they wish, may "Pleeze come cen."

Then she sent a smiling rascal
Out to fill me up with mezal
And the girls with sarsaparilla:
Dies Irac! Dies illa!
Like the flame my heart had smote
There was burning in my throat,
Like the flame of fire-water,
Flame of Abelino's daughter.
"Let us pay? No! No! Not she "Would accept from such as we;
"No! We were her father's friend,
"Free and welcome without end."

Breakfasting at Coronado
On the morrow, with bravado
I was brandishing some story,
Probably a chestnut hoary,
When I noticed, with a shock,
On my coat a raven lock.
E'er I could, glassing, claw it
Katharine and Mildred saw it
Katharine and Mildred, jeering,
Cried, irreverent and sneering:
"Ha! Ha! Mamma! Look a there!
"That is Abelina's hair."

"No!" I said, my spirit bracing,
And my fair accusers facing,
"When my tailor framed my coat,
"Of my leanness he took note
"And to make my torso bolder
"He put paddings in my shoulder,
"And this lock so black and coarse
"Is a tail-hair from a horse."

Then my gathering indignation
Warmed me up to this oration:
"Ladies, ill it fits such graces
"As your sun-burned, freckled faces,
"Blinking eyes and peeling noses
"To reflect on Spanish roses.
"Look on Abelino's mild,
"Fair and gentle-mannered child,
"And instead of baiting me,
"Make yourselves as sweet as she."

"Down the heel," at Tia Juana
Mid the semi-tropic fauna
And the flora of the same
Dwells that maid of nameless name,
Child of son of Alcazar,
Abelino Salazar.
What care I what-e'er her name be?
What care I what-e'er her fame be?
"Down the heel" my heart is going
Where the yucca-plant is growing,
"Down the heel" my soul is dreaming
Where those burning eyes are gleaming
And those glances sweetest seen
Welcome me with "Pleeze come cen."
Tho I vow that I'm a cor-air
If that black lock wasn't horse-hair,
Yet my dreams, for woe or weal,
Still go drifting "Down the heel."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

How Shall Taft There is a feeling abroad

Be Reevaluated that the President has not made good regarding the tariff, at least not completely, and that the glad hand should not be extended him with the same degree of gladness that would characterize his welcome to our state had he swung his big stick earlier and accomplished more for the ultimate consumer, that being the individual who raised the tariff issue in the first place and in the hope of making it an instrument for securing a lower cost of living in the homes of the people. Those in this frame of mind are not disposed to throw the President overboard in their affections, to pronounce him a reactionary and a failure. They still have hopes of him, but they would be glad if, in swinging around the circle, he could be made to feel that relations are just the least bit strained; that his probationary period has not ended; that he is still on trial and is being narrowly watched out of the corner of the public eye preparatory to any effusive "well done, good and faithful servant" being offered him as an out-pouring, up-welling testimony of a grateful people. "How is the President to know how the people do feel toward him," these good people ask, "if the people turn out and accord him an ovation everywhere just as they would have done had he measured up to their fullest expectations?" Well, that's so, how is he? There is a strain of sense in this view.

His Cabinet Is Questionable.

Another fact that indisposes many persons to throw up their hats and hurrah for President Taft until hot and hoarse, is that his cabinet is questionable. It has not the confidence of the public. Many are fearful that Ballinger is bad, that the concluding syllable in the name of the Attorney General furnishes a clew to his character, and that Hitchcock should have been paid off and discharged as soon as the campaign ended. It was obvious that the interests took courage as soon as the election of Taft was made sure and there are those who inwardly fear that the President may not prove as efficient as a commander as he did as a lieutenant under the command of as tactful a commander as McKinley and as resistless a conqueror as Roosevelt. Those who stood heart and soul with Roosevelt and his policies are not skeptical, not suspicious, not seriously questioning the character of William Howard Taft and the administration he is going to give us, but they are not fully assured and they want him to know that they are not. They want him to know this in a way that will not be discourteous, but in a way that will not deceive him into thinking and feeling that he has fulfilled all expectations when he has not. This is going to be a matter of great difficulty.

California Sure To Blow Itself.

That reserve which enables To Blow Itself. its possessor to hold a guest by the hand some length, and yet treat him with a courtesy due his station and known, is not a characteristic of Californians. We either "blow ourselves in," as the saying goes, or we turn the cold shoulder. It would be an unmerited rebuke to the President to throw the cold shoulder to him when he comes to us, so there will be nothing for it except to extend the glad hand, ask him about his wife and children and put on plate, knife and fork and set him right up at the table. We shall have to do the whole thing or nothing, because we are built that way, so the welcome to California extended to the President will be as effusive as it was to Theodore Roosevelt, although the feeling toward him will not be just the same as it was toward Theodore. Moreover, unless the solid citizenship joins in the welcoming of the President he will be thronged by representatives of untoward interests who are ruefully in need of some one to give them character, as well as by sycophants of high and low degree. To have that ilk speak for California would be a misfortune to California. Besides, the President should be given a full year in which to prove himself, whereas he has not yet had half a year. Theodore Roosevelt was in office more than three years before he got his policies into shape to force upon public attention and down the unwilling throats of the predatory interests. But may not some good friend draw the President off into a corner and give him a hunch as to how the sober, sensible people of California do feel toward him? It might help him to come to himself.

Walter F. Price For Secretary of State.

Indications are that aspirants for the cast-off shoes of Charles F. Curry, unless he concludes not to cast them off (not by any means an unlikely conclusion), are to be counted on mainly for creating brain storms of enthusiasm among the politicians, not the people. There is little in any of the candidates so far mentioned to justify the public in rising as one man with but a single voice proclaiming "Thou art the man!" Our last report from the seat of incubation of candidates heralded only Stanford, Stanford and Jordan. This was an unkindness to Walter F. Price, state senator, attache of the State Board of Examiners, and a man who can be counted on to do any political work that the Herrin organization wants done. He would be found to possess more sobriety than Hill, more reliability than Jack Stafford, and would be a less impossible proposition than Frank C. Jordan, who stacked the basement of Alameda's courthouse full of needless printing merely to give Dargie something profitable to do between grafts. And yet, with all these points in his favor, the state could seek farther and fare better than to nominate and elect Walter F. Price Secretary of State. It is really a big office and needs a big man to fill it.

Too Sane and Sensible A Sacramento paper, To Be Persisted In.

with what warrant we do not know, asserts that it has authority to announce that Governor Gillett has decided to be, and will be, a candidate for re-election. The California Weekly, without any authority or warrant whatever except that which arises from inherent probabilities, asserted the same thing weeks ago. At that time, as some of our readers may remember, we said that all California Governors are candidates to succeed themselves; this is just as true as that they do not succeed themselves. There is a kind of manifest destiny attending both propositions. The desire to be "reinducted," the persuasions of friends, the willingness of every man to believe that he is somehow an exception to the rules, account for one side of the equation, and the inexorableness of political forces, which are never more powerful than when they do not seem to be working, establishes the balance on the other side. Yes, the probabilities all are that Governor Gillett will be a candidate and that he will be beaten. But if he comes out as a candidate at this early date, it will show that he has abandoned his reported program of simply going ahead, making the best Governor he knows. Now for another year before beginning to run for reelection. That was such a sane and sensible plan that it would be a pity to drop it so soon.

Other Enemy Not In Sight, What is the They Fight Among Themselves.

matter with the National Guard of California? That something so serious ails it has been made clear even to the non-military mind by the newspaper interviews in which staff officers have viciously assailed official superiors in dehance of military discipline and a semi-social organization of officers in San Francisco has arrayed itself and two companies of men against Adjutant General Lauck, if not against the commander-in-chief of the Guard, Governor Gillett. At the same time, from various points in the state comes the report that the regimental and company commanders are having more trouble than ever before to hold their commands together and prevent the members thinning out. There are certainly disorganizing forces at work in the Guard, and some there be who assert that the trouble is too large a dose of regular army militarism. Of that more anon.

Is It Excess of Prosperity One of the That Ails Our N. G. C.?

markable facts of the situation is that the threatened break-up comes at a time when the National Guard is a material way, is prospering as never before. It has been armed and equipped by the Federal Government in a manner never before equalled. It has secured unparalleled state appropriations. The last session of the Legislature might almost have been called the National Guard session, to such an extent did the military eat large its boundaries in all directions. Besides increased appropriations for support, it secured an emergency appropriation of $100,000, something many times asked for before, but hitherto only a dream. Also, it obtained $100,000 for an armory in Los Angeles. But the most remarkable feat in this line was the snatching away of about $425,000 of money which had been appropriated three years before to erect in San Francisco a much-needed building to house the courts and many officers, boards and commissions. A site had been purchased for the new building and plans had been drawn, but before work could be begun the National Guard captured the money by inducing the Legislature to enact that it should be used for an armory and not for the purpose, originally designed. But not alone in getting appropriations did the N. G. C. shine at the 1909 session of the Legislature; it also got through a reorganization bill containing some extraordinary features, including one which authorizes the Governor to proclaim a county or a city in a state of insurrection and to march his troops therein without any preliminary requests from the local government.

For Military or For Social Purposes, Which?

And now, in this hey-day of its proudest exaltation, the N. G. C. is in a worse state of demoralization than ever before. The critics before referred to believe that General Lauck and his advisers have simply gone daft over the idea of making over the Guard in the likeness of the regular army. The Washington military authorities, in their eagerness to promote efficiency in the Guard, have offered all sorts of inducements, from the time that Congress passed the Dick bill down to the present month. General Lauck has been a willing programmer in this direction, and in consequence many favors have been shown the California Guard. They have been arms, munitions and uniforms galore. But attachments of these gifts is the string of conformity to the regular army plans, and not all of the citizen soldiers, officers or men, take kindly to these plans, which involve some radical changes. For example, it is a hobby of the people at Washington to have a strong Coast artillery division or corps in the N. G. C., and it is in large part General Lauck's attempt to oblige them in this respect which appears to be tearing things apart. How it will end no one knows. Governor Gillett's attitude appears to be that of one who is overboard to the Guard but who knows little about military organization and who is not disposed to be critical of the advice tendered by the officers who are nearest to him. Can it be that the National Guard of California, like the old militia, has no stomach for a real soldiery, but, at bottom, merely wants an annual outing at public expense with a big time and no end of social attractions? That was notoriously true of the officers of the old organization.

The Primary Machine Victory. The primary election in San Francisco is, in general, a victory for the pro-graft machine. Leland, the Democratic nominee for mayor, together with the other Democratic candidates for offices besides supervisors, are all McNab men, and McNab is "organization" to the core. An interesting speculation concerning the Democratic supervisors will be referred to further down in this column. On the Union Labor ticket, the entire slate of the McCarthy "syndicate," including McCarthy for mayor, Fickert for district attorney, and Tom Finn for sheriff, was swallowed whole by the party. The "syndicate" has never successfully replied to the Call's direct charge that its slate was made in the office of Jere Burke of the Southern Pacific company.

Citizens' Committee Republicans Win. The Republican results are a bad showing. The Municipal League of Independent Republican Clubs failed to land Byron Mauzy for mayor. It won nominations for six out of the remaining eleven major offices, but two of these were also organization nominees, and another, Percy V. Long, so completely outran his ticket for the office of city attorney that his victory was clearly a personal triumph. The League's showing on nominations for supervisors was a little better, as it landed eight out of eighteen nominees.

Two Good Supervisors. These supervisorial nominations are especially important, for the pro-graft machine hopes, by electing a hostile band of supervisors, to choke off the graft prosecutions by having the supervisors refuse to appropriate funds for the district attorney's office. It is, therefore, significant that the two men receiving by far the highest votes for the Republican nominations for supervisors are Paul Bancroft, 12,197, and Charles A. Murdock, 10,043, who are incumbents, who have consistently stood for the continuance of the graft prosecutions, who were backed by the Municipal League, and who were fought by the Citizens' Committee and its machine allies.

Incumbent Democratic Supervisors Nominated. In this same connection, the Democratic nominations for supervisors is interesting. Of the eighteen nominees, ten are incumbents, and eight of the ten were endorsed by the Democratic Club, which is the reform wing of the party. These eight are, therefore, presumably in favor of the graft prosecution. This assumption is strengthened by the record of the incumbent board of supervisors, which has liberally backed the prosecution and which is, in fact, about the best board of supervisors the city has ever had. This presumption is further strengthened by the fact that the Democratic voters who nominated them also nominated Francis J. Heney for district attorney.

Can Good Majority of Supervisors Win? If, then, the two very popular incumbents nominated by the Municipal League on the Republican side, and the eight popular incumbents nominated by the Democrats and endorsed by the Democratic Club, are all elected next November, there will be ten men—a majority—on the board of supervisors who may reasonably be expected to carry on the prosecution. This is the most cheering fact in an election whose results are, in general, a disappointment to the progressive forces in the political life of San Francisco.

The Chance of the Good Government League. Furthermore, it offers a suggestion to the Good Government League. That League is now in a strategic position. None of the regular parties has offered a ticket that, as a whole, measures up to the demands of the situation in San Francisco. If good government is to continue in this city, an independent ticket must triumph at the polls in November. The Good Government League has the organization to back such a ticket. By staying out of the primary, it is free to offer such a ticket. In doing this, it would naturally endorse the best men on all the regular tickets, and at least one of its possible supervisorial candidates seem to be logically indicated by the facts reviewed above. With some new, strong, and clean candidate for mayor, with Francis J. Heney for district attorney, with Percy V. Long for city attorney, and these ten men for supervisors, the rest of a good and popular ticket could be filled out either with other party nominees or with new men. Such a ticket would draw the issues of the campaign in unmistakable terms and, we believe, would sweep the present tickets off the boards.

McCarthy the Next Mayor? If such a ticket be not put up, McCarthy will probably be the next mayor of San Francisco. This is the consensus of opinion of several of the shrewdest political observers in the city. Some base the prediction on the belief that, having headed Mauzy's nomination off by landing Crocker, the machine will desert Crocker for McCarthy. Others base it on their observation of general political tendencies. Such a result would be a disaster, and must be forestalled by some means.

Baseball or Government? The writer of this went to the office of the San Francisco Bulletin last Wednesday, during the noon hour. About fifty people formed a little group watching the election returns that should tell the fate of the city under its first direct primary. The writer returned at four o'clock. Five hundred men blocked the sidewalk and half of one side of Market street. They were watching the baseball score by innings.

ENGLAND'S BETTER CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

VI. A REVIEW OF THE PREVIOUS ARTICLES.

By AN ENGLISH ATTORNEY.

[This is the sixth and concluding article of the series on "England's Better Criminal Procedure" which has been appearing at intervals of a fortnight in The California Weekly. This comparison of English and American law, through whose courtesy we are able to present the subject, concludes his description of the exact process by which criminal cases are tried in England, and, in a verdict, and draws an illuminating comparison between this process and the slow and uncertain procedure in Californian courts. This comparison is obviously unfavorable, shamefully unfavorable, to our Californian laws and the reform of our criminal courts is the issue of first importance to this state. The California Weekly commends it to its readers, and in these articles at one sitting, and invites its readers to a discussion of the best means of bringing about these reforms.—The Editors.]

There are seven circuits in England where Assizes are held and about seventy cases are appealed to the Court of Criminal Appeals semi-annually; about two-thirds of the appeals are dismissed, in one-third the verdict or sentence is quashed or modified. No new trials are ever granted as the Court of Appeals itself has authority practically to try the case anew, receiving all necessary evidence and taking the testimony even of witnesses who have not appeared in the trial court. If it appears that the jury had sufficient competent facts before it to support the verdict, the Court of Appeals seldom sets aside the verdict of the jury. The object is to avoid miscarriages of justice such as formerly occurred from time to time by reason of mistaken identity, unreliable expert testimony, errors of the court in admitting incompetent, or excluding competent, evidence and the like. When a case has reached the Court of Appeals it would be a waste of time not finally to dispose of it there without sending it back for a new trial with all its attendant delays, possibility of further errors, further appeals and other new trials.

The principal objection to appeals in criminal cases in England is that they substitute the judgment of a few judges for the verdict of twelve men drawn from all classes of the community, with average common sense and knowledge of the world, who, as a body, are not subject to professional, political, or social prejudice. On the other hand it may be said that jurors are without capacity or weighing evidence, are easily influenced by popular prejudice, are without individual responsibility, are capable of being intimidated or corrupted and are not obliged to give any reasons for their verdict.

Summary Proceedings.

There is another form of judicial procedure in England, namely, by summary conviction before a justice of the peace. By summary proceedings are principally meant such as are directed by several acts of Parliament for the conviction of offenders and the infliction of penalties created by those acts of Parliament. In these cases there is no intervention of a jury but the party accused is acquitted or condemned by the suffrage of such person only as the statute has appointed for his judge.

Of this summary nature are all trials of frauds and offenses against the excise and other branches of the revenue which are enquired into by the commissioners of the respective revenue departments or by justices of the peace in the county where they occur. Another branch of summary procedure is that before justices of the peace in order to inflict petty fines and imprisonment imposed by acts of Parliament for disorderly offenses such as malicious mischief, drunkenness, common swearing, vagrancy and a vast variety of others, all of which were formerly punished after a verdict by a jury.

Summary process is extremely brief, the offender is summoned, the magistrate examines one or more witnesses as the statute may require, upon oath; he then enters his conviction in writing upon which he usually issues his warrant either to apprehend the party in case imprisonment is to be inflicted or if a fine has been imposed to levy the penalty by sale of the defendant's goods. Justices out of session are also empowered to award costs either against the person making the complaint or against the person claiming the complaint or against the person claiming of and if these costs are not paid to levy them by sale of the defendant's goods or if he is without any property then to commit such person for any time not less than ten days nor more than one month with hard labor.

No Appeal But By Statute.

From these convictions there is no appeal unless expressly given by statute but the party has a general right to certiorari to remove the conviction in to the King's Bench. If an appeal is given by statute to the quarter sessions (where several magistrates sit) they are bound to receive any evidence whether it was tendered at the former hearing or not.

These summary proceedings were unknown to the common law and appear to have arisen from the increase of population, multiplicity of legal regulations and the expense and delay of bringing great numbers of petty offences before the regular tribunals of criminal judicature.

The justices holding quarter sessions are not allowed to convict on any capital felony or any felony where there has been a previous conviction, nor for bigamy, abduction, blasphemous or seditious libels or offenses against the King or the Parliament.

To obtain the opinion of a superior court on questions of law which arise in the exercise of summary jurisdiction by justices of the peace, police magistrates, etc., any party aggrieved by the decision of the justices may have a case stated for the superior court, or the King's Bench may order a case to be stated.

In England there is no limitation upon the time within which a criminal may be prosecuted except in the case of a very few statutory offenses where the statute establishes the limitation.

Private Prosecutions.

A striking fact in the criminal procedure of England is the prosecution of offenders by private persons, of course in the name of the King. Any member of the community can prosecute another for any offense of which he is guilty on the principle that when the community suffers every member thereof suffers and that any crime against an individual is a crime against the community; not only may he prosecute but he is paid the costs and expenses incurred in so doing, with compensation for his loss of time, out of the property of the person convicted. It is no longer only the King against the felon but the person injured against him and his guilt is litigated between them according to the rules of evidence in civil cases, with a few exceptions, as where his guilt must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt and that the accused has the presumption of innocence in his favor.

Much Dignity, No Oratory.

In the higher courts of England much formality is observed and on some occasions great pomp and circumstance, survivals of former times which lend dignity to proceedings and sometimes serve a useful purpose. The bar invariably display great deference towards the bench and treat each other with much courtesy and consideration as brethren of the same learned profession. Personal abuse in court is unknown among them.

Americans, so justly famous for oratory, are usually disappointed when visiting English courts, by the absence of old-time eloquence as the bar, the judges of Erskine, Burke and Curran are dead and in this era of age eloquence is never attempted by an English barrister no matter how dramatic or pathetic the circumstances of a case may be. He has learned that British juries distrust eloquence, that they are not swayed by rhetoric, that frantic appeals to the feelings easily degenerate into foolish exaggeration which only begets ridicule and contempt. The modern jurymen listens with undisguised disgust to a blustering barrister tearing a passion to tatters and casting venom and vituperation on all around him; neither would an advocate who sets the scene with stage widows and property orphans gain the favor of a jury. They would consider such proceedings an insult to their intelligence and impartiality. English counsel therefore are trained to try their cases earnestly but dispassionately and to address to the jury calm, logical arguments and clear, plain statements of facts, in simple language. The judge's charge is also delivered in plain words, though often a masterly analysis of the facts and a profound exposition of the law. It has been called "the voice of Justice himself."

No "Sweating."

There is no "sweating" now in English criminal procedure. That has passed with the star chamber; torture was never legal in England although Bonnie Scotland was once cursed with it. Now the guilt of a prisoner must be proved otherwise than by extorted confessions, although it may be pleasant, as a native Indian policeman said, to sit in the shade rubbing red pepper into a poor wretch's eye than to rush around in the sun hunting evidence wherewith to convict him. Of course it is illegal here as in Great Britain and should be impossible in this Eldorado of freedom under the folds of the Stars and Stripes.

But there was a time, under the Stuarts and until the commonwealth, 1688, when prisoners were confined and while in ignorance of the evidence against them questioned often and severely on every point. The commonwealth abolished these star-chamber proceedings which had come into use to corrupt and oppress which flourished in the days of the Plantagenets and until after the War of the Roses, when jury trials had become dangerous, reward and corrupt, owing to the local influence of men of wealth and standing, who intimidated, bought, and otherwise corrupted jurors. To remedy this the privy council was authorized by Henry VIII to try these corrupters of juries arbitrarily, by which means the jury system was saved. In turn the privy council used its powers for evil purposes which led to the abolition of the star chamber court.

The manner in which in England evidence is obtained by the government from an accomplice is either by a proclamation of a reward, and pardon or by an implied or expressed promise of indemnity, in which latter case it is usual to take an acquittal of the witness.

England has greatly amended her criminal procedure in the last thirty years and the end is not yet. In these modern days of aeroplanes, submarines, wireless telegraph, and radio, it seems folly for learned judges to sit like Paduan professors in darkened chambers occupied with worthless conundrums, as for example whether or not an indictment is sufficient when it does not contain the word "feloniously," a word which cannot be defined and the derivation of which is much in doubt; does it mean venepos, vicious, etc., or, as some say, merely forfeiture? Whatever it means it is useless.

Summing up of English Procedure.

The similarity of English criminal procedure with that of our own state is naturally very great, both having been derived from the same source; the dissimilarities are few but may in some cases here lead to delay and uncertainty in criminal trials. In England no time is lost in discussing the constitutionality of a statute, the laws are not so frequently changed as here and therefore new questions are not constantly occupying the attention of the courts; there a summons is issued to an offender at the instance of any private person without the delay incident upon waiting for the authorities to prosecute; the grand jury may act on its own knowledge, information and observation and cannot be called to account, indictments are simple in form and drawn by officials who are expert, amendments are easy and certain, jurors are weeded out in advance, newspaper comment not being permitted, challenges are few, the voir dire examination must conclusively prove bias by competent evidence, talesmen drawn are not often excused from service. Writs of Error and New Trials and Bills of Exception having been abolished, the trial progresses quickly, no attempt at eloquence being made, addresses to the jury are not so lengthy, the jurors are treated in a manner which inclines them not to delay in bringing in a verdict, there are no new trials in the trial court (possibly the greatest cause of delay); appeals are not easily taken and frivolous ones are summarily dismissed; the case is finally disposed of in the court of appeals where technicalities are ignored if substantial justice has been done.

SEA AND MOUNTAINS.

(Chester H. Rowell, in Fresno Republican.)

There is one creed of the mountains and another of the sea. The mountain is a theist; the sea a pantheist. The mountain points upward to Heaven; the sea dissolves into Nirvana.

On the mountain the finger of God has written the story of creation. There is beginning and middle and end, and a multitude of episodes and digressions. The mountain itself is a growth, a visible handwork. The waters laid down its strata, the fire upheaved them, and the ice sculptured them, each in its own time and turn. In its rocks are the fossils of the past and on its surface is the life of the present. Fossil outcrop, moraine and forest, each tells its chapter, profound but definite. Vast time and vast forces have gone to the making of the mountain, but they are comprehensible and finite, the projections, not the immediate symbol of the Infinite. The mountain ain inspires to thought and to work. There are things to understand and things to do, all on a scale grand enough to uplift, but not overwhelming enough to cast down. Humanly the mountain speaks the language and preaches the creed of the Occidental man. One can be a Christian in the mountain, and not be present; Also, one can work and think and study, and remember and plan.

But the sea preserves no marks of the finger of God and its God has no fingers, nor any parts or members. The sea itself is neither new nor old, and has no past nor present; only an eternal Now. It has not even Here or There, for all places are one to it; the very navigator has to locate himself, not by a fact, but by a mathematical abstraction determined by tangents and cosines. The sea has no measure, for there is no unit to measure it by; it has to be applied to another part, and then to another, and the number of applications counted. Individuality, separateness, are illusions in the sea; the only reality is The One. There is one wave, and another wave, but presently they are the same wave, and then no wave. The drop of spray flashes a moment, a separate unit, and then sinks back again into the undivided One. Since the world was, the sea is, but the spirit of God still broods on the face of the waters, as it did in the beginning, changeless forever. Not the grasp of thought, but only the rapt vision of the Plotinus can apprehend the vastness of the sea. Its lessons are not written in a book, but whispered in the oracles of mystery. Its language, to humans, is the occult speech of the Orient. Its creed is not Christianity, but Theosophy, or esoteric Brahminism. Its God is the inscrutable; its destiny Nirvana.

MEMORIALS OF TENNYSON.

In the Fine Art Gallery in New Bond street, London, an interesting exhibition is being held of memorials to the poet Tennyson. Here are to be seen portraits by such artists as Laurence, Millais, Watts and Herkomer, depicting the poet-laureate in different stages of his career. In gathering materials for an exhibition illustrative of the life and works of Alfred Tennyson, the Fine Art Society has not had to contend with any difficulty arising out of a superabundance of material. Much that would have been of interest has been destroyed or has passed beyond reach. For instance, the manuscript of "In Memoriam" is in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge, a gift of the terms of which preclude its being lent. Yet this same manuscript was none too carefully guarded by its author.

Some few weeks after Tennyson had left his lodgings, "up two pair of stairs" in Mornington place, Hampstead road, he wrote to Coventry Patmore that he could not find his book of Elegies—"a long, butcher-ledger-like book," and that he had some idea of having lent it to Patmore. Patmore went to Tennyson's house, and in spite of a landlady that resented the intrusion, discovered the volume in a cupboard where Tennyson kept his tea and bread and butter.

Besides portraits of Tennyson himself, there is one of his friend Hallam as a boy at Eton in a blue swallow-tail coat and high stock; also a charming little water color of Lady Tennyson painted by Sir John Millais shortly after her marriage. Near this same portrait is a poem inscribed by the poet to the vicar of Shiplake who performed the marriage ceremony, in which the young bridegroom says:

Never parish feud perplex you,
Tithe unpaid or party strife,
All things please you, nothing vex you;
You have given me such a wife.

There is also to be seen at the little exhibition the beautiful picture by Waterhouse of the "Lady of Shalott," and another of the same subject by Holman Hunt in the gorgeous coloring of that artist so faithful to the ideals of the "Brotherhood." Then again there are charming views of Lord Tennyson's lovely home in Surrey, so that the Fine Art Gallery may be congratulated on having collected many things of interest to those who hold the name of Tennyson in affectionate regard.

STUYVESANT SQUARE is on the border-line of respectability between one of New York's earlier fashionable districts and the East Side slums. On the west side of the square, St. George's church and a prim red-and-white Quaker meeting-house preserve the tradition of intense propriety. On the east side of Second Avenue, which crosses the square in half a block, for Jewish working girls and the club-house of the People's Institute are emblems of the sweating, roaring millions that lie beyond. The square itself is enclosed by a high, iron-picketed fence, within which lawns and fountains and noble elms make it a verdant plot, a bit of paradise gemming perdition.

Here, on a June morning, came Dolly Hopkins and Paul White, talking of—Kansas, Kansas of the corn-plumed prairies, Kansas of the school-house, Kansas that spelled Home. Dolly looked fresh and pink and strong, pretty, too; her dress starched and white, but appreciably not in style. Dolly had been in town a week, and this was her first experience out of Kansas.

Paul, as he expressed it, had "lived it down." His tailor-made appearance was emphasized by slightly exaggerated looseness of his clothes, and this need not be further explained than by saying that he was studying art. He carried a portfolio of sketches, and as Dolly and he settled themselves on a bench in the square, he began to untie the tapes that held them in. "Kansas!" Paul was saying. "You'll have a lot better time when we settle down in a flat here than you ever had in Kansas. The cornfields are all right, but little old New York for me. I don't see how I ever managed to survive plowing and milking and doing the chores."

Dolly did not smile, as he had expected. "Pa said the makings of a good farmer went to waste when you came here," she replied.

"That's the reason I came. I saw I had too much of a knack for the farm ever to leave it if I stayed a few years more. And think how much more I get paid here, in the libraries and galleries and the jolly crowd of fellows—by George! we do have the bluest times. Suppers in the fellows' rooms and trips afterwards through the East Side—down that way; see, past that farthest elm there. There are all sorts of funny places down there, Bohemian, the jays call them, but that's foolishness—but they are pretty lively, nothing bad, you know, just free-and-easy; nobody knows anybody else, so it isn't like a Sunday-school picnic in Kansas, where a lot of old ladies would be shocked if Billy Vantum got tangled up with a drop too much of creme de menthe; and there's music and dancing and women sing as they sit at their tables. It's so different from going to bed with the chickens and hearing nothing but the katydids after dark."

"What has that to do with art?" Dolly inquired.

"Art! Nothing, of course. That's simply the way we amuse ourselves in our leisure hours."

"You were going to show me your drawings," and Dolly leaned over to see the works of art. Paul laid them out; sketches of trees and detail studies of flowers and a few more pretentious efforts in water-color.

"They aren't what you'd call masterpieces," said Paul, "and they don't look like much to show for a year's work, but the road to success is pretty hard in painting. I'll tell you."

Dolly laid the last sketch back and pondered a moment.

"Paul, will you ever be as good an artist as you would be a farmer without half trying?"

His face went red and he hesitated: "Well, maybe not. Everybody says I can draw, but nobody seems to think I'm a genius. I hate to admit it, but I've got to be honest with you. You'll forgive me if I don't make myself famous, will you?"

Dolly turned suddenly, her eyes dancing and her chin-dimple delicious.

"Paul, be honest again. Tell me; when you were out with your artists have you ever got drunk?"

"Wha-a? Dru-drunk! What on earth do

BY WAY OF LITTLE HUNGARY

"You want to know that for?"

"Well, no, not beastly drunk nor anything like that. I've felt pretty careless and happy once or twice, that's all. But wha—?"

"Never mind, I said. Now listen to me. If you don't want me to break our engagement right here, you make me a promise."

"I will not promise never to drink again or any of that sort of—"

"Be still. Do you promise?"

"Anything but—"

"Well, I'm going back home with pa tomorrow morning, Pennsylvania road, you know, and I want you to meet me at the ferry and see us off at Jersey City. What do you suppose I want you to do to-night?"

"Give it up."

"Go to Bohemia and get—well, drink all you possibly can, all, do you understand? I want to see what you look like the next morning."

"Dolly, you—you don't mean that. You're joking."

"Well, you'll find out it's serious joking. Now take me back to the hotel."

Paul took her. Wondering. As she bade him good-bye he protested:

"Look here: your father invited me to take dinner to-night with you, and I want to see you the last evening you're here. This isn't fair, I say."

"I'll attend to pa; you run on and take dinner at one of your Bohemian places, and stay out late, and if you're real obedient maybe pa and I will let you travel as far as Altona with us so you can tell me all about it from a fresh impression. Only don't you dare fail to do what I told you."

It was Friday night. Paul picked up two of his student friends at his lodgings.

"Come on, boys. It's on me: dinner at Little Hungary at eight, supper in Chinatown at eleven, anything we can get to drink anywhere we can get it at any time later, Pennsylvania ferry at eight in the morning. I'm crazy, but you too care. One of you's got to stay sober enough to get me to the ferry, that's all; swear it on your honor, Joe."

"I swear; though you are crazy, for sure, Polly. What's his hit you?"

"Tend to your own knittin', fellow. Ain't a free treat enough for you, without wanting a diagram thrown in? How about it, Jack?"

"I'm on. Let's flit."

They took the elevated to Houston street and made their way toward the famous Little Hungary cafe, away over in the East Side. As they advanced, the street lights grew less and less frequent and less bright, and in inverse ratio, the throng grew denser, poorer, more polyglot, and gayer. At last they reached the restaurant and entered its brilliant rooms.

Many lights, much tobacco smoke, men and women at round tables, music and laughter, waiters carrying glasses and dishes and more glasses, easy familiarity and the boisterous mirth of those who haunt "Bohemia."

The boys found a table in the basement gallery.

"This is mainly a liquid feast for me, boys. What's yours?"

Cocktails around was the order. After them, the dinner. They serve it table d'hôte, and it takes a long time to eat it and to drink all the wine in the curiously inverted siphons under which you put your glass and by lifting it release a glass stopper the less it fills. "You struck the right night for a bust, Polly," Joe remarked. "Friday night they call this place Liberty Hall."

"Don't I know it?" Paul snapped. "Waiter! If I've got to swell myself full when I don't want it, I'm not going to rot my insides with this Dago red. Bring me a quart of Sauterne. You fellows don't get any of this. It's my private tippie. You sick to the red."

Jack and Joe laughed.

"What's this crazy streak you've got on to-night, anyway?" asked Jack.

"Tensing, tensing! Why was I only teasing you," roared Paul. "Three glasses, waiter. Boys, I have made a certain lady a solemn promise to get intoxi-oxi-ated to-night, and to meet her at the ferry in the morning (tune of 'Danny Deever in The Morning')—where's that orchestra—and Joe, my boy, you're sworn to get me there."

The music had struck into a Hungarian valse, and the crowd, which now filled all the tables, beat time with fingers, forks, or feet, to the rhythm of the piece. A woman at the table next to Paul's turned to him and touched his elbow with her fan.

"Pardon me, Mr.—"

"Bonaparte, madame, Mr. Napoleon Bonaparte, of Corsica, Kansas. On my left, madam, Mr. Julius Caesar, of Rome, Georgia; and Mr. Alexander, of Athens, Alabama."

"Mr. Bonaparte, Gentlemen. You look lonely, with only three at the table. Wasn't it made for four?"

"Precisely. Charmed. Permit me," and Paul bowed the woman to the seat at his right.

A toast to the lady of No Name, Queen of Liberty Hall," and they drank it down.

Similar introductions were in process all through the cafe. People who, in their ordinary walks, would have been insulted at a word from a stranger, fraternized at the feast of Folly's friends for an hour and strangers forever after. The air grew fast and furious. Jest was bandied across tables, flirtatious smiles leapt intervening spaces, the laughter rose louder and more insistent, the smoke hung in dense strata below the beamed ceiling. The music beat time to the rising tide of mirth. Mr. Marseilles could answer to this mood nobody knows, but when the orchestra swung into its stirring strains the frolics were wild. Men and women rose, drank the toast and crashed the glasses on the table. The woman at Paul's right caught Joe's hand and mounted by a chair to the table top, kicked the glasses to the floor, and danced gayly to the music. Other women caught partners catch-as-catch-can and whirled giddily between the tables.

Paul leaned back in his chair, with eyes half-shut against the curling smoke of his cigar, watching the table-dance before him with an amused, sarcastic smile. Suddenly he leaned forward, his eyes brightening, and caught his bottle up.

"She said to, so here goes. A health to the lady who sent us here, and a toast to the morning," and he drained the bottle.

He looked at his watch.

"Boys, we're overdue at Chinatown. Madame, pardon us, but we have an engagement with the Rajah of Bong at No. 22 Mott street in about twenty minutes, so if you will honor us by ordering a farewell drink, we'll bid you a regretful adieu."

"Oh, slush!" murmured Joe, but the woman smiled.

"Absinthe, please, and I'll take a box of cigarettes besides, just to remember you by, if you don't mind."

"By all means!" They drank her health, and rose as she started to return to her table. "And by what name may we remember the lady to whom we are indebted for the chief pleasure of the evening, may I ask?"

"Just Dolly, that's all, thank you, though."

"O, Lord!" groaned Paul, as they made their way to the street.

"Dolly and Polly are jolly, by golly," Jack and Joe chorused as they took Paul's arms and marched abreast toward Chinatown.

Paul greeted his teeth as he thought of his Dolly, white and wholesome. But he thought again of her decided air and stern command, and followed the trail to Chinatown.

"Chop suy for me," ordered Joe.

"Noodles," Jack demanded.

"Rice wine; no more food," was Paul's order.

The gilded, tawdry woodwork and the near-oriental seats and tables of the Chinese restaurant were already a blurred offense to Paul's eyes. Unhealthy looking men with long hair and dreamy eyes sat with painted women who made a brave pretense at mirth. An automatic piano at one side of the room galloped stentoriously through popular airs. A stale haze of burning punk completed the delusion of a "truly tough Chinese joint."

The rice wine came in little china pots, and Paul drank it steadily from the tiny china thimbles that go with it.

"Boys!" he murmured. "I've kepsh m' word wish lady. Goo' boy, Joe, kepsh word wish Polly. Ferry, Joe, ferry."

He leaned back in his chair, sound asleep. Joe looked at his watch.

Three o'clock. Get a cab, Jack, and we'll take them up to that Turkish bath at Lafayette Place and straighten him up. He'd be a lovely object to see a lady off on the train in this shape."

Jack returned in a few minutes, and the two helped Paul down and into the cab. Two hours in the bath, a nap of two hours more, and several cups of black coffee brought Paul back to himself.

"Good boy, Joe. Get a cab, the cars might miss it. Twenty-third street, and hurry. O, my poor head!"

At the ferry they found Dolly and her father. Dolly fresh and sweet and smiling, looking as cool and serene as a spring morning. Paul introduced Jack and Joe, who chatted with her while Paul bought a ticket to Altona. The ferry-gate opened, and Joe and Jack waded good-by.

Of the boys Paul exclaimed:

"Let's stand outside, for heaven's sake. I want all the fresh air I can get."

He pointed out to Dolly and her father the Singer building looming 600 feet above the river, and, at a nearby dock, the Lusitania, 200 feet from stern to stern.

"The biggest building and the biggest boat," he added. "That's the New York idea."

"Mighty small crops of wheat they raise here, though," suggested Dolly's father, and Paul was silent.

They passed through the crowd in the Jersey City terminal of the Pennsylvania, found their train on track 18, and got aboard. Soon they left the hissing, smoking station, crossed the Jersey marshes, and struck into the hills. Dolly's father sought the smoking compartment with a stack of morning papers, and, at Dolly's suggestion, she and Paul went to the rear of the train and spread camp stools on the observation platform and watched the landscape constantly diminish as the train sped forward. The cool morning air felt gratefully on Paul's fevered face, and the sight of the green fields and the gray mist rising from them appealed to him strongly after the glare of the night just passed.

"Did you enjoy yourself last night, as much as usual?" Dolly asked.

Something more than the flush of fever redeemed Paul's face. He looked at Dolly, fresh and sweet and smiling, and turned his eyes away at the recollection of the painted faces and forced laughter of the women he had left. He did not answer.

"When you go back, I want you to draw me sketches of the places that you saw last night, and the girls. It will be good practice for your art studies, won't it?" Dolly smiled. Paul's lips parted, but he shut them quickly, and did not speak. Dolly continued:

"And when you're on the road back from Altona, notice these farmers, won't you, please, and make some sketches of them, too. I'll want something in our state to remind me a little bit of Kansas now and then. It will be a little hard, perhaps, to get over being one of the jays, as you called us, and I may want to see the pictures after we have had a gay evening some time together in Bohemia Look! there! that's a good pasture, isn't it? These people do know how to farm, even if pa thinks they don't."

"Farm!" burst out Paul. "Gimme a quarter-section in old Kansas and I'd show these fellows how to farm. Why, look how that Rubie has got his fence, he's wasting an acre in every ten I'd—"

"O, I know what you'd do as a farmer, but doesn't that tumble-down barn, for instance, appeal to you, as an artist, as a picturesque—"

Paul turned on his seat with an exclamation of disgust.

"Art be whooped! Art be blowed! Art be—be—"

"Dammed," suggested Dolly, gently.

"Thank you, Dolly. God bless you, dear, you have certainly got all the common-sense the two of us will ever have. You're right. I'm a dub of an artist, and always will be. I'm going to go right on back to Kansas on this train, and take hold of the old farm and let dad take it easy, and you and I will just everlastingly show Kansas how to grow corn. Is it a go?"

"It's a whiz," exclaimed Dolly, beaming. "Blessed girl. But what put it into your head to send me down the cocktail route last night?"

"How do you feel this morning?" was Dolly's evasive answer.

"As if I never wanted to see New York again," was Paul's solemn reply.

"That's what I thought," mused Dolly, looking non-committally at a semaphore dropping to "clear track" as the train entered another block on the road to Kansas.

"THE SANDLAPPER."

By Arthur J. Pillsbury.

With the next issue of The California Weekly will begin the publication of a short serial story written by Mr. Arthur J. Pillsbury under the above title. The term, "Sandlapper" was coined years ago by a well-known character of Tulare and Fresno counties, the late State Senator Tom Fowler, and applied to the grain farmers who first settled upon the San Joaquin plains in opposition to the interests of the cattle and sheep men, to which class Tom Fowler himself belonged. The story involves the transformation of a stock range into a highly cultivated and irrigated farming and dairying community, portraying in bold relief the water controversy and other attendant hardships undergone during the processes of transformation, and yet it is essentially a story and not a history. While all of the characters and most of the incidents are purely fictitious the story will typify a phase of our Californian life true to nature and new to literature.

Competent critics to whom the manuscript has been submitted pronounce it thoroughly readable and predict that it will prove no mean contribution to the semi-historical literature of our state.

When the Railroad Stops to Dine.

Sometimes it has been complained that our Western railroads are somewhat slow and sleepy when compared with the Eastern article. The criticism is too general in its terms; it should be amended by designating the Eastern road with which comparison is to be made. Our roads may be slow and sleepy when compared with some lines in the East, but when compared with others we are extremely rapid and wide awake. If you doubt it, listen to this: On the Catskill Mountain railroad, a wheel moves between 12 and 2 P. M.; station agents look and leave their offices, fires in engines are banked, train service is suspended—the entire railroad goes to dinner. And the same condition exists on the Catskill and Tannersville railroad, except that the "hour off" is from 11 A. M. to noon. In the light of such facts, how wide awake our roads seem! Undoubtedly we should designate the Eastern railroad when we are comparing.

Lots of babies and no acquaintance with the divorce courts were the qualifications that David Belasco demanded of all actors to whom he gave roles in Leo Ditrichstein's comedy, "Is Matrimony a Failure," which is to be produced at the Belasco Theater in New York on August 24th.

There is nothing in the office itself of director of the United States mint to attract a scholar like Prof. A. P. Andrew of Harvard. But it can be made of some use for monetary investigation and of some weight in gaining the public ear for monetary addresses, and this is presumably why he has taken it.

"It is practically impossible to find a community in the United States," says Nathan C. Schaeffer, state superintendent of Pennsylvania, writing in the discussion of taxation as related to public education, published by the National Education Association, "that does not spend more money for whiskey and tobacco than for education."

The Publishers' Circular, of London, conveyed to its readers the following startling bit of "Personalia" in its issue of July 10th: "Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe on June 14 celebrated the ninety-eighth anniversary of her birth. Fifty-nine years ago Mrs. Stowe sent into the world a work that had a far greater effect than any other on the progress and destiny of America."

Mrs. Albert Levin Richardson, a genealogist of Baltimore, seems to be able to find what she looks for. At the request of Miss Katherine Elkins she has found that Miss Elkins is a descendant of "many generations of Italian kings," and that, therefore, the present king need not be so selfish in opposing her wedding to the Duke of the Abruzzi on the ground of her plebeian origin. Truly "they that seek shall find."

Mrs. Arthur McDermott Wilson, president of the women's auxiliary of the Uncle Remus Memorial Fund, is to begin active work for the fund immediately on her return from Europe, where she has been spending the summer with her husband. The fund is for the purpose of buying and keeping as a perpetual memorial of Joel Chandler Harris his home, Snap Bean Farm, on Garden street, in the western suburb of Atlanta.

The Maxim family, of Maine, has been extraordinarily prolific of inventive geniuses. Hiram S. Maxim is the inventor of the rapid-fire Maxim gun; Hudson Maxim, of Brooklyn, his brother, is the inventor of Maximite smokeless powder, and Samuel Maxim, of Wayne, Me., another brother, is the inventor of a new process of making super-hardened steel. The father was Isaac Maxim, who invented machine-guns, torpedo nettings, and the knitting machine.

Causes of the New Constitution.

The causes which led up to the framing and adoption of the new constitution for California have, by many, been set forth with more particularity than unanimity. Much depends upon the point of view, but some sort of a review of those causes is essential to an understanding of the spirit of the new constitution and the effect it has had upon the commonwealth.

The causes ordinarily set forth are hard times and sandlotism. The hard times brought on by the panic of 1873 lasted long, and the terrible drouth of 1877 made conditions especially hard in California, but these did not produce Dennis Kearney or sandlotism. Kearney and sandlotism were occasions rather than causes which led to the new constitution.

For causes one must go back to the influx of '49 and '50, when California was inundated with adventurous men, men anxious to make fortunes quickly and to get away to spend them elsewhere; men devoid of a moral purpose in settling the country. That lack of a moral purpose has followed the state through its history and has helped to bring about conditions that made the new constitution inevitable. Inasmuch as government by the people is dependent upon the character of the people, this lack has proven fundamental. Low political standards have been maintained. The attitude of a large element in the political life of California was admirably phrased not long since by one who has occupied a position of great influence over the minds of the commonwealth through his newspaper, when he exclaimed, "To hell with morality! What we want is prosperity." This has prompted San Francisco to send about as good delegations to San Quentin as to conventions or legislatures, to the unutterable degradation of the state and its government.

But, as stated heretofore, perhaps ten per cent of the new population of the commonwealth manifested criminal tendencies, whereas, under normal conditions, scarcely more than one in the hundred manifests such tendencies and not above one in the thousand can be classed as criminal. This helped to lower the state's standards of social morality and put society to a supreme test to hold itself together.

The third great factor in the culmination of '78 and '79 was the Central Pacific Railroad in California. A few splendid specimens of manhood undertook the construction of a railroad across the mountains and plains to Salt Lake, there to meet another coming west. Not having means of their own with which to build the road, they had to induce others to build it for them. They "weaved" the National Government to that end for all it could be made to yield; they worked the state government and the governments of cities and counties. This carried them into politics head over heels. They were indomitable men. They did the things necessary to accomplish their ends, reluctantly at first, without scruple at the last. Nearly every vote of bonds in their aid by city or county involved a lawsuit before the issue was settled finally. This made it as necessary to control courts as legislatures or boards of supervisors, and here, too, the necessary things were done that the Central Pacific Railroad might be built.

Another factor in the demoralization of these men, and through them of the state, was the Contract & Finance Company. It also began to go wrong by easy gradations. As a convenient way of building the first few miles of the road the original incorporators contracted with Charles Crocker & Co., the other stockholders being the "Co" to build certain sections of the roadbed and lay the rails. Crocker at first sublet these contracts, but they soon found that more was to be saved by building directly than by subletting, so they incorporated the firm as a corporation under the name of the Contract & Finance Company. When the Central Pacific Company began to have stockholders, and other people's money began to be used in building the road, this Contract & Finance Company made its members rich out of "other people's money" by building the road at a relatively low cost to the contractors, who had introduced Chinese labor, but at relatively high cost to the stockholders in the Central Pacific Company. This completed the moral overthrow of these great men. They became money-mad and bought legislators as they bought mules, and elected subservient judges as they elected other officials subservient to their designs. They kept everything in stock from United States Senators down to city trustees.

The result of all this, running through a period of at least ten years before the hard times of '73-'79, was that the people of California lost their faith in their public servants; lost their faith in legislatures which had shamefully betrayed their trust, and lost their faith in the courts, which had been pretty generally made up of men upon whom the Central Pacific "royal family" could rely in an emergency. Wanting a moral purpose to begin with, being overloaded with an abnormal percentage of the criminally inclined and suffering hard conditions not of their own making, the people of California were in a temper bordering upon the revolutionary spirit, and out of this grew the demand for a new constitution that would right wrongs and redress grievances.

Just as the special interests everywhere avail themselves of the very ablest attorneys in court and in congresses and legislatures, so the privileged corporations and wealthy men of California clubbed together to send to the constitutional convention their brainiest and most capable men. These men were able, in the convention, to pull the fangs of the most virulent radicals and demagogues, as well as to nullify a great deal of the good that progressive men would have liked to accomplish. What these representatives of wealth left undone the courts were soon able to interpret in harmony with vested rights and wrongs, so that little of permanent character was achieved by what we may call the insurrectionary (rather than revolutionary) movement of 1879. The next lesson will deal with some of the essential differences between the new constitution and the old.

EVENING SONG.

By Sidney Lanier.

Look off, dear Love, across the fallow sands,
And mark you meeting of the sun and sea,
How long they kiss in sight of all the lands,
Ah! longer, longer, we.

Now in the sea's red vintage melts the sun,
As Egypt's pearl dissolved in rosy wine,
And Cleopatra nimbly drinks all 'Tis done,
Love, lay thy hand in mine.

Come forth, sweet stars, and comfort heaven's heart;

Glimmer, ye waves, round else unlighted

O night, divorce our sun and sky apart,
Never our lips, our hands.

Under What Name?

The militant spirit is moving among that element in the Republican party that stands for independent, progressive and constructive policies, and already there is some discussion as to what name the work of party regeneration may best be carried forward under.

The name is not all important. It is the thing that will count in the end, and yet a name that will clearly denote the thing will be an aid to the enterprise. There are some who feel that the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League was essentially temporary in character, that some mistakes were made in the conduct of its campaign that may hinder it in the conduct of another, that some affiliations were formed that proved injurious and some concessions to policy made that tended to discredit the organization in the minds of those who wished no compromise with anything short of the true, the beautiful and the good.

These things may all be admitted. Some men did break into that league who had no other credentials to offer than that they had worn themselves out and been dropped by the Herrin machine as too frayed, raveled and tattered to be any longer presentable. Some others got into the league, only to prove a disappointment after they got there. Whenever the league made concessions to policy, and listened to the warnings of timidity, it lost its cause and earned only contempt instead of praise. These were the fortunes of political warfare and no change of name can insure against a repetition of those calamities.

On the other hand, the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League won some splendid triumphs. It forced the nomination and election of many good men and it compelled the "organization" to be more decent than it had been within the memory of men. Had it known who was who in its own ranks, and been better organized and disciplined in carrying forward its work, it would have proven irresistible. For the first time in the history of the political bureau of the Southern Pacific Company an opposition was raised up that that bureau was forced to reckon with. To abandon the name would be to make confession that the movement commanded less than the loyalty of honorable men. There is no justification for the making of any such confession.

Besides, the coupling of the names of Lincoln and Roosevelt is wonderfully expressive of the purpose of any organization that undertakes to mobilize and energize an independent, progressive and constructive Republicanism. The chiefest task in hand is the emancipation of a commonwealth. Lincoln was the great emancipator. The issue involves human rights now as certainly as the issues met by Lincoln. This is a moral movement and so was the movement to which Lincoln put his shoulder. As for Roosevelt the lines of cleavage between the predatory and the public interests are lines which he, more than anyone else, laid down. The Roosevelt policies are still the paramount concern of the nation.

The independent, progressive, constructive element in the Republican party will go far and search long before they find a more suggestive, inspiring, appropriate name under which to marshal their hosts than that of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League.

Grosscup to the Rescue.

Judge Peter Grosscup is not only a railroad judge but a railroad man, a stockholder if not a director in transportation companies. He reads the law from the railroad man's point of view and the blow he lately struck the Interstate Commerce Commission is not to be wondered at.

The power to make rates ought to be at the railroad office, ought to be where the shipper, the consignee and the transporter may be heard and their conflicting interests harmonized. If there had been no such thing as discrimination, extortion, rebating and all the other villainies of railroading, that power would remain in the railroad offices by universal consent.

There are five parties to each such transaction, railroad, shipper, consignee, producer and consumer. The railroad can not be trusted to act for all these. It has abused the trust too abominably to be tolerated. Somebody else must act in the premises for the protection of the other parties. That somebody must be the government.

With a characteristic judicial assumption of what the judge knew to be untrue Grosscup held it impossible that congress could have intended what it manifestly did intend—that the Interstate Commerce Commission should exercise the rate-making function.

But no Grosscup can block the wheels of progress. The government is advancing upon the citadel of railroad rate-making wherever unjust rates are made by railroads and there will be no retreat. The courts can not perform that function. It is administrative in character and necessarily a function of the executive department of government.

Verily the predatory interests are crowding some first class problems upon the attention of His Serenity, our ample chief executive. What will he say about them in December?

Harriman At Home.

Mr. E. H. Harriman has returned from Europe. The cable kept the American public informed regarding him until he reached the zone of wireless telegraphy when that took him up. Half a carload of reporters were ready to greet him and the news services flashed bulletins as to his state of health over ten thousand wires to millions of homes. Wall street was on the quiver to know the best or worst and millions upon millions of intangible wealth hangs by as slender a thread as does this man's life.

Is it good that it should be so? Is it necessary? The California Weekly wishes E. H. Harriman nothing worse than that his apparent nearness to eternity should impart to him a moral purpose he has never known. His philosophy of life has been that of the jungle. It has been that each man is entitled to all he can get, anyhow he can get it, and to make such disposition of it as best pleases himself. He is a feudal chief such as no feudal system ever knew, but the feudalism of old was overthrown and the neo-feudalism of Harriman, and men of his class, can be overthrown as certainly and as advantageously. It is not consonant with a sound public policy that so much should hang pendant upon the wasting vitalities of any mortal being. It savors of the plight of unregenerate souls, "hair hung and breeze shaken" over the bottomless pit.

Centralization of financial power has gone far, too far. The gospel of political emancipation, now being preached in many states by many men, needs to be carried forward to industrial and financial emancipation as well. Not only must the individual man regain his lost political prerogatives, but his lost financial, industrial, commercial. Centralization has resulted from following the direction of least resistance rather than that of economic necessity. It is time to face the other way.

Admirable Duplicity.

When rascality rises to the rank of genius it is not without claim upon public admiration. Anything but a bungling knave! There is this to be said for Calhoun, the Chronicle and all the rest of the knavish defenders of graft and grafters. They have stuck to their one lie until they have given it such a semblance to truth as to deceive many. That lie was that the prosecution of Calhoun was not an effort to establish justice, but merely a private warfare waged by aggressive interests for purely personal reasons. There never was a shadow of justification for this contention, but by iterating and reiterating it in every key and tone, they have given it a verisimilitude to truth. Not once have they flinched from it or weakened on it. They are not cheap, bungling scoundrels. They understand their business. Their steadfast duplicity commands admiration.

It is unquestioned that Mr Justice Harry Melvin shines in poetry, song and politics.

MACARTHUR IS THE MAN.

The political situation in San Francisco is so transparently clear that no seeing man should be in doubt regarding it. History is repeating itself. Look to it.

The Schmitz-Ruef combination exactly suited the predatory financial interests of this city, except that an accident befell it which led to disagreeable consequences. Those interests have planned for exactly such another. The board of supervisors nominated by the alleged "business men's committee" makes this perfectly clear.

But William Crocker is not the man whom the predatory interests want for mayor. The negative righteousness of Crocker served its purpose when, by the votes of thousands of galvanized Republicans, made up of serviceable Union Labor party men and remnants of the Rainey Democracy, Byron Mauzy was defeated for the Republican nomination for mayor. From now on Crocker will be given the knife by precisely those who were instrumental in nominating him. Although weak, he is essentially too decent a man for their purposes.

The man the predatory interests want for mayor is McCarthy. He is a good-ought Schmitz for them, and, out of all the nominees for supervisor, it will be possible to select a board with whom gentlemen can do business "through the proper intermediary," as it was under the Schmitz-Ruef regime. It was this same predatory element, working hand and glove with the South of Market and tenderloin vote, that elected Schmitz, and it will elect McCarthy if it can.

With no fourth man in the field the better element, that is not too disgusted to vote at all, will vote for Leland or Crocker. The election of either will be next to impossible and unsatisfactory if accomplished. The backing of both is devoid of moral purpose and promises nothing at the very best better than an innocuous desuetude.

The one and only thing needful to save the day is the nomination of a fourth candidate for whom men of character and conscience can work and vote with enthusiasm. Such a man will go into the fight with a phalanx back of him and will confront the untoward element divided into three camps. The only salvation for the predatory interests is to prevent the fourth man entering the field. With the fourth man out of the way, the predatory interests will win a victory whichever gains the election, although the election of McCarthy will suit them best.

Who shall the fourth man be? In our judgment Walter Macarthur is that man. There is not in San Francisco a man who doubts his honesty, his resolution, his clearness of vision or his splendid common sense. Rich and poor alike admire and trust him. Not once has he failed in any emergency. The Good Government League should place him in nomination, or, if not the Good Government League, and what would be better than that, then a spontaneous movement on behalf of the best citizenship of San Francisco without regard to party or other affiliations.

Regard for party regularity will deter many independent Republicans from openly acting in this matter, but once in the voting booth practically every Republican who voted for Mauzy would vote for Macarthur, besides thousands of real, and not political, union labor men and other thousands who did not vote at the primary.

If, as reported likely, the Bulletin comes out for Leland as for the lesser of three evils, and the Call for Crocker for the same reason, it will be unfortunate, but the injury will not be irreparable. San Francisco has in times past all gone one way with its newspapers all standing the other. As, at Santiago de Cuba, the Spanish fleet would have been annihilated just the same even if Sampson and Schley had both been at the bottom of the sea, because the men themselves would have "up and at them" by a common impulse, so, in November, the Men of San Francisco will win the day for decent politics and a clean, strong, city government if only the names are on the ballot from among whom they can select a government. They need not to have anyone tell them how to vote. Put on the ballot the name of Walter Macarthur, however it gets there, and Macarthur, Heney and incumbent nominees for supervisors will go in with a whoop.

The only enemy civic decency has to fear is the one it is now confronting—that political cowardice that fears to do anything positive, aggressive, unusual (which cowardice always goes down to ignominy and defeat), but like Bourbonism, is never able to learn anything even from the school of adversity.

This emergency calls for men of daring. Whoever wavers over uncertainties is lost. The manhood of San Francisco will not abide a choice between three admitted evils. It will suffer the election to go by default first, but give them a chance at one positive good and they will jump at it.

STATE OR NATIONAL CONTROL.

Representative S. C. Smith has returned from Washington with a determined purpose in mind. It is to strip the United States government of control over rights of way, power and reservoir sites on government lands and in forest reserves by ceding such control to the states in general, and to California in particular. This is to be done that there may be a state revenue from, and control over, the use of public waters for the generation of power.

Mr. Smith's sincerity is not to be questioned nor is his knowledge of the subject to be under-estimated. A number of papers have already taken the subject in hand, some of them espousing Mr. Smith's view of the case, and the issue may be regarded as before the public. While not, perhaps, of transcendent importance at this time, the issue merits a thorough and painstaking discussion.

Control of the use of waters for the development of power has not been made a subject for specific and adequate enactment either by state or nation. The forest service has made certain rules and regulations for the granting of rights of way and utilization of power privileges that have the force of law until congress acts in the premises, but, until congress does act, a large disservice is left to bureaucratic officers who come and go as administrations change, giving a lack of permanency to power privileges that militates against their utilization. Sooner or later the issue must be put to rest.

There are two conceivable courses open. Either congress must enact laws under which definite rights to power sites may be acquired or congress will cede the whole subject to the states. If it cedes to one state it will cede to all, and if not to all then to none.

Mr. Smith holds out glowing possibilities to the state as to revenue to be derived from the use of public waters for power purposes, the strategic key to which may be state control over rights of way through government lands and in forest reservations. Per contra, he inveighs against the injustice to the West of allowing the national government to make these rights incident to a revenue for the uses of the nation, making the industries of the West contribute to the national exchequer, while the industries of the East do not.

To our mind the problem is not one of revenue for either nation or state, but of control, to the end that the users of these rights of way and power sites may not exploit the consuming public to the extent of taking to themselves the net profits of the industrial activities of the whole people.

Objection has been made that, when we prefer national control to state, we evidence a distrust of the People of California. When the People of California shall have established a state government by, of and for themselves we shall trust it to the last degree. We have no fear of what an aroused public sentiment may demand, but California has not been governed by the People of California for more than thirty years. It has been governed by an association of great and greedy corporations. It is so governed now, and if congress were now to cede the relatively few remaining public power privileges to the state of California it would, in effect, be ceding them to the Southern Pacific Company and its allied interests. That is why this paper opposes such session at this time. First redeem the state from corporate control, and then we shall see what we shall see.

Meantime, the best sentiment of the nation is aroused to the necessity for conservation and focussed upon the administration at Washington. Any man connected with the disposal of power privileges must act in opposition to the public welfare at his peril. Misfeasance there will not be like misfeasance here, a tempest in a teapot. It will mean an upheaval. The mind of the nation is fixed on conservation and control and we have faith to believe that, under pressure of that focusing of national sentiment upon Washington, a safe and just policy of power control will be evolved and enacted into law.

A TASK FOR CONSTRUCTIVE STATESMANSHIP.

Save for the national homestead law the policy of the government regarding the national domain has been one of distinguished imbecility. The homestead law was sound. It gave to each head of a family an opportunity to earn 160 acres of agricultural land by making a home on it. That was the best disposition of that kind of land that could have been made and to grant such lands in perpetuity was and is right.

But when the government undertook to apply the same or an analogous principle to timber, coal and oil lands it blundered. It was not possible for the owner of 160 acres of timber or coal land to market the product or make a home out of the allotment. Such lands must be combined in an acreage sufficient to create an industry and commercial enterprise of magnitude. The natural result, the result that should have been foreseen, was that dummy locators were hired to acquire land patents for the benefit of large corporations. A bad law was violated through perjury and fraud, and an economic proposition was forced by unlawful methods.

The same sort of situation has developed in relation to the Alaska coal lands. Those lands cannot be worked profitably, and the product marketed, in quarter sections. Railroads must be built, steamer lines established and markets made, and to do this requires large capital and an organized industrial mechanism. To accomplish this dummy locators have been employed and title to large tracts attempted to be secured through familiar timber-land-steal methods, with this apparent exception: Care has been taken not to make any specific agreement with the dummy locators until after they have located. If an agreement to sell these lands when patented were made the day before making a location the locations and subsequent purchases would be held fraudulent. If made the day after locations were made, the purchases would be of locations patentable. Thus is the law's majesty vindicated and the same end accomplished!

Is it not about time for the government to do something with reference to what remains of its public domain? Forests should be lumbered in areas sufficiently large to make their lumbering profitable, and under such conditions as will insure the rehabilitation of every forest lumbered. No forest land should be alienated in perpetuity or on other than a stumpage basis.

So it should be as to coal lands. They should not be alienated in perpetuity as long as they are coal lands. Some power of control should remain in the government for the prevention of extortion, waste and needless destruction for such purposes as the surface may be fit. We have learned some hard lessons of the consequences of unmitigated corporate control of common necessities, and we ought not to have to repeat the lesson.

Time was when we could say with truth that, "Government should not enter into competition with private enterprises." So long as enterprise was private this was sound doctrine. When enterprise not only became corporate but syndicated and bound together in "communities of interest" as rich and as powerful as government itself the old rule ceased to apply. The wisest and most far-seeing can not now venture to set doctrinal bounds to the activities of government in furtherance of the general welfare.

Few can wish to see government enter commercial and industrial fields of activity or upon the performance of public service utilities, but if organized rapacity persists in forcing the issue, persists in debauching cities, states and congresses, persists in taking to itself the net results of the industry and frugality of the continent, persists in recognizing the validity of no law not made for its own advantage, the uses of government may be extended beyond the hither confine of socialism. Every step toward that goal is being forced by rapacity masquerading under the name of private enterprise.

Is it not time for constructive statesmanship to lay hold on some of these problems in dealing with what is left of the national domain, including timber, oil, coal and water power, and outline for the nation something better than a policy of imbecility? Heretofore the producer has been the one concern of government. Hereafter the consumer should have his turn at the bar of justice.

American Shipping in American Ships.

With the exception of the conservation of our national resources, the adequate control in the public interest of vast aggregations of financial power, and the establishment of impartial justice there is no public issue in which the people of San Francisco, California and the Pacific coast should take a deep interest in the rehabilitation of our American merchant marine. This being so every citizen of state, city and coast owes it to himself and to his country to inform himself on this subject. With the purpose of aiding this duty of self-information The California Weekly has arranged with Mr. George W. Dickie (the man who, of all others on this coast has, by reason of special information, the best right to be heard) for a series of articles on this subject. The first one is presented herewith. Others will follow at fortnightly intervals. We are sure that our thoughtful readers will join with us in heartily thanking Mr. Dickie for the favor conferred.

It will be noted from this initial article that American shipping has never, in all its history, been able to compete with other nations in carrying our commerce around the world, nor, for that matter, has any other nation been able to compete without some form of special privilege or subsidy. The world has been fostering its over-sea commerce in one way or another from remotest times and it is against a fostered, subsidized, privileged maritime commerce that America has been striving to make headway without subsidy with such disastrous results.

Originally, as Mr. Dickie shows, this issue became a bond of union between the states, making for national solidarity and unity of purpose. Now it has become a cause of difference between the seaboard and the interior, where men look only into the sky and never out upon the water. That narrowed range of vision which characterizes the interior is to be lamented, but lamentation will not cure it. Information will, but we of the seaboard can not enlighten our brethren of the interior until we enlighten ourselves. Our maritime history should be at our tongue's end. When we know whereof we speak we shall be able to convince others. The first duty, necessity and pleasure of each individual should be to master this subject. The future of this coast is wrapped up in it.

How Much Better?

The Utah Fuel Company was caught in the act of unlawfully acquiring title to government coal lands and suits were instituted. The fuel company confessed guilt, paid a fine sufficiently large to reimburse the government for its costs, restored the lands and forfeited advances made on them, but no one was prosecuted criminally and nobody goes to jail. "How much better than to have sought by long drawn out trials to put some of the officers of that company in prison!" exclaim the mouthpieces of plutocracy all over the country.

Well, try it on the horsethief! He makes off with a fine saddle animal, is intercepted by telegraph, rides back to the barn in custody of the sheriff, replaces the horse in the barn, pays for its use while absent and throws in the saddle as an evidence of good will. Good morning, Mr. Horsethief: no harm done.

Try it on the defaulting bank cashier! He loots the safe and starts for Honduras, but is overhauled at Tia Juana, brought back with the swag in his suitcase, restores it to the cash box, the account is balanced and the suit case is left with the bank by way of recompense for the inadvertence. Good morning, Mr. Defaulter. Resume your duties at the desk, no harm done.

How much better than to have a long drawn out trial with the purpose of sending a useful horsethief and a reputable cashier to prison! Besides, such proceedings would tend to tarnish the reputations of their families and hurt the feelings of their friends! How much better! How very much less disagreeable all around!

The Deeper Significance
: : : : of Living : : : :

You sit with your first baby in your arms, proud as mortal ever was, and the next thing you know he is in kilts, then in knee breeches and presently a sophomore. Nothing abides.

Or perhaps it is a girl baby instead of a boy, and shortly she is a pert miss or a tomboy, then a young social bud about whom you are anxious, and then she marries and goes forth from your home to a home of her own, perhaps beyond the mountains, leaving you desolate. Nothing abides.

You own your first new home, spick and span, fresh and clean, and, in a little while it needs repainting, then remodeling, then to be torn down or sold that it may give place to a larger, more modern, imposing residence better suited to your station, yet not such a cozy place to be happy in as the old one was. Alas, nothing abides!

You run up and down stairs without conscious effort, your feet fairly twinkling as you fly, then, the first you know, up and down you go with stately if not solemn tread, and afterward you pry yourself up as with a lever and arrive at the top puffing wheezily. Your youth has gone. Nothing abides.

You venture into life a sceptic and an iconoclast, repudiating all that is marvelous, planting your feet upon the eternal, demonstrable certainties, with courage to face unflinchingly inexorable consequences, and then, the first thing you know, the old tunes that you heard last in your childhood when you were forced to sit, noliens volens, long hours, while long-winded preachers preached and choirs sang, sound best to you, and, as you hear the stately hymns sung, you shamefacedly take off your glasses to wipe the gathering moisture from the corners of your eyes, conscious that nothing, not even the cock-sureness of youth, shields you from the old tunes.

And yet, "If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon he shall receive a reward." He ought to. Where so little abides the one who does make something stay put is worthy of reward.

But if nothing that you would keep always just as it is will stay, there are enough things that do stay persistently, that you fain would be rid of, to force a balance.

For instance, there is the unclean son that you accidentally overheard your father telling, when you had not supposed that he ever did such things, that you have not been able to forget from that day to this, feeling as you do the corruption that entered into your father's mind and that came to stay. You know in your heart that you have never been since just what you were before that incident, nor have you been able to think of your father as you had thought of him up to that time. Somehow, such things do stick and you know that they will stick in the mind and memory of your boy as they have stuck in yours. Why it, you exclaim, that is one of the things to which we would hold fast! Nothing abides, while the things of this world are bound to rot and decay. We would hold fast to that which would be rid stick like leeches!"

There are things, good as well as evil, that stay by us well. The books that old Col. John B. Anderson lent to the boy, Carnegie, prompted the canny Scotch-American to build libraries all over one continent and parts of others. Perhaps it was the one teacher you took to making your school days who really took an interest in you and made you know that he did take an interest in you. He caused you to take a real interest in yourself and put you on the highroad to a successful and useful career. Or it was the one crushing criticism of your maiden effort in literature, in the pulpit, at the bar or somewhere on the firing line of endeavor, that took the heart out of you and made you appear so ridiculous in your own eyes. Or it was the one teacher, or one friend, or one parent, who said to you, "You have not to this day been able to do the best that you have all along felt was in you to do. Yes, some things do abide."

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Why Not Join the Forest Service?

There is a chance for nature-lovers and those who find more allurement in the solitudes and the wilds than in cities. On October 25th and 26th there will be examinations to fill vacancies in the ranger force in all national forests in California. There are sixteen cities or towns in which these examinations will be held, and these are the names of them: Alturas, Bishop, Hot Springs, Los Angeles, Northfork, New City, Quincy, Red Bluff, San Diego, Salinas, Santa Barbara, Sisson, Sonoma, Weaverville, Willows and Yreka. Knowledge of field conditions, rather than book-learning, will be the main essential, although aspirants will find that the latter will not come amiss, as men with the wider accomplishments stand the better show of promotion. Many may feel themselves called, but only seventy-five will be chosen. Aspirants must be between the ages of 21 and 40, and successful ones will receive a salary of $900 at the beginning. Nine hundred dollars a year, before promotion comes, and an opportunity to be out where houses do not interfere with one's view of the Almighty—it ought to strike some people as worth while.

Lincoln Penny Has Its Drawbacks.

The new Lincoln penny has arrived—or, if it has not, it is on its way—and some people have discovered that they are not so pleased by it as they had thought they would be. Notable among such persons are the officials and stockholders of telephone companies and the owners of penny-in-the-slot machines. The objectionable feature of the new penny is that it is thicker, larger and heavier than the old penny, and the telephone people object to it because it successfully works their nickel-in-the-slot arrangement, while the penny-in-the-slot people protest because it will not work theirs. The new coin already has gained considerable circulation in New York and other eastern cities, and the telephone companies find that they are about as likely to reap pennies as nickels when they harvest their "drop-your-nickel." This might be satisfactory enough to people who sometimes heretofore have dropped their nickels only to be forgotten in the dolce far niente dreams of Central, but it is less satisfactory to the garnerers of telephone crops. This is treating the subject somewhat lightly, but it will readily enough be realized that this peculiarity of the new cent may become serious. It is nominated in the bond that the companies should have their nickels, and, as some millions of the Lincoln pennies already are in circulation, the problem concerning what can be done about it may become pressing.

The Nation's Manufacturing Enterprises.

The Bureau of the Census has issued its Bulletin 101, which treats of the manufacturing enterprises of the United States, and an interesting array of figures it presents. Here are a few which should be most interesting. The American people have invested in such enterprises nearly five billion dollars; the value of their yearly product is more than six billions of dollars, while their yearly disbursement exceeds a billion dollars. That is to say, the value of their yearly product is about 20 per cent. greater than the capital invested, while they pay wages amounting to about 17 per cent. of the value of their products. It is of interest to note that, while San Francisco manufacturers pay their workmen but 18 1/2 per cent. of the value of their products, there are but three cities in the United States that exceed this rate, viz: Boston, Providence, and Cleveland, while nine that pay less are enumerated. During the five years from 1901 to 1905 inclusive the increase in capital invested has been $2,000,000,000, the annual product $1,287,000,000, and in annual wages $224,000,000. It will be observed that products have increased rather more in proportion than have wages.

Comes High to See Aviators at Rheims.

While aviators are smashing records and winning, or losing, prizes at the great airship exhibition at Rheims, France, the thrifty residents of that old town are making their golden hay while the sun shines. Rheims is crowded with visitors, and the visitors must pay prices that need airships to overtake them, or else it were better that the visitors had remained at home. For instance, note how many host of the inns is filling his hidden stocking with good, yellow coin of the realm. All that he receives for board and lodging from each guest is from $15 to $36 a day, and, of course, it is understood that baths are never included in a French hotel. As the exhibition is to continue a week, Boniface will receive from $105 to $252 for each guest; say, an average of $175 for each recipient of his bounty. Ah, that hidden stocking! How merrily it will jingle! Then the guest inevitably visits the exhibition. He can go in with the hot pool, stand in the jam and see something or nothing as fortune pleases, for from 20 to 60 cents, but if he wishes to be more exclusive it will cost him from $4 to $33 a day, sums which remind one that aviation is the art of more or less high flying. It is a wonderful exhibit, this at Rheims, but it is to be hoped that those present thoughtfully considered their bank accounts before they attended.

A Parti-Colored French Army.

Writing of France and the French, it will be funny to call attention to the fact that Colonel Mangin of the French army now is promoting a scheme which, if the government accepts it, as it may, will give the army a spotted and colored variety to put a leopard's coat to shame. At the present time the army includes 18,000 negroes among its soldiers. Colonel Mangin proposes that this number, by means of conscription from French West Africa and the Sudan, shall be increased to 230,000. This would supply a generous spot, or streak, of midnight blackness for the army. But this is not all. The colonel proposes to lighten up the gloom of this ebony spot—but rather gradually than rapidly—by adding 100,000 Arabs to the army. Black shading off into brown, with approximations to buff in places. There still remain the Mongols to add a yellow streak, but Colonel Mangin says nothing about them, and probably he does not desire that sort of a streak in the army. It is urged that both the negroes and the Arabs make fine soldiers, but it is not conceivable that, with no bond of patriotism to hold them, they might prove too fine in the event of rebellion, constituting, if not a peril, at least a menace at such a time? However, we need not worry; doubtless the French government will thoroughly consider all such conditions before it adopts the suggestion offered by Colonel Mangin.

Signboards for Ships of the Air.

An unforeseen outcome of the invasion of our atmosphere by dirigibles and aeroplanes is likely to be increased illumination of the earth's surface by means of electricity. At least, this will be the case if a plan advocated by the Aero Club of Berlin, and now being considered by the principal aeronautical societies of the world, is adopted. The plan was first suggested by Captain von Frankenberg, the director of the Berlin Club, and, under its terms, letters and signs, each nine feet in length, would be placed in conspicuous places throughout Europe, to say nothing of the United States. These mammoth signs would be lighted by electricity at night, a letter, for instance, indicating a country and a number a city. Other signs would denote seas, mountains, marshes, national boundaries, etc. A sure to an aeronaut's handbook would inform a sky-traveler precisely concerning his location above the world of men. It is considered certain that some plan of the sort will be adopted, and, oh, how the old planet will glitter of nights after it has been!

The Telephone and the Oceans.

Such a situation is not very imminent, but it is quite possible that some of us, standing in New York or Boston, yet may talk with friends in London or Paris, or, sitting in a booth in San Francisco or Seattle, may converse with a wandering acquaintance in Tokyo or Peking. At any rate, the announced co-operation of the British and French governments, with the purpose of laying a telephone cable under the English channel, harks in that direction. The plan to be adopted is one suggested some years ago by Professor Pupin of Columbia University, and consists of the use of "choking coils," which, it is claimed, increase the carrying power of the voice. Let such a system be made effective across the channel, and it is entirely conceivable that the next step will be to extend it across the Atlantic.

WORTH KNOWING.

Did you ever think how important it is to have a strictly reliable drug store put up your prescription, and dispense your remedies, and a store that will not "graft" by paying the physician a percentage of your prescription?

The Ferry Drug Store, at No. 20 Market street, San Francisco, does not pay a percentage to any physician, and will discharge any clerk in its employ that would substitute one article for another in a prescription. This store is operated on a "square deal" plan, and every article you purchase in this store is guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money will be returned.

HOW A BOOK SUCCEEDED.

Recalling a sentence in "Critics' Era of Good Feeling," which appeared on this page two weeks ago, it is of interest to tell how one book succeeded independently of all reviews, puffs, and advertisements.

The book is "Bob, Son of Battle." The author is an English army officer, and he wrote the book in a hospital during convalescence from a wound received in the Boer war. The book is the story of a magnificent sheep-dog, with his wonderful, almost human, intelligence, and with his loyalty that cannot be praised more highly than to say it was dog-like. After "Rab and His Friends," it is the best dog story in the English language.

This book was published one year ago, in a small edition, as most novelists' first books are. The publishers were enterprising, and used all the modern means to exploit it. They called it to reviewers' attention, advertised it, supplied the dealers with window placards for it.

It sold perhaps 500 copies. At the end of a year, they figured it another fizzle and sorrowfully charged it off the ledger.

But at the end of another six months, a Milwaukee dealer ordered 200 copies. The publishers gasped. They filled the order, and wrote to ask what had started the boom of "Bob, Son of Battle" in Milwaukee. The dealer replied that he had read the book, was charmed with it, lent it to friends, who, in turn, praised it enthusiastically to other friends. Soon he was over-run with orders. He duplicated his order for 200 copies within a month. Similar experiences began to crop up from other unrelated parts of the country. It had taken a good while for the heaven to rise, but the friends' friends soon put the book on a steady selling basis, where it has stayed ever since. This book is now a permanent asset of its publishers.

Which illustrates the fact that a good book will be read, regardless of critics and advertising.

The author tried his hand at another book, a "real novel." The publishers accepted it, and set it up in type. Then the author did an extraordinary thing; he listened to the advice of his best friends, who told him his "real novel" was commonplace and would mar the reputation made by his classic, simple "dog story." He bought the publishers' plates and destroyed them, and has been silent since, a refreshing example of unselfish restraint and discretion for a successful writer.

SHAKESPEARE IN SYRIA.

The London Chronicle points out that the stupendous and overwhelming fact of "the supreme dominance of the English tongue in the ancient worlds of the east," to which Lord Morley recently referred, is illustrated in a performance of "As You Like It," given by the students of the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut, Syria. In the cast were representatives of nearly every nationality and religion of the east.

All the parts were played by men. Rosalind was a young Greek from Tripoli. Orlando came from a small Syrian village in the Lebanon mountains. Celia was a son of an Armenian residing in Cyprus, while Phoebe was a Jewish boy from Aleppo. Oliver, brother to Orlando, was a member of a prominent Druze family; the Wrestler was a Kurd from beyond Damascus; Corin was the son of English parents living in Beirut, the only one of the actors really familiar with the English play.

Jaques was a Moslem student from Egypt. Duke Frederick came from Armenia. Adam was a Greek pilot on the Suez canal, while Dennis was a Coot from the Nile valley. In spite of the fact that the play was given in a language so far removed from their own mother tongues as is English from Arabic or Turkish, not a line was forgotten or a cue lost.

CALIFORNIA'S FIRST NEWSPAPER.

There was sold in New York the other day a copy of California's first newspaper, the Monterey Californian, says the New York Sun. It was dated December 19, 1864, was crudely printed, had four pages, 8½ by 12 inches, and was half in Spanish and half in English.

The paper owed its start to Commodore Stockton, who succeeded Commodore Sloat in command of the Pacific squadron after Sloat had hoisted the United States flag at Monterey on July 7, 1864. Upon looking over the property of the defunct Mexican government there was discovered an old font of long primer type and a Ramage press, which had been used since 1824 to do the official printing of the Mexican government in California.

Commodore Stockton had appointed as one of the alcaides of Monterey the Rev. Walter Colton, chaplain of one of the vessels of the squadron, and he proposed that Colton should issue an American newspaper. This advice Colton promptly adopted, and with Dr. Robert Wright he began the publication of the Monterey Californian on August 15, 1864, a little more than a month after the occupation of the country by the American forces.

Dr. Semple, afterward one of the most prominent of California's citizens, was a man of unusual personality. He was a dentist by occupation, 6 feet 6 inches in height and possessed of tremendous strength. He came originally from Kentucky and was a member of Fremont's party when the pathfinder first went to Monterey to join forces with Sloat.

When Colton and Semple began the issue of the Californian they found one important deficiency—he font of type did not contain a "w." This deficiency was supplied to a degree by the use of two v's wherever a w occurred. The editor apologized for the lack of w's in an editorial signed "V.V. for Colton."

Colton described the press as being old enough to warrant its preservation as a curiosity. The type was dirty and pied, and it was only by scouring that the letters could be made to show their faces. There being neither rules nor leads, some sheets of tin were cut up into pieces to take their place.

The only paper available was in sheets a little larger than ordinary foolscap. This was the paper on which most of the archives of California and other Spanish-American provinces were written, the thicker quality being prepared for writing purposes. The office of the Californian was in an upper room of the Monterey barracks, and the first number created a sensation, a crowd waiting for the first sheet to come from the press.

The needed supply of type had apparently not reached the Californian up to December 19, 1864, for in that issue the same expedient of using two v's for a w was used.

In May, 1867, the Californian was removed from Monterey to San Francisco, the last number to be issued at Monterey bearing the date May 6, 1867. On June 1, 1867, appeared the first number of the second volume, which ran to April, 1868.

The second newspaper published in California, the Yerba Buena California Star, appeared first on January 9, 1847, under the ownership of Samuel Brannan. It was removed from May until the latter part of June, 1848, during the development of the gold excitement. California did not possess a single newspaper. About July 1, 1848, some of the printers, disgusted with the result of their gold-seeking ventures, returned to San Francisco and began the publication of the third volume of the Californian.

What are said to be the only complete files of these first of California's newspapers now belong to the state library in California.

It is announced that John Vance Cheney, poet and librarian of the Newburg Library in Chicago, has given up his poetical aspirations and gone into the business of manufacturing hair tonic.

A NEW BIBLIOPHILE'S PRIZE.

In a furniture store recently William Beer, librarian of the Howard Memorial Library, stumbled upon one of the oldest and rarest volumes discovered in New Orleans in decades, says the New Orleans Times. The volume was printed in Strasburg more than three and a half centuries ago, and only about a half century after the first book ever printed came from the press.

The title page and the last pages are missing, but the work was easily identified as the herbal written by Jeremy Bock, and printed in 1546, "Herbs, Their Names and Properties," is its title, as translated from the German, in which the work appeared. Authoritative catalogues on ancient books show that a Latin edition was printed a few years previous and that the German edition followed so as to increase the sale of the work. There are 567 herbs listed in the book.

But the chief interest of the book is its illustration. Every herb is shown, the woodcuts most exquisitely made and hand-colored. The wonder is that the woodcuts are so perfect and that the ink and the water colors have stayed perfectly fresh since the days of Shakespeare.

David Kandel executed the woodcuts, so the encyclopedias say. The value of the book in money is not to be ascertained. Records show that none has been sold in over ten years.

Though a highly prized treasure, the herbal is not the oldest volume in the library. This distinction goes to the Nuremberg Chronicle, printed in 1493. There are about seventy of these books in existence printed in German. This "Chronicle" gives the history of the world from its Genesis, and it is illustrated with the most astounding and realistic woodcuts.

IN CAPE COD GRAVEYARDS.

Mournfully characteristic of all the Cape Cod graveyards are the cenotaphs raised to the memory of those who perished at sea. They are terribly frequent. The name of the deceased, the date of his birth, the date and place of the disaster and the name of the ship are given, and between those meager lines the passer-by must imagine, as he readily can, the details of catastrophes that shocked the world and decimated whole villages. In Truro there is a shaft, "Sacred to the memory of fifty-seven citizens of Truro who were lost in seven vessels which foundered at sea in the memorable gale of October 3, 1841," and beneath is the bitter cry of the women and the children: Man goeth to his long home and the mourners go about the streets.

In a forgotten town history of this region are some verses that tell all the story of this sad coast, the story of the waiting and the yearning and the long despair, of the sailing away and the returning no more forever:

O fleet that silent tarries

Along our listening land,

No night to come dismays thee,

No bar and tempest strand.

O sails that seek no shelter,

That need no beacon light;

In vain our hearts we opt,

In vain our hearts we invite.

O watchers, all ye look for

Will come, or soon or late;

Thou shalt be always tarry;

We cannot always wait.

These lines are signed "Hiram Rich."

ICELAND'S ART MUSEUM.

Iceland is to have an art museum. The sculptor, Cinar Jonsen, has long desired that his native country should possess an art collection, and with that object in view has presented all his works—49 in number—as a nucleus. The only condition named by him was that a suitable housing place be provided by the government, and this be accessible to the people. The Althing, by a unanimous vote, agreed to accept the gift and to comply with the terms.

A QUAINT EXOTIC PEOPLE

CUSTOMS OF THE RUSSIAN COLONY IN CALIFORNIA.

The prince of Russian newspaper reporters, the late Julian Ralph, once wrote a series of articles on "People We Pass in the Street." In these articles he made his readers pause while he showed them what lay behind the masks of people's "street faces." He told the story of the commonplace-looking man whose life was really a maze of romance and adventure. He exposed the hopes and fears and joys and sorrows that everybody hides behind the domino of expressionless features. The moral of his theme was that everybody is human, even the people we casually pass in the street. Incidentally, he illustrated the principle that appearances are deceptive.

All of this is recalled by a visit to a colony of Russians who live high up on a hill in the Potrero district of San Francisco. There are only about sixty families of them, all told. They live in three or four groups, a block or two apart, in a district populated mainly by Italians and Irish. From the front of their houses one gets no idea that the people within live otherwise than their neighbors or otherwise than Americans of the poorer, day-laborer class. Thus, again, appearances are deceptive. For these sixty families live a life as remote from the mode of living of their neighbors as the life of the Russian steppes is different from the life of Merced or Tulare. They have no intercourse, social or religious, with their neighbors of any other nationality. They eat differently, they bathe differently, they worship in their own peculiar way, they intermarry and perform the ceremony of marriage after another ritual.

These people are natives of Tiflis and the neighboring country, in the extreme southern part of European Russia, south of the Caucasus Mountains and between the Black Sea and the Caspian Sea. They came to San Francisco from the Hawaiian Islands, whither they were first carried as contract laborers for the sugar plantations. Nearly all the men are now employed at rough labor in the Union Iron Works, and the women who work as hard as the men, take in washing or go out by the day to clean house or scrub or wash.

But it is in their own homes that they are most interesting. A family of four can live on $1.25 a month besides rent. The food is the simplest possible. Meat is bought by the half-dollar's worth, the cheapest scraps and ends. It is then boiled until every particle of the juice is extracted into a thick soup or broth. The dry meat is then eaten, placed on a dish in the center of the table, each member of the family helping himself with a fork, eating the chunks he has speared and then spearing another. When the dry meat is gone, the broth becomes the piece de resistance of the meal. The broth is placed in a large bowl in the center of the table, and each member of the family scoops into the bowl with a round, varnished wooden spoon, alternating mouthfuls in order around the table.

With the meat or broth is served the coarsest of coarse bread. As they live four or six families in a house, bread and meat are usually baked for all the families in a common kitchen. The only other ingredients of the regular diet of fare are occasional sweets and huge quantities of tea. These people have all brought their big brass samovars with them, and hot water is on tap most of the time for brewing tea.

Clothing costs them little. They buy practically all of it second-hand from the Salvation Army. The men dress roughly after the fashion of the poorer Americans. The women retain traces of the Russian dress in the headgear, which indicates whether the woman is married or single; and in the shawls they invariably wear on the street. The children show the strongest evidences of their Russian customs. Infants wear a solitary garment, a long slip, and from two to four ruffled caps, one pulled on over the other. Girls up to twelve or fourteen wear a sort of Mother-Hubbard slip coming down to the shoe tops. Boys and girls from two years to eight or nine wear little calico aprons, and all have their hair shaved well up to the line of the earlobes on the back of their necks.

The domestic economy of these Russians is extremely simple. Besides the common kitchen, the bedrooms are the main care, and these have a deceptive air of cleanliness, due to the liberal use of water on the floors. This cleans the middle of the rooms very well, but carelessness in sweeping it out and lack of scrubbing causes an accumulation of dirt in the cracks and of little heaps of mud in the corners.

The beds are fearful and wonderful creations. Most of them are merely wooden bunks, though there are a few iron bedsteads. But each bed has two or three feather beds, one or two Turkish rugs, and several gorgeously-colored comforters on it. Throughout every house is the odor of stale cooking and the acrid smell one usually associates with the presence of the unwashed.

But they resent the implication of personal uncleanliness. Their baths are their pride. Every squalid house has its little bathroom in the rear, a little six by ten chicken-coop of a shack where the members of the family practice the distinctive art of the Russian bath. These houses are divided by a partition on one side of which is the door of a Dutch oven, which runs through into the section occupied by the bather and his attendant. In this section the stove is piled with a heap of small stones. Two water pipes, with faucets, enter this room, one pipe passing over the stove to heat the water. A bench for the bather to lie on, a bunch of aculeus switches and a dipper complete the apparatus.

The bath is achieved by closing the door of the house tight and opening the one small slit of a window to admit fresh air. The attendant builds a fire in the stove, and when the stones on top of the stove are hot, he pours cold water upon them, filling the room with a dense steam. Meanwhile the bather dashes hot water over himself with the dipper and then slashes his body with the bundle of switches. After he has enjoyed the sweat to his satisfaction the attendant rubs him down with gumbo and the bath is complete.

The sanitary virtue of this cleanly ordinance is largely nullified by the fact that the people insist upon disposing of all sewage in open sinks in their own door-yards a few feet from the cooking and sleeping quarters. Here it stews in the open air until it seeps into the ground over the water pipes that supply the drinking water. The sanitary condition of the whole quarter is deplorable, and the efforts of the doctors in the neighborhood have had little effect in altering the habits of centuries in this respect.

The domestic arts of the women are rudimentary, being practically limited to embroidery in one simple cross-stitch and to the crudest of cooking and dressmaking. Every household, though, however poor, boasts a modern sewing machine.

These people marry at sixteen or seventeen years of age and preserve the marriage customs of the old country. The groom must pay the girl's father a substantial dot to recompense him for the loss of the girl's earning capacity. The wedding ceremony begins at the bride's house and ends at the groom's. The symbol of marriage in the ceremony is the literal "tying of the knot," when the young couple tie a knot in a long embroidered cloth that they hold between them throughout the rite.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Woman Holds Us Level.

It is rough, the road to heaven,
And it's smooth, the road to hades,
And our chance were one in seven
If it were not for the ladies;
For "the woman, heaven bless 'em,"
While they're partial to our graces
As we lovingly caress 'em,
Rather hold us in the traces.

Oh, we men have spirits willing,
But the flesh is contumacious;
Love of wives our souls is filling,
But the other girls—O, gracious!
Oft, I fear, we'd go a-straying
To the imps that shame the devil
Were it not that, right obeying,
Woman holds us down, and level.

Take the instance of the churches—
And I here might mention others—
Most the ones upon their perches
Are the women, not their brothers;
And when we are wobbling slightly,
Carmine point and us are swinging,
Woman pulls our bridle tightly,
With a, "Heed what you are doing!"

Oh, it's rough, the road to heaven,
And it's smooth, the road to hades,
But, my brethren, as our leaven
We may count upon its ladies,
And if somewhere one is caring
For our sideward steps or prances,
Heeding where and how we're faring,
Well, I'm hopeful for our chances

A More or Less Hypothetical Story.

A certain successful politician died and went to heaven.
(Do not forget that this is a hypothetical story.)

And as soon as he got there St. Peter said, "Ah, come in. Glad to see you. Come right in."
(It is getting more hypothetical all the time.)

And when the successful politician hesitated St. Peter said, "Don't wait, a moment. We can't get along without you."

(It is becoming so hypothetical that some people would call it a lie if I were not writing it.)

"A man who is so good on earth that the people repeatedly choose him to represent them," St. Peter continued, "must be the kind that is desired here."

(This may be hypothetical, or it merely may indicate that in his long absence from earth the good saint had forgotten.)

But the politician looked through the gate, and said, "No, I don't see in there any of the kind of gang that I have been accustomed to do business with." So he rapidly went down stairs.

(It is claimed that the last paragraph is not nearly so hypothetical as the remainder.)

Mrs. Hyphen on Marital Felicity.

"The basis of all marital felicity, I am convinced," said Mrs. O. B. Hyphen, "is compromise. Men and women are certain to differ in their desires and opinions, and, unless the proper spirit is shown, these differences widen into chasms which cannot be crossed. It is at such crucial times that the spirit of compromise prevents the widening rift in the lute of domestic harmony. Let me illustrate. The other evening I wished to go to a theater and Mr. Hyphen did not wish to go, as he remarked in language so forcible that I will not repeat it. Right then and there we might have quarreled, but, instead, we happily compromised, and—"

"How did you compromise?" I asked.

"Why, we went to the theater."

For a moment I thought the good lady was going to blush, but she soon continued:

"Often, I think, it is well prepared the way for compromise, as it then may work more smoothly. When I bought my fall hat, the other day, I first went around to see the hats, and then I took my husband around to see them.

"Don't you think this one would be just lovely, John?" I inquired, pointing to one.

"What's the price?" he asked.

"Fifty-three dollars," said the milliner, "and it's a bargain at the price."

"Wouldn't this do just as well?" John inquired, pointing to one that was marked down to $2.98.

"Right then and there some people would have quarreled, but Mr. Hyphen and I compromised on a hat that cost $24.35. It was the one I had told the milliner I wanted when I first visited her establishment. So you see what a spirit of compromise will do, especially if combined with a little helpful strategy. Oh, how much happier and sweeter marital life would be if but this spirit were more prevalent! Don't you think so?"

When the case was so clearly proved, what could a man do except agree with the good lady?

Rested or Weary.

Rested or weary, it matters not.

Still it's the way that is set we go.

Toil for the day is the common lot.

Labor for all till the sun sinks low.

But Nature, the mother, is never unkind;

There's a long, long rest at the end, we find.

Rested or weary, still toil we on

While there is work for the hand to do.

Cometh the night when our world shall don

Its mantle of black that the stars look through.

First is the struggle, the spirit to test,

Then long, long peace of the long, long rest.

Rested or weary, a voice still calls,

Whispering ever where'er we go:

"After the toiling the twilight falls,

Bearing a benison all shall know."

F'en as a child on its mother's breast,

We shall lie down for the long, long rest.

Rested or weary, oh, brother of mine,

Breasting the billows that pleasure would shun,

Soon shall we step from the endless line;

Never or now must the height be won.

Then to our toil with a new-born zest,

After it cometh the long, sweet rest.

How Much Is a Billion?

Some of us have a rather vague and indefinite idea of the number of units involved when we speak of a billion; the most of us, I fancy, do not possess even that ghost of an idea—we have as little comprehension of the magnitude of a billion as we have of the boundary of the spaces beyond the stars. A recent little episode set me to thinking along this line, and perhaps you will be interested to hear about it.

I have a small and comparatively cheap typewriter which has done me great service. The other day I was talking with a local representative of its manufacturers.

"I have had my machine eight and one-half years," I said; "have pounded out on it somewhere into the millions of words, and have not paid two dollars in all for repairs."

"That is a fine record," the representative replied, "but you would be astonished to know how many such reports we receive, some of them even better than yours. Why, I know of one man—he is a magazine writer—whose machine still is in good condition, and he has written with it—I forget the exact number of words, but it is more than a billion."

I tried to look interestedly, solemnly, succeeded, and went away. Now let us see just what this man must have done to have written a billion words.

Two thousand words of original matter, written daily, would wear any man out if continued for any great length of time, but, the magazine-writer under consideration evidently being a very remarkable man, let us suppose that he maintains this rate on every working day of every year. In a year he would write 626,000 words; considerably less than two-thirds of a million, and there are a thousand millions in a billion. Now divide 1,000,000,000 by 626,000, and you will find that it would take the man 1,597 years and five or six months to write the billion words. And he has written "more than a billion!"

The man has done well, and I admire his persistency. He must have begun his work not later than the year 312 A. D., and he hasn't had a holiday since. Positively he is the oldest inhabitant, as well as the most energetic, unless the Wandering Jew still is at large. Moreover, he is ingenious, being the only person who has succeeded in writing on a typewriter fifteen and one-half centuries before it was invented. He is a remarkable man, that "magazine-writer."

Now, mark you, the man who told me that tale believed himself, and he was fairly intelligent or he could not have held the position he did. The fact is, his idea of a billion was about as indefinite as that of the most of us. As the savage goes astray when he attempts to count beyond five, so do the great majority of us flounder when we have passed seven or eight figures at the most.

Still One Authority Remains.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

On September 21st the electors of Marysville are to decide by vote whether or not the city shall be bonded in the sum of $49,000 for a high school building and $31,000 for a grammar school building.

A soldier from a company stationed in that vicinity recently was lost in Clough's cave, located on the middle fork of the Kaweah river. He would have been permanently lost had not a comrade chanced to hear him say that he was going to visit the cave, and the search which ensued resulted in finding him after he had been underground thirty hours.

Several weeks still will be required to complete the Western Pacific's big steel bridge over Spanish creek, but it is thought that the road will be completed to Oakland within another two months or so.

Petaluma having discovered natural gas in quantity, Santa Rosa follows with a gas strike in Bennett valley, near the latter city.

The Edinburg hotel at Beaumont, near Riverside, burned the other day, involving a loss of $44,000, with insurance of but $15,000.

Panthers are reported to be unusually numerous this season on the McCloud river and in its vicinity, and several have been killed by hunters.

Lakeport is to have an Admission Day celebration, and as excursions will be made to the Clear Lake town from the other towns of the county, it is expected that the celebration will be a "big event."

The rapid growth of Coalings is indicated by the fact that the railroad there transacted a freight business amounting to $184,000 in July of this year, while its freight business in July, 1908, amounted to but $80,000.

It is estimated that a million gallons of wine will be produced this year from the grapes grown on the Vina ranch, the largest vineyard in the world.

The Sacramento Valley Irrigation Company has purchased the McCune-Garnett ranch of 3,150 acres, situated near Williams, for $35 an acre. It is the company's intention to sell it in forty-acre lots.

Residents in the vicinity of Mount Lassen are somewhat disturbed by rumblings heard of late from the supposedly extinct volcano. Hot springs also are said to have broken out on the mountain.

Many protests are being made against the proposal of the grape-growers' organization to give away samples of wine at the state fair in Sacramento.

THE BRAVEST BATTLE.

By Joaquin Miller.

The bravest battle that ever was fought,

Shall I tell you where and when?

On the maps of the world you will find it not;

'Twas fought by the mothers of men.

Nay, not with cannon, or battle-shot,

With sword or nobler pen;

Nay, not with eloquent word or thought,

From the mouths of wonderful men.

But deep in a walled-up woman's heart—

Of woman that would not yield,

But bravely, silently bore her part—

Lo! there is that battle-field!

No marshaling troop, no bivouac song;

She fights in her walled-up town—

Fights on, and on, in the endless wars,

Then silent, unseen, goes down!

O! ye with banners and battle-shot,

And soldier to shout and praise,

I tell you the kingliest victories fought

Are fought in these silent ways!

O! spotless woman in a world of shame,

With splendid and silent scorn,

Go back to God as white as you came,

The kingliest warrior born.

Altogether, these Russians are a quaint and interesting fragment of the composite immigration problem. An even larger colony of them lives in Fresno, and others are scattered about the state. POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Their Records Down In Black and White

It was a splendid service which Franklin Pierce performed for California when he wrote the history of the legislative session of 1909 and published it in a well-planned and convenient form. It is a service which, it is to be hoped, he will be able to perform for many sessions hereafter. In that little book are written down in black and white the records of practically all the people's representatives in the last legislature. They will not be able to get away from that record. There are many who will not outlive it. It has written "finis" at the right end of many an inept political career. There should be a copy of this book in every newspaper office, every public library, on the shelves of every lawyer and within arm's reach of every citizen who cares to know how public business is conducted. No man can complain if his record be drawn on him anywhere at any time, and Mr. Hitchborn's book is as convenient for drawing in an emergency as a cowboy's six-shooter.

What He Did to Assessor Jones

It was a bad half hour when State Controller A. B. Nye gave to Assessor H. T. Jones of Contra Costa county on Saturday of last week. The fact appears to be that Contra Costa county has lately been hearing a similar relation to California that New Jersey has borne to other states in the union. New Jersey did about everything that the corporations wanted done with the view of inviting corporations to incorporate in that state. Contra Costa county has pursued a similar policy with the view of inducing tax-dodging corporations to make Contra Costa county their principal place of business. In his examination of Assessor Jones Controller Nye brought to public attention the facts that, whereas Assessor Washington Dodge had assessed the franchise of the Pacific States Telegraph and Telephone Company at a round million of dollars, Jones had assessed it at a paltry $5,000. The Union Oil Company, formerly assessed in Los Angeles county at $5,000,000, being transferred to Contra Costa, was dropped to $5,000. Mr. Nye also showed that the California Sugar Company was assessed for only about half what its property was insured for. Driven to desperation by the Controller's merciless questioning Jones frequently took refuge in the expression: "I did not know how to get at it." The assessor of Contra Costa will have only himself to blame if the public jumps to the conclusion that, anyhow, these corporations found some way of getting at Jones.

Is Contra Costa County A Political Gomorrah?

If some California writer were to write the political history of Contra Costa county during the last decade that history would astonish the natives of that county and make the state of California anything but proud of that particular political subdivision. Its political methods have been so new that they are a political novelty. It is not that they are new, but that they desire to have things more rarely done. There is this to be said, however, as to the policies of the political powers, they have made it easy for corporations to "be good" and as exceedingly profitable to the corporations as to the political "powers-that-be" in that county. They have known where to throw their political influence and how to vote their employees so that it would do the politicians and the corporations the most good. Of course the bona fide tax payers have been hurt, but they are like the consumers under our tariff system, no one holds any brief authorizing him to speak for them. It is a bad record which Contra Costa has made in this particular and a record which any first class, courageous, patriotic citizen of that county should have been able to prevent.

An Argument For the New Revenue System

It hardly needs to be explained that the reduced revenue of the assessed valuation of a corporation from $1,000,000 to $5,000 reduced the state's revenue from that corporation from between $4,000 and $5,000 a year to between $20 and $25. Under a system of taxation that supported the state by corporation and other incidental taxes Contra Costa county would, by kicking out tax-dodging inducements to corporations to move their principal place of business to that county, injure no one but her own citizens, but, under the existing system, the misfeasance of that county puts every taxpayer in the state whether in that county or not. It never ought to be in the power of any county assessor so to abuse the power of taxation. The State Board of Equalization should, in such cases, have the power arbitrarily to reassess the property and franchises of those delinquent corporations, a thing it is now powerless to do. The sooner the state rid itself of its present system of taxation the sooner will it rid itself of such atrocities as that committed against it in Contra Costa county. And there are other counties disposed to profit by Contra Costa's pernicious example.

Fixing Responsibility Makes For Efficiency

Such sounds as come out of the offices of the new Bank Commission encourage a belief in industry and efficiency. Although it is but little more than a month since Superintendent Anderson assumed his duties, it is known that as many as thirty-five banks have been notified to make good their statements of capital, and a smaller number have been directed to make radical changes in their plans of doing business, if they would not fall under the serious displeasure of the department. Of course such speedy action on the cases of the weak sisters in the banking world would not have been possible had not the superintendent been able to utilize a store of knowledge gained during the existence of the old commission, several of whose members have been retained as examiners. Generally speaking, the old bank commissioners were not so short on knowledge of conditions as they were on ability to take action to cure admitted evils. The superior vigor of a single-headed commission is now being demonstrated in just the way in which it was hoped that it would be.

Beards the Lion In His Den

But the most aggressive act of the State Superintendent of Banks, which has been the assertion of his authority to control national banks so far as they are engaged in conducting savings bank departments. These savings department attachments are a comparatively new thing, for, while there has been no change in the law, which contemplates that the national banks shall do a purely commercial business, and shall not even lend money on real estate security, there appears to have been a change of policy on the part of the Comptroller of the Currency, in evidence of which a good many national banks now display the sign "Savings," or "Savings Department." There is a magic in that word when used in connection with a bank, and if employed by a national bank the effect is to give intending depositors the impression that they will be safeguarded by the same rules which are established by law for the protection of depositors in full-fledged savings banks. Superintendent Anderson now declares that he will take these banks at their word and that henceforth they will be subject to examination and regulation the same as if they were genuine savings banks. He has made public a legal opinion which supports him in the tax-dodging, but just the same it will be strange if the first attempts to exercise the asserted power do not provoke a clash, because the national bankers regard themselves as the exclusive wards of the Federal Government and are prone to look on the state as an inferior tribunal which cannot touch them.

A Dangerous Practice Of Side-Stepping Law

In the smaller cities and towns the combination of national and savings bank, the latter intended to feed the former, is frequently accomplished in another manner by having two incorporations, the two banks doing business in the same or adjoining quarters. It will probably be the policy of the Superintendent of Banks in this class of cases to subject the savings twin to stringent regulation under the state law, although he cannot touch the national twin. And the doing of that is likely to prevent a considerable number of country banks from taking out national charters, because they cannot very well do business without taking savings deposits and without lending money on mortgages. The latter thing, however, a good many national banks do by indirection. They lend the money on indorsed notes to some one, usually an officer or heavy stockholder in the bank, who lends it on mortgage to the real borrower. An excessive indulgence in this practice would probably involve a national bank in difficulties with the Comptroller of the Currency if it should be discovered, but the thing is done to some extent does not make the thing a delict.

A Good Plan Fails For Lack of Nerve

For a week past the State Board of Equalization has been in San Francisco to hear evidence relating to the equalization of the assessments of counties, and San Francisco, Alameda and Santa Clara are among the counties which have been given a hearing. This board, which was a creation of the convention that framed the constitution of the state, exists for the purpose of equalizing by raising or lowering county assessments; as a whole, that is its principal function as contemplated by law, although it has a few other duties, such as making the assessments of railroads and figuring out the state tax as based on the appropriations made by the legislature and the aggregate of assessments reported by the several counties. But the Board of Equalization seldom equalizes. It is now six years since it has either raised or lowered a single county assessment roll. In 1903 a good many rolls were raised, including that of San Francisco. In view of the admitted inequalities of assessments a six-years' rest from the performance of its duties looks rather bad for the Board of Equalization, but possibly some excuse for non-action is furnished by the attitude of the press and the public toward the exercise of the authority. There is always a tremendous uproar when a raise of an assessment roll is proposed; the newspapers denounce it as a "ridiculous" move, the chambers of commerce and boards of trade get up indignation meetings. Each county assessor declares that his county is assessed as high as any other, and the taxpayers are more than ready to believe what he says. This year, for example, the State Board of Equalization cited thirty-one counties to appear and submit evidence touching the adequacy of their assessments, and there is not one in the list which has not protested vigorously against the injustice of an increase.

Let People and Papers Be Honest and Sane

Taxation is a grievous burden, unfortunately one which seems to be growing more grievous year by year—and it is strictly in accordance with the known attributes of human nature that people should act as they do with regard to the exercise of its functions by the State Board of Equalization. And yet looked at in any large way, this attitude of the public is thoroughly absurd. It is not possibly true that each of the fifty-eight counties should be, as it is ready to assert, the most highly assessed; neither is it believable that all are assessed, by their fifty-eight different assessors, on an exact equality; on the contrary, it is well known that there are glaring inequalities. It is the constitutional and sworn duty of the members of the state board to remove their inequalities, and in the performance of this duty why should they not be granted the usual presumption of honesty until by their acts they prove otherwise? If anything were needed to prove the irrationality of the general attitude toward equalization it would be this—that while a proposal to make even a slight raise in a given county will provoke a storm of protest, it does not appear to be regarded as at all an injury to anybody that some other county shall be permitted to go under-assessed to a scandalous degree for year after year, although each year that condition causes the taxpayers in all the other counties to pay more than they ought to pay. And neither does the failure of the State Board of Equalization for six years to do any equalizing seem to expose the members to any criticism, though many property owners must in consequence have been bearing some burdens which others should have borne.

Post-Primary Politics

Following the primary election in San Francisco, most of the political activity has been the efforts of the politicians to fight out the question of control of the party machinery, the efforts of the successful machine candidates to conciliate the independents, and the efforts of the newspapers to decide whom they will support. Crocker has tried desperately to placate the leaders of the Independent Republican clubs, and at this writing has not yet been successful. He is prepared to let them write his platform for him and put in planks supporting the graft prosecutions, the Hetch-Hetchy project, and all the other popular demands. Leland is prepared to issue the same sort of a platform.

"Take the Least of the Evils"

At the moment a strong reactionary feeling is abroad. Many people are listening to the half-hearted cry of the politicians, "Let us take the least of the three evils," and good Republicans are resigning themselves to accept Crocker as less objectionable than McCarthy, and good Democrats to accept Leland as less objectionable than McCarthy. The Call is said to be in the former state of mind; the Bulletin in the latter.

Sentiment for a Fourth Candidate

But a strong sentiment is also growing that an independent ticket must go in to the field to represent the people who cannot stomach any of the three. The machine will be satisfied if any of the three are elected, as the same influences nominated all of them. The public will not be so satisfied. James D. Phelan, it is conceded, could be elected if he would run, but he will not. The sentiment of the still independent and conservative element is centering on Walter MacArthur as the man to save the day. If properly assured of the support of the decent element, it is believed MacArthur will run. He is the hope of the city to save it from a disaster such as the Schmitz-Ruef regime was. The Good Government League might nominate MacArthur. If it does not, some independent movement should be launched to do it.

Heney to Go Alone

Francis J. Heney's petition is being circulated for his independent candidacy for district attorney. It is understood that he will make his fight entirely alone, and for this purpose a Heney league is now being organized. Heney will return to San Francisco in a few days and begin his active campaign.

THE GRAFT CASES.

Owing to the illness of Stanley Moore, one of Patrick Callioun's attorneys, the trial of the latter individual has been postponed during the week just past, and no progress has been made except as Judge Lawlor has examined a number of veniremen who had been summoned to appear in the case.

THAT TAHOE CONTRACT.

First Accurate Statement of Terms.

The daily papers have neither correctly nor fully given the details of the very remarkable contract by which the Department of the Interior has turned over to the Truckee River General Electric Company all the remaining power possibilities of the Lake Tahoe and Truckee river water-sheds. The California Weekly is now able to give its readers the first comprehensive and trustworthy statement of the terms of that contract.

The reader must understand that Lake Tahoe has only one outlet, which is the Truckee river. In about eighty miles there has been developed electric power using a fall of only about four hundred feet. The Truckee River General Electric Company has utilized this fall at five points: under its own name at Fleisch and at Ferad; and by the acquisition of three other companies with power plants, namely, the Washoe Power and Development Company at Mogul, the Floriston Pulp and Paper Company at Floriston, and the Reno Power and Water Company at Reno, with a total combined capacity of not over 10,000 horsepower. AMERICAN SHIPPING IN AMERICAN SHIPS

I. GOVERNMENT AID UP TO 1812.

By G. W. DICKIE.

I have written so much, and spoken so much on the subject of these articles that I feel as if it were not possible for me to write any more in regard to the shipping in the foreign trade of this country. Yet I have consented to prepare a number of articles so as to present this subject to the readers of The California Weekly as it presents itself to me to-day, in the hope that I may be able to reach in this way many whom I have not in any other way reached, and thus add to the number of those who have come to see this subject in its true magnitude and relation to the prosperity of this country.

In this, the first of these articles, I will trace the progress of American shipping in the foreign trade during the first fifty years of our national history. This will enable me to show that the foreign shipping of this country has never been able to compete with the ships of other maritime nations except through the protection and advantages derived by special acts of legislation enacted for that special purpose.

How American Colonies Met the Problem.

In studying the effect of the various measures that were adopted in the end of the eighteenth century for the protection and encouragement of American shipping in the foreign trade, we do not find any fixed enlightened policy in regard to fostering the growth and permanent stability of the foreign shipping but generally the adoption of some temporizing policy calculated to meet the evil that was pressing most heavily at the time. In 1784 the effect of the foreign policy of Britain began to be felt in the American trade and caused wide-spread uneasiness amongst the ship-owners of this country, there being as yet no means for concerted action. The first step taken was an appeal by Congress to the states for a grant of power, for a limited time, to regulate foreign commerce, this effort failed and the states most interested next endeavored to effect their purpose by separate, but concurrent, regulations, but then as now no two states could agree on what was best to do and again the effort was abortive. Out of this experience, however, grew the measures which terminated in the establishment of a government competent to regulate our commercial interests, and to vindicate our commercial rights. It is interesting to note that the need for ship encouragement, requiring united action, was what finally led to the establishment of the federal government.

Needs for Encouragement Founded Republic.

Dependent as the young republic was on her foreign shipping trade, for the means of development and the growth of financial strength that had been sadly depleted, the expediency of some kind of trade regulation forced itself upon those responsible for the welfare of the people. From the close of the War of the Revolution there came on a period of depression and distress on the Atlantic Coast such as the people had hardly felt during the darkest days of the war itself. Shipowners, shipbuilders, mechanics, all were without work and many of them without bread. The British ship came freely and always plentifully loaded, whereas to American ships and American products, there was no protection on this side, not the equivalent of reciprocal free trade on the other side. The cheaper labor of England supplied the people on the Atlantic shore with everything.

The records of that time show that from 1783 to 1789, when there was no defense against the foreign ship, was a period when the affairs of the states caused the deepest concern to the able and patriotic men who were guiding the destinies of the young republic. Imports greatly exceeded exports and distress was widespread. Shipping in the foreign trade seemed doomed to utter decay. While from 1789—when protection was afforded the American ship—to the War of 1812, industries took root in the land and new enterprises fully employed all workmen.

The policy of discrimination in the matter of import duties and tonnage charges in favor of the home ship that characterized the time when shipowning was prosperous on the Atlantic seaboard of this country, originated with the colonies themselves long before they became united as an independent self-governing country, and differed somewhat in principle from that of the British, under which only British vessels could carry cargoes into British ports from Asia, Africa, or America, or trade between the colonies, while in Europe the different nations might trade direct with England from their own country on payment of discriminatory duties.

Early American System Permissive.

The system adopted by the American colonies was permissive, giving their own ships a preference for their own trade through their tonnage and tariff duties which were discriminatory.

The British shipping law of the period had eight distinct prohibitions while the American colonies had none, nor had the republic any prior to 1817, when two acts of Congress were passed, one confining foreign vessels to direct trade, another excluding them from domestic traffic.

Shipping Always Needed Protection.

History shows, and experience demonstrates, that no nation either ancient or modern has been able to build up and maintain a great foreign trade without resorting to protection for the ships engaged therein. The laws enforced by the older nations, especially England, made it necessary for the young American nation to foster and protect its shipping. The great statesmen who made the early history of this nation, and who do not appear to have any worthy successors, needed not to be convinced of this necessity, as most of them were familiar with the encouragement given to shipping by their own states. It was quite natural for them to be disposed to promote shipbuilding, an art long established in our states, to foster shipowning, a business reaching back to the youth of the colonies, and to extend commerce, an ambition that had been cherished through fifty years of struggle, and this desire at the beginning of this country's history was just as general and as strong as that to advance agriculture and establish manufactures, for they seemed to know then that these three interests when joined and supporting each other, were and always will be the power to develop the strength and fortify the independence of the country.

Discrimination in favor of home vessels was incorporated in most of the colonial charters. Virginia had a rate of 2½ per cent. on all goods imported by British subjects on British vessels, and 5 per cent. on all goods imported by foreigners on foreign vessels. Even discrimination was resorted to in the regulation of trade between the colonies themselves. In 1649 an act of Massachusetts provided for retaliatory duties against ships from other colonies. Virginia also enacted them against Maryland vessels.

From 1715 to 1774 Massachusetts imposed double duties on all goods not imported directly from the place of production.

Early Tonnage Duties.

The first tonnage duties were levied by Virginia in 1641, and by Massachusetts in 1645, other colonies followed their example, and nearly all of them exempted their own vessels.

The northern colonies came to have agreements for mutual help, thus the Massachusetts law exempted British ships and those of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, Connecticut and Rhode Island. British ships were taxed at first but owners complained to the home government and the colonies were all commanded to cease the distinction between British and colonial ships. These early laws for the protection of shipping show how strong the desire was in colonial days for an American merchant marine.
